To irradiate the fascinations of female loveliness has ever been a favourite object of scientific research ; and the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms have with unwearied diligence been repeatedly, but unsuccessfully, explored, in attainment of this grand desideratum, until chance propitiously introduced to the knowledge of a distinguished English Lady travelling that delightful part of Asia, once the enchanting scenery of our youthful imageries that carried us into Bagdad, an invaluable cosmetic introduced by Rowland as Kalydor, as an Auxiliary of British Beauty, to create a new galaxy of unprecedented splendour, enhance the already rich endowments of nature, and characterise the ladies of our happy island as the fairest and most irresistibly attractive of all human beings ! In the records of felicitous discovery, embracing past and present times, Rowland's Kalydor stands pre-eminent in manifold inestimable properties, instantaneously unfolded, universally patronised, and spreading its unrivalled renown more rapidly than any other the most boasted specific ever known, over all parts of the inhabited universe! What greater proof than this of intrinsic excellence ! What higher eulogium than that spontaneously bestowed by experience ? What firmer reliance for the preservation from youth to age, of female beauty, than on the faithful auxiliary that, opposed against the ravages of time and disease, subdues all difficulty, and reinstates the late desponding fair one in the full plenitude of power, and resplendent zenith of fascination? Rowland's Kalydor ejects all cutaneous imperfections, whether tan, freckle, coarseness, harshness, or eruption ; confers a dazzling whiteness ; gives to the skin an elastic firmness ; renders it smooth as velvet ; secures it against the influence of intense heat or cold ; and to mothers nursing their offspring, allays the pains frequently experienced in administering the first aliment of nature. Finally, Rowland's Kalydor is to gentlemen invaluable, as applied to the face before shaving ; it removes the smarting irritability of the skin, and renders the operation of the razor peculiarly easy and delightful. The public are cautioned against imposition ; and respectfully recommended in purchasing to "Ask for Rowland's Kalydor," and to attend to the Label, which bears the signature and address, "A. Rowland and Son, 20, Hatton Garden ;" all others are counterfeit.

(City, Four o'clock, Yesterday.)

The Money Market has been very dull during the week; a perfect calm has succeeded the storm of the week preceding; the variation has only been a ¼ per cent. which will be seen by reference to the fluctuations given above. The Foreign Market has been particularly heavy, in consequence of the failures in that market lately; six bargains a day has been the extent done. Newman, the broker, whose crime of forgery we exclusively communicated to the public last Sunday, has since put a period to his existence; the principal, and we believe the only sufferers, are two maiden ladies residing in the neighbourhood of Grosvenor-square, of the name of FANSHAWE; the 30,000l., which they, in entire confidence, committed to his care, for the purpose of jobbing, has been entirely lost, with the exception of 400l. Consols, for which the broker had a cheque, which was not paid. Yesterday the market opened heavily, accompanied by a decline in Consols at half per cent.; in the absence of real news, the Stock Exchange inventors created some of their own, such as gloomy reports from Lisbon—the Insurgents gaining ground there—the Duke of Wellington gone to Paris, and Spain, warlike in her Councils—however, after some varying, Consols for the Account left off at 80.

THE AGE.

LONDON, DECEMBER 24.

The disposition of France, in the warlike projection which has just emanated from this country, has assumed a more decided character, than people had previously been inclined to entertain of it, since our last publication, by the arrival of the speech of the French MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS to the Chamber of Peers.

The tone of this address leaves no room for doubt, and from its manly and explicit character, therefore, we have to look forward to every co-operation that can either be wished for, or expected—a knowledge that is the more satisfactory to this country, from the conviction we have, of the many turbulent spirits at this time in France, who would be anxious to direct her councils in a very different manner, and also, from a conviction that such a belief was lately so generally entertained here. The determination of the Court of the Thuilleries being thus established, the solitary question now left for consideration, is the situation of Spain, examined solely with reference to itself and its own doctrines—and how far England and France may act conjunctively, or individually, towards her. The French Minister, M. DAMAS, has expressly intimated the perfidy of which the Spanish Cabinet has been guilty, by violating, in the aid its authorities have given to the insurgents, every promise held out and promulgated, of a pacific tendency; and not only therefore is the question of any conjunction with France totally hushed, and put hors de combat, but the possibility of hostile measures from France by no means rendered uncertain. The character of the miserable bigot, who now wields the Spanish sceptre, has been long and well understood, although not made so manifest, as it has now become; but thus established, as it at present is, it is useless ever again to suppose it capable of being admitted into the faith of nations. The tie of public honour which binds other empires, and may be considered the basis upon which their necessity is consolidated, is regarded by this man as a mere toy for political pastime, and of no more principle or worth, than the verbiage of idle dialogue—upon this belief, or rather consideration, he has acted, and having rendered himself alike odious and contemptible, he seeks to bring other states into the disgraceful character his faithlessness has inflicted upon his own.

It is not barely rational to suppose that Spain will prosecute the outrageous incursions she has already made upon Portugal, now that the feelings of Great Britain have been expressed to her by action, which might all have been spared, if she had listened to her words. If, however, despite the opinions, every reasonable person would entertain and deliver, and also despite that experience which some will never profit by, Spain should proceed, and carry her warfare in open array against the arms of England, now assembled for the protection of her ally, "it needs no ghost" to tell us what will be the immediate consequences of such a mad idea. Her armaments will very speedily be swept from the face of the creation, and barely a trace will be left to betray a knowledge that she ever had such power, and it will then be for the Court of St. James's in its co-operation with that of France, to determine upon the state to which they will reduce, and upon which they will eventually establish, the dynasty of Spain altogether. But we will believe that this is imagining [illegible] case, and that nothing so absurd, however much it may once have been contemplated, can now be thought of for a moment. Still, if Spain retract her steps, and peace be, as till lately, presiding over the land, we think there is even more to be done, than if she stood forth in all her trumpery hostility. We have to protect our ally against any fresh inroad, such as now has been inflicted upon her—we have to spare ourselves the vast expence of lending her such protection, and equal to, or perhaps beyond all this, we have to produce such a system, that we may be enabled, for the hereafter, to rest assured that the faith, we trust to, will be more scrupulously regarded, than it hitherto has been. How this is to be effected, may employ the wisest councils to determine, and when determined, may not be productive of that general satisfaction such a measure ought to produce; but on what grounds should it be contemplated?—THE CHARACTER OF THE MAN we have to deal with, is the best criterion to decide by, and the maker and breaker of the same engagements, is so vile and worthless a slave to the influence of duplicity and dishonour, that no word is to be received, which his fears, or his imposed humility, may give utterance to. Is then the peace of Europe to be subject to the prevalence of such a man's humour, indulged as it is without restraint, and acted upon without consideration, to use the mildest term? Are the great national interests of surrounding states to be intruded upon, their intercourses compromised, and all their vast concernments either impeded or undermined, by the fanaticism of a faithless, worthless, vacillating tool, in the hands of her imbecile and designing priesthood? The farce is contemptible.

Both France and this country may pause before they decide upon a step of such singular importance, and it is but just they should do so: but pause as they will, they can come to but one true way of proceeding with any one, placed by himself without the pale of national considerations. DETHRONE FERDINAND, they must, if they have it in contemplation even to rest secure from the recurrence of those evils, we have thus but slightly touched upon. We should be sorry, indeed, to be considered, by the usual advocates of our policy, as expressing either sentiments too determined, or in a manner too strong for the occasion; but we may be permitted to say, in this instance, that "a tame trite medium" would be indicative of a carelessness or apathy, not consonant with the existing state of things. No one can lament more than ourselves, any necessity that brings into action the belligerent resources of Great Britain, which we would have for ever repose in all peaceful grandeur—but once aroused, we would have their omnipotence exercised, with all its established glory; and the note of preparation once sounded, England must not merely be satisfied that it is heard, and attended to, by those it was intended to reach, but she must receive such indemnity for herself and her allies, that shall put it off the score of probability, that it is ever again unnecessarily brought into action.

A person was telling CROCKFORD, the other day, that it was likely a bill of indictment would be preferred against him; when the cormorant replied, "Vell, them as likes may prefer a bill, but I always prefer cash."

THEATRICALS.

The performance of the Hypocrite re-introduced Mr. LISTON on Monday last to the laughter-loving sons of Cockagne; and, although his representation of Mawworm is too familiar to the reader, to require any particular notice, beyond the accustomed meed of approbation to which it is entitled, we are, at least, bound to pay it that. Mr. LISTON is the most valuable, as he is the most extraordinary, performer at present, and probably ever, on the English stage. A manager is always sure of him; for, to use a familiar phrase on another subject, his humour breaks out when you least expect it; and, whether, therefore, it be in an old or a new character, what its qualifications will not do for the actor, the actor will do for them. This is the test of the professions—the ars celere artem, which is attained by so very few members of it, but which, once attained, renders naturally its possessor thus eminent.

To those persons who are somewhat apt to be uncharitable towards stage purposes, we cannot recommend any thing so strongly as we do an attendance on the performance of this play of the Hypocrite, in which he will see very forcibly drawn, and as it is now acted at Drury Lane, as forcibly depicted, one of the most prevalent and pernicious passions that ever influenced a nation—RELIGIOUS DISSIMULATION—the evil of which is, in these days, visited to a most alarming extent on so many thousands of his MAJESTY'S subjects. This is not the time for us to entertain such a question, or for such question to entertain us, but we may be permitted briefly to say, that the only solid cure for a mind ridden by this incubus, THE NEW LIGHT, is to go to Drury Lane, and, between the portraiture of Mr. DOWTON'S Cantwell, and Mr. LISTON'S Mawworm, he will be enabled to discern all that is awful in its hypocrisy, and ludicrous in its mockery, in the various directions of this perilous inspiration.

We sincerely hope there is no one so unnatural as to anticipate any theatrical criticism of a more general nature, on the exhibitions of the past week. There is nothing that could arouse a Cockney's feelings the week before Christmas—up to the 25th instant, he has in his eye the contemplation of what, on that day, he is to have in his mouth, and that stopped, his existence depends on the 26th, when the delights of the annual pantomime burst forth upon his sight—and who would not go to see Miss BARNET and the Man in the Moon, and Miss ROAMER in Ricket with the Tuft!—WE will tell all about it next week.

The Papers are playing fine work with our great singers—Madame VESTRIS has been ill, Madame PASTA been losing her voice, and Miss PATON sent to Portugal with the Blues. We are delighted to find the VESTRIS recovered, and shall no doubt soon hear that PASTA is; and relative to Miss PATON, as the Blues are not going to leave England, and the lady is engaged for some time to come at Covent Garden, then at Dublin, at the Philharmonic, and other places, we imagine she is not likely to take Lisbon in her way—but it is devilish hard upon WILLIAM LENNOX—because, what with the approach of Christmas, and an order for embarkation, my Lord will have a "trouble you for my little bill," at the turn of every street—and that's beyond joking.

THE RICHMOND AFFAIR.

The circumstances attending this transaction having at length been fully communicated to us, we lose no time in laying the matter before the public, in what we consider its proper light, with a view of correcting some errors of opinion entertained by many, and of doing justice to characters unfairly maligned.

Mr. AULDJO, the principal loser on the occasion, having submitted a statement, (by the advice of Bear ELLICE, the modern Greek, who is AULDJO'S trustee) in which the honour of some of the parties with whom he had played at Richmond, and, in addition thereto, having preferred a bill of indictment against those on whom his suspicions fell, the parties have replied thereto. The statement of Mr. WALROND we submitted to our readers on the 3d instant, which was in substance similar to those we have this day to lay en masse before the public. Although no distinct charge has been publicly made against the Marquis of CLANRICARDE, his Lordship has deemed it necessary to anticipate the possibility of any such being received, and has accordingly circulated the following statement—a step which is rendered even more judicious, by the many aspersions which his Lordship's enemies have privately dealt around:—

"St. James's-square, Dec. 15, 1826.

Lord Clanricarde thinks it due to himself, in consequence of the paragraphs which have appeared in several of the public Journals, and of the unfounded rumours which, he understands, have been spread to the prejudice of his honour, to circulate amongst his friends the following statement and correspondence, without comment:—

Lord Clanricarde, received, while at Paris, the two letters alluded to in his letter to Mr. Prendergast, hereafter mentioned. Upon his arrival in London, he learned that insinuations had appeared in some of the public prints, bearing reference to Mr. Auldjo, which affected his honour.

His first impulse was to meet Mr. Auldjo, in the presence of that gentleman's friends, to state all the circumstances within his knowledge, connected with the subject of these paragraphs, and to call upon Mr. Auldjo to admit, or deny them. With this view Lord Clanricarde called upon Mr. Howard (Mr. Auldjo's solicitor,) and that gentleman appointed two o'clock the next day for Lord Clanricarde to meet Mr. Auldjo at his (the solicitor's) house.

The next day, Oct, 30, Lord Clanricarde and Lord Howth, accompanied only by Mr. Prendergast, repaired to Mr. Howard's house, at the hour appointed: when Lord Clanricarde saw Mr. M'Gillivray, who informed him, "that Mr. Ellice had left town the day before, and that, in his absence, Mr. Auldjo must decline stating any thing, or taking any step, as he was entirely guided by Mr. Ellice's advice."

Mr. Ellice shortly after transmitted to Mr. Prendergast, a statement, purporting to be made by Mr. Auldjo, with permission to show it to any of the parties named in it.

Lord Clanricarde has no authority to communicate this statement. He could find in it nothing to affect his own honour, or that of Lord Howth; except by a very forced inference, and by an obscure reference to other transactions with persons unnamed, in which it was said "the same parties," as Mr. Auldjo had been informed, were engaged; and in which one of those unnamed persons was said to have lost 25,000l.

In consequence of this communication, Lord Clanricarde addressed a letter to Mr. Prendergast, of which the following extracts will give the substance, with a view that he should transmit it to Mr. Ellice, with whom alone, after what had passed, Lord Clanricarde supposed that he had to communicate:—

EXTRACTS, &c. &c. Nov. 2.

"In returning Mr. Auldjo's statement, I feel myself called upon to declare, that I object to much of it with reference both to fact and colouring * * * * *
The origin of the party to Richmond, as far as I was concerned in it, was a proposal that I should try a horse I had recently purchased from Mr. O'Neill, by driving it thither in my carriage; and dining there, as I had occasionally done before in the summer for amusement. A day was fixed for the purpose. Lord Howth, Mr. O'Neill, Mr. Boland, and myself, were to be of the party. I knew of no other.

"Before the day arrived, however, I had a note from Mr. O'Neill, to say that he had invited a friend to join us, if I had no objection, and could give him a seat in his carriage. On the day appointed I drove, accompanied by Lord Howth, to Mr. O'Neill's, to take up that gentleman and his friend. Mr. O'Neill, however, introduced me to Mr. B. Walrond and Mr. Auldjo, whose names and persons were before entirely unknown to me, as two of his friends whom he had invited to join the party, and requested I would admit them into the carriage; which, of course, I did not refuse. On arriving at Richmond, I quitted the party to call upon a friend, with whom I remained till the dinner-hour, when I returned to the inn. The dinner was not long; the quantity of wine drank was inconsiderable, and chiefly French. I can safely assert, that nobody was affected by it, and that Mr. Auldjo was perfectly sober and calm. There was nothing, that I observed, either in his conversation, his manner, or appearance, or in any thing I had heard of him, that led me to suppose that he was younger than Lord Howth or myself. Some discussion took place at dinner respecting the game of ecarte, in consequence of which several games were played immediately after dinner, by myself and some of the party. This led to the proposal of a round game, for the amusement of all. Macao was first suggested. It was, to the best of my recollection and belief, distinctly by the desire of Mr. Auldjo, that loo was adopted, as the game best known to, and preferred by him. The game was unlimited. Each person was at liberty to play for high stakes or not, as he thought fit. Mr. Auldjo appeared to me to play as steadily and cautiously, though very high, as any person could play. Lord Howth and myself did not play so high as Mr. Auldjo did, and Lord Howth advised Mr. Auldjo not to play so high. He was, at first, a considerable winner. He then declined his cards for several deals, till the stake was as high as 1,4601. which, I believe, was the highest, when he played again and lost. From this time he seemed determined to continue playing. Lord Howth, several times, when a loser, proposed to put an end to the play, and exclaimed against the amount of the stakes. (This is admitted by Mr. Auldjo.) There was no time, after Mr. Auldjo had begun to lose, when he might not have declined playing, if he had thought fit. In the result, I was a winner of 500l. odd from Mr. Auldjo, a loser of some hundreds to Mr. Walrond, and a winner from Mr. O'Neill of 700l. which Mr. Auldjo, at Mr. O'Neill's desire, undertook to pay.

Mr. Auldjo returned to town on the coach-box with me. I observed no marks of excitement or dissatisfaction in him. The next day I met him, by accident, at Charing-cross, when he mentioned his loss to me, which I told him he might pay at his own convenience.

In a few days after he called on me, and paid me the 500l.; but, with respect to the sum he had been desired by Mr. O'Neill to pay on his account, he requested the indulgence of some time. I desired him to take his own time. Upon this occasion he did not suggest the slightest cause of complaint or discontent; but, as far as I could judge, seemed desirous of cultivating a further acquaintance with me.

The next time that I heard any thing about him was by his own letter of the 26th of September, received at Paris, enclosing a copy of one he had written to Mr. Boland, wherein he declined to pay any further sum; and stated that, by the advice of his friends, in case he should be pressed for payment, it was his intention to lay the matter before the police-magistrates. I replied to this letter.

I next received a letter from Mr. Auldjo's attorney, dated Oct. 16, demanding back the 500l. * * * * But it seems that Mr. Auldjo has made some subsequent discoveries that have influenced his conduct. These are so obscurely shadowed in his statement, that I am not able to recognize, in the darkness of his figures, any portrait with which I am acquainted. When names and times come to be specified, I am sure I shall not object to putting Mr. Ellice into full possession of any part of my conduct, which, it seems, Mr. Auldjo is now doing me the favour to investigate and bring to light.

In the mean time, I shall make no scruple of admitting that I have both lost and won at cards, before I became acquainted with Mr. Auldjo; though, I believe he will be disappointed, if he expects to find that I ever won so much as a thousand pounds upon any one occasion."

Lord Clanricarde has nothing to add to the statement in this letter, except his declaration that the introduction of cards, at the party at Richmond, was not in his contemplation, when that party was formed, nor at any time before they were called for.

Although neither Mr. Auldjo nor Mr. Ellice had named the persons to whom allusion was made in Mr. Auldjo's statement, Lord Clanricarde was informed, from other sources, that, since the attacks made upon him in the newspapers, reports had been circulated against him of unfair transactions at play with Sir St. Vincent Cotton, and with Mr. Payne.

He was conscious that such imputations were groundless, and that neither of those gentlemen could have given their authority to them. He was naturally impatient to appeal to them for an immediate refutation; but he was advised to restrain his impatience, to combat rumours that had no defined source, until he could ascertain what course Mr. Auldjo, or his advisers, intended to take; more especially as he was left in doubt whether it was their design to adopt legal proceedings, or not.

Mr. Ellice was earnestly pressed to declare himself upon that subject without delay; but he hesitated to do so, because, as Lord Clanricarde understood, Mr. Auldjo's case was before his legal advisers.

At length, on Monday, Nov. 27, Lord Clanricarde was informed (by the authority, as he understood, of Mr. Ellice), of the result of the consultation with Mr. Auldjo's Counsel, the substance of which will be found in the following letter, which Lord Clanricarde lost no time in addressing to Lord Selsey:—

"LORD CLANRICARDE TO LORD SELSEY.

"London, Nov. 28, 1826.

"My Dear Lord Selsey,—You are, no doubt, too well aware of the cruel insinuations that have appeared in several of the public Journals against me. By the advice of friends, in whose judgment I confide, I have been induced to maintain a very mortifying silence, trusting that the time would soon come when my innocence (not resting merely upon my own assertion) would be made manifest by the course of events. With the exception of a communication to Mr. Prendergast, in answer to a statement of Mr. Auldjo, which he had procured, I have abstained from every method of making my case known. I have no reason indeed from this statement to suppose that Mr. Auldjo had any complaint to urge either against me or against Lord Howth; but as it was understood that he had been recommended to submit his facts to legal advisers, and to be governed by their decision, I was advised to wait patiently the result, before I adopted any measure for my own vindication, not from his charges, for he never made any against me, but from imputations, which, originating in misapprehension or malevolence, had spread into public rumour.

"I have the satisfaction to inform you that I yesterday received a communication which sets me free. Mr. Prendergast has assured me that he has the authority of Mr. Edward Ellice, who is the friend, and was the adviser of Mr. Auldjo, to state that the counsel to whom Mr. Auldjo submitted his whole case, 'have given their decided opinion that there is no ground on which any charge could be supported either against myself or Lord Howth.'

"After this, I can have no hesitation in sending you the accompanying statement*, which I of course wish to be circulated amongst my friends. But I have another very important object in view. It seems that the name of Sir St. Vincent Cotton has, in some way, been mixed up with Mr. Auldjo's case, and that reports, very new and surprising to me, of transactions between Sir St. Vincent Cotton and myself, have been circulated to my prejudice. I cannot, without better evidence than mere common rumour, bring myself to believe that a gentleman, whom I have known so long and so intimately as Sir St. Vincent Cotton, can by possibility be the author of statements to affect my honour.—He has never, in his manner or language to me, indicated any feeling inconsistent with the most perfect confidence and friendship. I am perfectly conscious that I have merited nothing less from him." I cannot, however, after what I have heard, bring myself to write to him, for the purpose of demanding an explanation of the very strange statements which have been ascribed to him. I sincerely hope that he will be able to disavow them; but, while this remains doubtful, I know not upon what terms, or in what language, I ought to address him. I am desirous, therefore, of confiding to your discretion and friendship the care of my honour in this particular, leaving it to you to demand on my behalf the explanation which is due to me, and which I think Sir St. Vincent Cotton cannot in justice refuse. The reports to which I allude, are of a nature to impute to me conduct unfair and dishonourable in play with Sir St. Vincent Cotton.

"Believe me, my dear Lord Selsey,

"Always most sincerely your's,

"CLANRICARDE."

In consequence of this letter, Lord Selsey made a communication to Sir St. Vincent Cotton, to which the following answer was returned:—

"SIR ST. VINCENT COTTON TO LORD SELSEY.

(Copy.) "London, Dec. 7, 1826.

"My dear Lord Selsey,—I must beg of you to accept my apologies for not having answered your letter sooner. I wished to see Col. Wyndham, and I could not manage that till this morning. I have no hesitation in stating to you, that in my play transactions with Lord Clanricarde, I did not conceive I could attribute any unfairness to his Lordship. Had I entertained any suspicion of the kind, I certainly should not have paid the money, which I did within a day or two.

"With regard to the reports in circulation, I can positively disclaim having authorised them in any way whatever.

"I remain, my dear Lord Selsey,

"Your obedient servant,

"ST. V. COTTON."

"LETTER FROM LORD CLANRICARDE TO MR. PAYNE.

"Lord Clanricarde, has heard with surprise, that reports, which affect his honour and integrity, with regard to transactions at play with Mr. Payne, have been circulated under the sanction of Mr. P.'s authority. Lord Clanricarde believes that Mr. Payne's name has been used without his authority upon this occasion, both because the reports in question are false, and because reports of a similar description ascribed to Sir St. Vincent Cotton, have been fully disavowed by that gentleman.

"He thinks himself called upon, however, to apprise Mr. Payne of the use which has been made of his name, and to request of Mr. Payne that he will disavow having authorised such reports."

"MR. PAYNE TO THE EARL OF CLANRICARDE.

"Stevens's Hotel, Dec. 11, 1826.

"Mr. Payne disavows ever having said that he was treated in any way unfairly by Lord Clanricarde in any transactions of play, or that he ever authorised such a report."

In conclusion, Lord Clanricarde has only to say that he is fully and painfully aware of the avidity with which rumours of private scandal are received, propagated, and exaggerated; and of the extreme difficulty of tracing them to any responsible source.

To whose agency is to be ascribed the reiterated attacks made upon him by the press, he is still to learn. What inference is to be drawn from the industrious application of this engine, preceded first by an obscure threat of a criminal prosecution, and next, by a letter to demand the return of the money paid to him, he leaves to the discernment of impartial persons. He trusts the good opinion of his friends will not be forfeited, until such time as he is found backward to meet any charge which may be brought against his honour, supported on the authority of some individual who may have the candour and the manliness to avow it.

It is impossible that any recital of a "round unvarnished tale" can be more satisfactory than this, and will tend entirely to remove whatever little prejudice might have existed in the minds of a few sceptics. The letter signed "S. M'GILLIVRAY," which has appeared in the present week's journals, was sent to us last Sunday for insertion, but, for obvious reasons, it did not appear. Its purport is evidently to throw an air of ambiguity around the opinion given by Messrs. GURNEY and CHITTY, as to the exculpation of Lords CLANRICARDE and HOWTH, the circulation of which opinion in print is satisfactorily explained by the letter of Mr. PRENDERGAST (which has also appeared), to whom this opinion was forwarded by Mr. ELLICE; and all Mr. ELLICE'S tirade, in Friday's Courier, does not alter the plain fact. As to the mode in which such opinion came before the public, it matters not a pin. We have seen a lithographic copy of Mr. ELLICE'S letter to Mr. PRENDERGAST, containing Messrs. GURNEY and CHITTY'S opinion (without any restriction as to publication), and that opinion, however its announcement may vary in word, conveyed in meaning a clear, full, and thorough exculpation of the Noblemen in question; and, therefore, not all the logic of Mr. M'GILLIVRAY or Mr. ELLICE, and his Greek wisdom in the bargain, can alter the truth, which is, that the Marquis of CLANRICARDE has throughout the business conducted himself in the most open, gentlemanly, and honourable manner, and that his character is as unimpeached as any man's in the land.

To the statement of Lord CLANRICARDE we now add that of another party:—

MR. O'NEILL'S STATEMENT.

It was not my intention to have intruded any statement of the play affair at Richmond beyond a limited circle, as I conceived that the proper mode of meeting public aspersions was public investigation before a Jury. Under that idea I commenced actions against the proprietors of two Newspapers, rather with a view of refuting calumny than of obtaining pecuniary recompence for the deep injury which it inflicted. Recent attacks, however, have obliged me to deviate from my original plan.

About the middle of July last I was riding through Charing-cross, and saw Mr. Boland (on foot) speaking to two persons, who were perfectly unknown to me. I rode up, and asked him to dine with me that day. He then introduced me to one or both of those persons. One was Mr. Auldjo. The next time I saw Mr. Auldjo was, I think, a fortnight afterwards, at dinner, at Mr. Boland's; the third time was on the 5th of August, at Lord's Cricket Ground; and from the day I was introduced to Mr. A. I never visited him, invited him, nor sought his acquaintance in any way. On the ground I met his brother first, and then himself, and frequently during the day I conversed with them separately and together. Just as I was leaving the ground I met Mr. A. near the place where my buggy was standing. He admired my horse, and I made my groom trot him up the field to shew his remarkable action. The conversation turned upon driving. I mentioned that I was going with Lord Clanricarde to Richmond to try a new team on the day after but one, and that I would, if he wished, ask for a seat for him. I did so with the desire of shewing him attention as Captain Maitland's friend; he expressed himself obliged; the seat was asked for and given. On Monday afternoon I met Mr. Walrond near the Park gate. I was not intimate with this Gentleman; my acquaintance, until after the late election in June, was so slight as scarcely to be worth being called one. He was introduced to me by Lord Edward Chichester. I had never been in company with him above four or five times before the 7th August. I never saw him play, nor at any place where play was going on, nor did I know any thing of his habits or pursuits. He asked me how I was engaged for that day, or words to that effect. My reply was, that I was going with Lord Clanricarde to Richmond, and if he chose to take the chance of a seat, he might come to my house about five o'clock. He came, and was introduced to Lords Clanricarde and Howth. However persons may choose to colour this fact, every gentleman who has a team must know that nothing is more common than an introduction at a driving party.

It is quite unnecessary to repeat the detail of the dinner, or to comment on the small quantity of wine proved by the bill to have been sent to the table; it is equally so to publish the affidavits (now in Court) of Mr. Topham, the proprietor of the Hotel, and several of his servants, which so perfectly prove the sobriety of the whole party, particularly as it seems that Mr. Auldjo, at the end of four months (after duly consulting his friends), has found out that he was not drunk. There are also three affidavits in Court to meet the charge of "finding the cards on the chimney-piece." Depositions on oath have been made by the waiter who brought the cards, the man who sold them, and the person who charged them in the bill. I am able most clearly to prove that I did not press any one to drink; that after some conversation about Ecarte, Lord Clanricarde proposed to me to play a few games with him; we did so. I am able to prove that I did not suggest our playing a round game (nor did he), as we wished to continue Ecarte; that I named a different game from Loo, when the round game was proposed, and that Mr. Auldjo expressed his preference of Loo, as a game which he had played at Cambridge; but it is needless to dwell on this, as I am not charged with proposing play, or inducing Mr. A. to play.

Mr. Boland, after playing a few hands, lost eight or nine pounds, and declaring the stakes were getting beyond amusement, rose and left the room and remained away above an hour, and did not again play. I have known this gentleman from my boyhood, and can safely affirm that neither of us ever saw the other play before that night; nor did I ever hear that he had played at all. At first, at the game of Loo, I won considerably, which solely influenced me to continue to play, as I thought that a proposal to stop should not originate with a winner. Mr. Auldjo won very largely. I heard him on one occasion remark that he had then won 1,000l. Mr. Walrond was a very considerable loser: luck became reversed. Lord Clanricarde won 700l., and Mr. Walrond 1,145l. from me. I won 1,400l. from Mr. Auldjo and 380l. from Lord Howth. Mr. Auldjo stated that his losses amounted to near 6,000l. I held, amongst other papers, some with his name, with which, by his consent I, at the table, balanced my debt to Lord Clanricarde 700l., leaving the remaining 700l. between Mr. Auldjo and myself to our mutual recollection. We remained a considerable time in the hall whilst the carriage was getting ready, and left soon after 12 o'clock. On the following day I received a note from Mr. Auldjo, commencing "Dear O'Neill," which, considering the shortness of our acquaintance, rather surprised me. In this letter he in the most urgent manner requested me to get his losses compromised; which, however, in reply, I declined to do so, as I thought such a proposal, if made at all, should be made by himself; and I think I added, that I begged he would not in any way inconvenience himself for the comparatively small sum which he owed me. But as Mr. A. has got all my letters to him, and kept copies of all his own to me (even the one beginning Dear O'Neill), and refers to them in his statement—thus, see copy No. 3, No. 4, &c.—no doubt this letter will be amongst those produced. I never kept any copies. A day or two after, I was walking with Mr. B., and we met Mr. A.; he joined us; we walked together for a long time, and talked over the whole affair. He said, that in consequence of recent mercantile losses, he intended to ask Mr. Walrond and Lord Clanricarde for time, as they were winners, but that he would immediately pay Lord Howth and myself. I again begged him not to think about me untill it was quite convenient, and we parted. On the very same day, near dinner time, Mr. Auldjo called on me. He said that he had forgotten Mr. Walrond's address, and asked me if Lord Howth had left town. I said, I believed so. He then said that he would send me the money to forward to Lord Howth, and would immediately pay me also. I made the same reply as before. On the next day, Mr. Auldjo sent me a letter enclosing 2,000l. again entreating me to get his debts compromised. Certainly, had he requested me to ask any length of time, I would have acted for him as I would have done for myself, had I been inconvenienced to pay, but a proposal to compromise I would neither make for myself, nor negotiate for another. Of this 2,000l. I sent 800l. to Lord Howth, and I called twice on Mr. Auldjo the same day, to return him the 1,200l. but did not find him at home. The second time I called about six or seven o'clock. I went up stairs, and wrote a note, mentioning that I did not like to leave the money, seeing only a female servant, but that I would call the next day at twelve o'clock. I did so, and was received in the most friendly way by Mr. Auldjo and his younger brother, who is an officer in the army, and on whom I call, as having been present at the whole of this interview, to corroborate my assertions. I handed 1,200l. to Mr. Auldjo, and said, that if his finances obliged him to ask time, no man who had won largely from him could refuse to grant it, but that he ought to make personal applications. I told him that I had paid Lord Howth, and requested him to take his own time to pay me. He expressed himself extremely obliged. I observed, that I should be glad if he would pay the transferred part of the debt to Lord Clanricarde, otherwise I should myself pay it immediately. I stated as my reason for being more anxious, that reports had been circulated of my being under great obligations to Lord Clanricarde, and that I owed my return for Hull to him—(which was utterly false.) I said that I did not wish to owe a pecuniary favour of this sort to his Lordship—that I set the highest value upon his friendship, but that if I ever solicited a future favour, it should not be a pecuniary one. I expressly told Mr. Auldjo not to conceal his losses from his friends—I expressed my regret at what had occurred, and my fixed determination never to play again, and I advised him not to injure his property, in order that he might pay promptly, as I was sure that every one would feel as I did, if he stated to them as to me that he had recently lost 25,000l. in a mercantile affair. His brother then said, "I will tell you, Mr. O'Neill, that my advice to my brother, when he told me of this affair, was to send drafts the next day to every person to whom he had lost." Thinking that what Mr. Auldjo had told me was true, I said, "But if he has lost 25,000l. in a mercantile affair"—He laughed, and said, "I am the younger brother, but I would act as I advise." I have since understood that Mr. A. did not lose 25,000l. in a mercantile affair. Mr. A. then gave me fully to understand that he would pay Lord Clanricarde, and we parted; he saying that he would dine with me at my house on his return, as we were both about to leave town.

From this period until the middle of September I never heard nor thought of Mr. Auldjo. I then learned by letter from Lord Clanricarde, that he had not paid his Lordship the 700l. I was at the time dangerously ill at Brighton. I wrote two or three times to Mr. Auldjo, and not hearing from him, I requested Mr. Boland, who was in London, to call on him if he were in town. In answer to a polite note from Mr. Boland, Mr. Auldjo wrote that if he were asked for any more money (he has never paid me any) he would refer the matter to the police. This letter Mr. Boland sent to me at Brighton, and I enclosed it in a blank cover, with my address, to Mr. Auldjo—the only step I could take towards a person who had committed his honour to the custody of the police.

Three or four days after this event, while I was still very ill at Brighton, I received a letter from Mr. Auldjo's solicitor, stating that he should be sorry to put his instructions into effect, and requesting my interference to get back from Lords Clanricarde and Howth, and Mr. Walrond, the sum of 2000l. which Mr. Auldjo had paid to them. In my reply, I expressed my opinion of Mr.

* This was a short statement to the same effect as that contained in the letter to Mr. Prendergast.

Auldjo, and said, that so far from interfering, I should consider my doing so as an insult to those gentlemen, and degrading to myself, and added, that they were so well known in good society, that I need not forward their addresses to him.

I have met with no small portion of ill-will for having forced this affair to a public trial, but feel justified in the course which I have pursued. I set too high a value on public opinion to be content with any thing short of public acquittal.

In the course of the week previous to the indictment being preferred, I understood that a report had been circulated to the effect that I had stated my intention of inflicting summary chastisement on some persons who had used the basest means to prejudice the public mind against the party opposed to Mr. Auldjo, and I was asked if such report was correct: my reply was, that I should not answer the question until the parties most concerned should ask it themselves. In a few days afterwards I was indicted. I immediately offered to accept short notice of trial, but though Mr. Auldjo had taken four months to hatch his plot, and had, in a private room, (which none of the other party could enter,) sworn on a wholesale scale, yet, by not receiving my offer, he seemed aware that as it took four months to get up a case, it would take a much longer time to bring his happy invention to maturity.

It may not be irrelevant to say that I indignantly repel the disgraceful appellation of a Gambler. I am not a member of any play club. I have never frequented any houses of play, either during four years in College, or since I entered the army. I visit no society where play is introduced; and I confidently appeal to my fellow-collegians, to my commanding and brother officers, and to an extensive circle of friends of the first respectability, many of fourteen years standing, whether they ever considered me at all addicted to play. On the very few occasions I have played (among which is included the Melton Race week, when every one plays more or less), I have done so from accident, not from inclination or necessity. In my life I never proposed play to any man. My income, with my father's liberality, was quite sufficient for moderate enjoyment; and, if a fashionable folly led me beyond it, the security of a considerable and ancient family estate offered a mode more honourable and less precarious of meeting any trifling exigency than any gambling could afford—the testimony of such of that highly respectable class of persons, the tradesmen of London, as I have dealt with for ten years, I shall be proud to couple with that of some of the first gentlemen in the country. In a matter of character I should rather be minute than general, and the evidence of the higher ranks will be doubly valuable when supported by other classes of society.

In a former letter I stated that I never won above ten pounds but on five occasions—it now becomes necessary for me to refer to the two principal ones, as I have the pleasure of being on good terms with both the gentlemen whose names are introduced (and publicity being already given to them), I trust I do not act incorrectly in inserting their recent letters to me.

From those two gentlemen I won some hundreds—but not thousands, as has been stated, from either. To Mr. Payne I wrote a letter stating, "that I had heard he was applied to, to give the particulars of his play with me; that I courted, not shunned, publicity in my few play transactions, and that I only desired that he should state the sums and times when he won from me as well as when I won from him." The following is his reply:—

"Dear Sir—Your letter has only to-day been received, I having missed it in the country, and being about to return there immediately left no orders to forward the letters. I really quite forget whether any question was asked me at Newmarket relative to my play with you; but I never conceal any play affairs of mine, therefore should always relate any I happen to remember, if requested. I never kept a regular account of our play, therefore cannot say how we stand on balance; but I perfectly recollect winning of you at Melton. I quite agree with you, and cannot imagine any person 'shunning publicity' in any affairs of play. I have been asked by many whether I ever lost money to yourself and others at the Clarendon, and I, of course mentioned that without any reserve, as I should all evenings, whether I left off a winner or a loser.

"Truly your obedient servant,

"GEORGE PAYNE.

"My present address is—Sulby Hall, Welford, Northamptonshire—as I am again called into the country on business.

"Stevens's Hotel, Nov. 20."

The other gentleman is Sir St. Vincent Cotton to whom I wrote, calling to his recollection our play in Leicestershire, stating the sums I had won from him, and the sums he had won from me, which amounted to quits, and reminding him of his having acknowledged that he had won back his money which I had paid him directly. The following is his reply:—

"Dear Sir—I have this moment received your letter, and lose no time in declaring to you that we are perfectly quits, and that you always paid me any money I ever won of you immediately.—Any one who has stated the contrary, or who has made use of my name to substantiate such statement, says what is not true.

"Your obedient servant,

"London, Dec. 7, 1826." "ST. V. COTTON.

I deeply lament the painful necessity of thus intruding my private affairs on public attention. AUGUSTUS O'NEILL.

28, Chapel street, Grosvenor-place.

If the reader will steadily examine Mr. O'NEILL's statement, he will find the main points of it corroborate every syllable stated by Lord CLANRICARDE, and is, in our opinion, to be fully credited. The legal process which has been thus far adopted against this gentleman appears to us to be the most extraordinary thing we ever heard of; and although it is impossible to give an opinion of the grounds on which it has been founded until it comes before a Court of Justice, yet we will never suffer a young man's reputation thus to be trampled on, were the charges against him fifty times more enormous. Until Mr. O'NEILL be proved GUILTY he ought to be considered INNOCENT, and that such is now our opinion we have no hesitation in declaring. This conclusion we consider borne out by the statement of another party concerned, which we subjoin:—

MR. BOLAND'S STATEMENT.

I am extremely concerned that the introduction of my name, as connected with a play affair at Richmond, obliges me to take a step which may be considered an intrusion on the Public.

I was introduced to Mr. Auldjo by Captain Maitland, of the 8th Regiment, who mentioned his father and Mr. Auldjo were partners, and that he wished me to introduce Mr. Auldjo to his old friend and brother officer, Mr. O'Neill. This he repeated in Mr. A.'s presence. To the best of my recollection this took place early in July. Some time after I met Mr. Auldjo at Charing-cross. Mr. O'Neill rode up, and asked me to dine with him, whilst I was speaking to Mr. Auldjo and another gentleman. I took that opportunity of introducing Mr. Auldjo to Mr. O'Neill.

I asked Mr. Auldjo to dine with me some time afterwards, which he did, accompanied by his brother. My sincere regard for Captain Maitland would at any time lead me to show such a civility to a friend of his. Mr. O'Neill and Mr. Wairond also dined with me. My acquaintance with Mr. Wairond had been only of a few days; we met in the street, and after some remarks on the dulness incidental to that advanced season of the year, I asked him unceremoniously to dine—an invitation no doubt accepted from the same motive it was given—the emptiness of town. I have known Mr. O'Neill many years, and never before the night of the party at Richmond saw him play, nor did I ever consider him a person fond of play. As for myself, having lost a few pounds, I declined play when the stakes went beyond trifles. I did not suggest play, nor did I hear any one asked or solicited to play. Every person was perfectly sober. With regard to my own habits of life, I select a few extracts from some of the many letters for which the attacks on my reputation, rendered it necessary I should apply. I feel it due to myself, as well as to the profession to which I have the honour to belong, to state that the letters to which I refer have been addressed to me by persons of the highest respectability, including some holding judicial and official situations; one a Member of his Majesty's Privy Council, and others of distinguished professional reputation, all which furnish satisfactory testimony, proving that my habits of life have been marked by a disinclination to play, or gambling in any manner.

"7, Stratton-street." "J. M. BOLAND.

FROM ONE OF HIS MAJESTY'S PRIVY COUNCIL.

"December 10, 1826.

"My Dear Sir—Had it not been for what I saw in the English newspapers, I should have been surprised at your application to me, to state my opinion of your character and conduct.

"I have known you, I believe, eleven or twelve years, and have never heard that you had played or betted at any game—and have always considered your character as unimpeached, and that you conducted yourself as a gentleman and man of honour, privately and professionally.

"To J. M. Boland, Esq."

FROM A LEARNED SERGEANT.

"Dec. 10, 1826.

"Dear Sir,—I have not any hesitation in complying with your request, to commit to writing my opinion as to your professional character, so far as my means of knowledge or information extend. I can safely say, that I never heard or knew any thing in the slightest degree to your prejudice, or to induce me to suspect that your conduct had not been that of a gentleman and a man of honour. I never heard that you were addicted to gambling, or that you betted or played at any game; and it was not until a few days ago that I learned, and then with no small degree of surprise, that you were the person whose name appeared in connection with the gambling transaction that has for some time been the subject of so much public discussion.

"To J. M. Boland, Esq."

FROM A MASTER IN THE COURT OF CHANCERY.

"December 12, 1826.

"My dear Sir—It was with considerable surprise I saw your name in the Papers as having been concerned in a play transaction, which has made so much noise in the fashionable world. From habits during many years that we have been together at the Bar, you are the last man in the world I would have supposed likely to figure in a play circle; and let me add, I should hope (if it really were the case) that you have got a lesson which will effectually prevent you from again attempting that for which I am sure the whole course of your former life must have rendered you peculiarly unfit.

"To J. M. Boland, Esq. &c. &c."

Upon a review, therefore, of this transaction, we have every reason to look upon its issue, as one of the most disgraceful upon record. An obscure citizen obtains an introduction, by constant solicitation, to some gentlemen of rank and fortune, and is admitted into their society. Presuming upon an opinion of their pursuits, he literally draws them into a gaming match, where, fortune being against him, he loses a serious sum of money, and being unable to pay them all, he resists the payment of any more, and even demands back what he had paid. It is observed that Mr. AULDJO paid a part of his losses, SOME DAYS AFTER THEY WERE INCURRED!! when he had time to consider whether he was in honour bound so to do, and when he would not have done so if any thing had induced him to think there had been unfair dealing, and the truth of which he knew as well on the evening it occurred, as he has since. But feeling well assured that it was a JUST debt, Mr. AULDJO paid 2,000*l.*, and asked for time to pay the rest—but thinking the money might as well be in his own pocket, as in that of the other parties, and knowing the law does not protect PLAY, he places his HONOUR in the hands of Mr. ELLICE, the Greek, and a police officer! A very nice couple, upon our honour!

We cannot, but sincerely regret that a nobleman of Lord CLANRICARDE'S elevated rank, talents, fortune, and connections, should ever have condescended to allow, even by the recommendation of a friend, a paltry citizen to say he had the honour of dining in his presence, and HIS LORDSHIP must now regret it, as much as we do. The old proverb says,—"He that handleth pitch must be defiled"—and we leave the NOBLE LORD to apply the proverb. At the same time, we beg to compliment him upon the manly way in which he has met this question, and in which he has been seconded by his associates, on the occasion—by means whereof, there is not a soul living who would now presume to cast an imputation on that unsullied character HIS LORDSHIP has through life supported.

We understand Mr. BALL HUGHES has an interesting French work in the press, which he designates "Un cue de l'hiver"—Anglice, "A Winter's tale."

EFFECTS OF SUPERSTITION.

The following advertisements have appeared in this week's Times:—

"To be Sold, a Child's Caul.—To save gentlemen trouble, price 30*l.* Apply (if by letter, post paid), for A. B. at 15, Craven-buildings, City-road, near the turnpike."

"A Child's Caul, to be Sold, for 15*l.* Apply (if by letter, post paid), at 1, Grosvenor-place, Borough-road."

And, for the satisfaction of purchasers, we subjoin the following admirable ballad on the very subject, from Mr. HOOD's inimitable work of Whims and Oddities:—

THE SEA-SPELL.

"Cauld, cauld, he lies beneath the deep."
Old Scotch Ballad.

It was a jolly mariner!
The tallest man of three,—
He loosed his sail against the wind,
And turned his boat to sea:
The ink-black sky told every eye
A storm was soon to be!

But still that jolly mariner
Took in no reef at all,
For, in his pocket, confidingly,
He wore a baby's caul;
A thing, as gossip-nurses know,
That always brings a squall!

His hat was new, or newly glaz'd,
Shone brightly in the sun;
His jacket, like a mariner's,
True blue as e'er was spun;
His ample trowsers, like Saint Paul,
Bore forty stripes save one.

And now the fretting foaming tide
He steer'd away to cross;
The bounding pinnace play'd a game
Of dreary pitch and toss;
A game that, on the good dry land,
Is apt to bring a loss.

Good Heaven befriend that little boat,
And guide her on her way!
A boat they say, has canvass wings,
But cannot fly away!
Though, like a merry singing bird,
She sits upon the spray!

Still east by east the little boat,
With tawny sail, kept beating:
Now out of sight, between two waves,
Now o'er th' horizon fleeting;
Like greedy swine that feed on mast,—
The waves her mast seem'd eating!

The sullen sky grew black above,
The wave as black beneath:
Each roaring billow show'd full soon
A white and foamy wreath;
Like angry dogs that snarl at first,
And then display their teeth.

The boatman look'd against the wind,
The mast began to creak,
The wave, per saltum, came and dried,
In salt upon his cheek!
The poinied wave against him rear'd,
As if it own'd a pique!

Nor rushing wind, nor gushing wave,
That boatman could alarm.
But still he stood away to sea,
And trusted in his charm;
He thought by purchase he was safe,
And arm'd against all harm!

Now thick and fast and far aslant,
The stormy rain came pouring,
He heard upon the sandy bank,
The distant breakers roaring,—
A groaning intermitting sound,
Like Gog and Magog snoring!

The seafowl shriek'd around the mast,
Ahead the grampus tumbled,
And far off, from a copper cloud,
The hollow thunder rumbled;
It would have quail'd another heart,
But his was never humbled.

For why? he had that infant's caul;
And wherefore should he dread?—
Alas! alas! he little thought,
Before the ebb-tide sped,—
That, like that infant, he should die,
And with a watery head!

The rushing brine flowed in apace;
His boat had ne'er a deck:
Fate seem'd to call him on, and he Attended to her beck;
And so he went, still trusting on,
Though wreckless—to his wreck!

For as he left his helm, to heave
The ballast-bags a-weather,
Three monstrous seas came roaring on,
Like lions leagued together.
The two first waves the little boat
Swam over like a feather,—

The two first waves were past and gone,
And sinking in her wake;
The largest still came leaping on,
And hissing like a snake.
Now helm a-lee! for through the midst,
The monster he must take!

Ah, me! it was a dreary mount!
Its base as black as night,
Its top of pale and livid green,
Its crest of awful white,
Like Neptune with a leprosy,—
And so it rear'd upright!

With quaking sails, the little boat
Climb'd up the foaming heap;
With quaking sails it paused awhile,
At balance on the steep;
Then, rushing down the nether slope,
Plunged with a dizzy sweep!

Look, how a horse, made mad with fear
Disdains his careful guide;
So now the headlong headstreng boat,
Unmanaged, turns aside,
And straight presents her reeling flank
Against the swelling tide!

The gusty wind assaults the sail;
Her ballast lies a-lee!
The windward sheet is taught and stiff;
Oh! the Lively—where is she?
Her capsiz'd keel is in the foam,
Her pennon's in the sea!

The wild gull, sailing overhead,
Three times beheld emerge
The head of that bold mariner,
And then she screamed his dirge!
For he had sunk within his grave,
Lapp'd in a shroud of surge!

The ensuing wave, with horrid foam,
Rushed o'er, and covered all,—
The jolly boatman's drowning scream
Was smothered by the squall.
Heaven never heard his cry, nor did
The ocean heed his caul!

The first Masquerade of the season, at the Argyle Rooms (which affords peculiar facilities for that purpose), takes place on Wednesday. The facetious Mr. Wright provides the wines, which are of the usual excellent quality.

It is with much pleasure we are enabled to confirm the general opinion which prevails as to the satisfactory progress of the Revenue this quarter. It is confidently anticipated that it will exhibit a gratifying comparison with the corresponding quarter of last year.

The mail coach from London to Portsmouth has been for three nights entirely loaded with specie for our troops, &c. in Portugal; no passengers were taken.

GAMBLING IN HIGH LIFE.

Sir,—Although it is peculiarly repugnant to my feelings to permit my name to appear in any correspondence of a controversial nature, still I cannot allow a statement which was published in the Observer of yesterday to pass unnoticed. It is signed "Simon M'Gillivray." On the 14th instant this gentleman addressed a letter to me, in which he states, "Mr. Ellice writes me that he has applied to you to take some public notice of a paragraph in a newspaper of last Sunday, purporting to be an extract of a letter from him to you, and I am induced to take the liberty of inquiring whether it is your intention to do so, and in what manner?" In reply I informed Mr. M'Gillivray that I had not received from Mr. Ellice the letter to which he alluded, nor did I expect any such application from that gentleman, as he was fully aware from my assurances to him, that I never permitted any copy or extract of his letter to be taken or published. I explained to him, in detail, the course which Mr. Ellice took to give complete publicity to his letter to me, which I fully but erroneously supposed would have satisfied him, and prevented all necessity for introducing my name into Mr. M'Gillivray's publication of yesterday. In order to protect myself against the suspicion of having employed Mr. Ellice's letter in a manner contrary to his wishes (the only inference which could be drawn from Mr. M'Gillivray's publication now before me), I think it advisable to state, that on the 27th of November I received the letter in question from Mr. Ellice, containing the report of an opinion given by Messrs. Gurney and Chitty, on a case founded on Mr. Auldjo's statement, which opinion was favourable to the Marquis of Clanricarde and the Earl of Howth; but although Mr. Ellice expressed himself at being able to make such a satisfactory communication to me, still he conceived it necessary to add the following postscript to his letter, which must have precluded me from making any other than a very limited use of it:—"P.S. Of course this letter must not be published in any way, but I can have no objection to your stating the opinion of Mr. Gurney and Mr. Chitty, on my authority, where you think it necessary." On a perusal of this restriction, I felt regret and embarrassment, from which, however, I was speedily relieved, when I ascertained that the very post which brought me this letter conveyed an authentic copy of it from Mr. Ellice to the confidential law-adviser of Lords Clanricarde and Howth, omitting altogether the restrictive postscript, and thus leaving the parties concerned at full liberty to make what use they pleased of it. The natural consequence was, that the most unrestrained publicity was given to this document, hundreds of copies were lithographed, and several were circulated.

I viewed this official communication of the copy of Mr. Ellice's letter as a very considerate expedient on the part of that gentleman to release me from all trouble and responsibility on this delicate subject. I hastened to express my acknowledgments to him for the course which he had adopted, and I frankly apprized him of the use which (in consequence of his own unrestricted communication of the letter to another quarter) had so naturally been made of it, assuring him at the same time that I, at least, had scrupulously adhered to the reserve which he had imposed upon me.

On the 15th instant another letter reached me from Mr. M'Gillivray, in which he remarked—"I must confess my surprise that you have not received any application from Mr. Ellice, because, under date of the 12th instant, he writes me, 'I have written to Mr. Prendergast to desire he will take some public means of contradicting the paragraph in the Sunday Paper, or at least of stating that any extract of our correspondence was not made by his authority.'" Mr. M'Gillivray then adds—"Agreeably to your request, I enclose a copy of the paragraph in question," which, to that moment, I had not even seen. Being particularly anxious that my name should not be dragged before the public on this subject, I sent an immediate reply to this letter. I repeated my assurances that I had not received any application from Mr. Ellice, and that I had never given a copy or an extract of that gentleman's letter to any person; and I enclosed a note from Lord Clanricarde to me, in which his Lordship stated that he had obtained from another source (but not from me) a copy of Mr. Ellice's letter.

With such conclusive explanations before him, it is quite clear that Mr. M'Gillivray could hardly have been so entirely ignorant of the real and only source from which the notoriety given to Mr. Ellice's letter proceeded, as is assumed in his publication of yesterday: the more so, as it is susceptible of proof, that it was through the medium of Mr. M'Gillivray himself that the authentic copy of Mr. Ellice's letter, above referred to, passed into the hands of the legal adviser of Lords Clanricarde and Howth. Respecting that letter, I must take leave to observe, that I stood in the peculiar situation of being the only person precluded from dealing with a document (my exclusive property) with the same degree of freedom as the rest of the world exercised regarding it.

From the foregoing remarks, it is quite evident that to Mr. Ellice and Mr. M'Gillivray belongs the merit of having given to Lords Clanricarde and Howth the unrestrained benefit of Messrs. Gurney's and Chitty's exculpatory opinion, and of having thus enabled them to render it public.

I cannot dismiss this subject without observing, that from the studied and suspicious inaccuracy of the supposed extract from Mr. Ellice's letter which appeared in a Sunday Paper of the 10th instant, and which is again incorporated in Mr. M'Gillivray's publication in the Observer of yesterday, it is quite manifest that the inventor of it could have been actuated by no other than malicious feelings towards the noblemen in question. It could not have been published by any of their Lordships' friends, all of whom (thanks to the communication made by Mr. Ellice and Mr. M'Gillivray) had been put into full and free possession of authentic copies of Mr. Ellice's letter to me; and therefore the fair inference is, that this spurious paragraph was manufactured by some person determined, at all events, to create an opportunity of conveying false and malevolent insinuations to the public.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most faithful and obedient servant,
3, Clarges-street, Dec. 18. M. G. PRENDERGAST.

P. S. I omitted to remark in the above statement, which appears in the Times of this morning, that, although Mr. Ellice's report of Messrs. Gurney's and Chitty's opinion (which I alone am restricted from quoting,) differs in the wording of it from the fabricated extract in the Observer of Sunday last, still the substance of his report is at least as favourable to the noble persons in question, and I will add altogether as "unqualified" in its exculpatory expressions as the contents of the incorrect extract now republished and objected to by Mr. M'Gillivray. Whatever difference exists between the wording of Mr. Ellice's report, and Mr. M'Gillivray's present view of the opinions referred to, I must leave for explanation between those gentlemen—"the friends who originally gave the opinions upon which Mr. Auldjo's proceedings have been founded."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COURIER.

Snettisham, Dec. 21.

Sir,—If any choice had been left to me, I certainly would have declined becoming party to the correspondence which has lately appeared in the Papers, relative to a transaction at private play, now under investigation in the Courts of Justice.

I must, however, set Mr. Prendergast right in some circumstances referred to in his letter in your Paper of the 19th, and add one or two others, which either seem to have escaped his recollection, or not to have been considered by him so material as they appear to me, in the statement he has conceived himself called on to publish.

At the suggestion of Mr. Scarlett, and from feelings which it is most unnecessary to allude to, I wrote to Mr. Prendergast on the 25th of November, to communicate to him, for the information of Lord Clanricarde and his friends, what I understood to be the amount of the opinion of Mr. Gurney and Mr. Chitty, respecting his Lordship's participation in this transaction.

I added a postscript to that letter, prohibiting its publication. A copy was sent by the same post to Mr. Scarlett, to which, by accident, it appears the postscript was omitted.

On the receipt of the letter, (on the 27th) Mr. Prendergast called upon Mr. Scarlett, to consult him how it could be made use of, without infringing the restriction as to publication.

After their conference, and on the same day (the 27th) Mr. Prendergast wrote to me, suggesting some alteration in the terms of my communication, and requesting I would withdraw the postscript. I answered his letter, and wrote to Mr. Scarlett on the 29th, positively refusing to vary the terms of the original communication, or to withdraw the restriction on its publication, stating to both my reasons for this determination.

On the 30th, Mr. Prendergast informs me, in reply to my second letter of the 29th, that as "I had considerately communicated the opinions of Mr. Gurney and Mr. Chitty to Lord Clanricarde's legal adviser, without restriction, it exempted him from the necessity of making any further use of my letter, than to authenticate the correctness of the copy sent to Mr. Scarlett." He repeats this almost in the same words in his letter in your Paper of the 19th.

Now, Sir, it may surprise your readers, when I assure them, that the only communication made by me of these opinions to Lord Clanricarde's friends, are the letters I have adverted to. If Mr. Prendergast was of opinion, the copy of the letter of the 25th, sent to Mr. Scarlett, and more especially after their conference on comparing the copies, was an unrestricted communication, why write to me on the 27th to request I would amend that letter and withdraw the restriction? He did not, at all events, express such an opinion to me, till he had received my refusal to accede to his request, and if he previously entertained it, he might have saved me the trouble (and I do assure him all he could save me in this wretched affair would be charity) of the subsequent correspondence. After these remarks, drawn from me, by what I must call not the over-courteous manner in which Mr. Prendergast has adverted to our correspondence in the newspapers, I am quite ready to state publicly, what I have before written privately, to Mr. Prendergast, that I do not blame him for any publication that has appeared. I did not ask him to disavow being a party to it, because I knew he had, on the contrary, done all in his power to prevent it.

But indeed, much more importance is attached to this publication by others than by myself. Mr. Scarlett, I believe, from the confidential intercourse that subsisted between us, considered he might exercise some discretion with respect to the copy of my letter of the 25th, in his hands, before an answer could be received to Mr. Prendergast's of the 27th. He gave it to Lord Clanricarde, or one of his near connexions, and an extract from it was (as I understand) attached to a statement his Lordship thought it expedient to circulate, in vindication of his conduct. An incorrect copy of this extract has found its way into the papers, prompted, I have no doubt, by the zeal, rather than the discretion, of some of his Lordship's friends.

My objections to the publication of the letter, or any extract from it, were an anxiety that my name should not be mixed up, in any way, with this transaction—that I was not authorized to give publicity to opinions of Counsel without their permission, or that of their clients, and that I wished no inference to be drawn from my signature to such a document, as to my own opinion of the conduct of any of the individuals unfortunately concerned in the transaction.

I will not permit myself to make one remark on the other statements that have been published. The trials now pending will determine the character of the transaction, and thoroughly sift all the circumstances of grave and singular suspicion imputed to it by Mr. Auldjo. On his statement, with other information as to some of the circumstances contained in it; and, with some knowledge of his previous conduct and character, I had no hesitation in concurring in the advice given to him, to resist payment of the money he had lost, and to place the affair in the hands of his legal adviser for investigation; since which, I have neither been consulted upon, nor interfered, directly or indirectly (except as stated in this letter), in the proceedings that have been instituted, but which, it appears have been advised and sanctioned by the eminent Counsel whose names have been so often referred to.

It is scarcely necessary I should add, that I have neither been party or privy to any paragraph, letter, or publication, that has heretofore appeared in the newspapers on this subject.

I am, Sir, your most obedient and humble Servant,
EDWARD ELLICE.

Lieut.-General Clinton, who has been appointed to the command of the British army, left town on Monday night for Portugal. A wagon, containing the gallant General's luggage, left his house, Queen Ann-street, Cavendish-square, at four o'clock yesterday, for Portsmouth.

Orders have been received at Pembroke Dock-yard to lose no time in completing such ships as are now building at that place, and to commence building two three-deckers of the largest size. 1,000 convicts are shortly expected to be employed upon the works, and barracks are forthwith to be erected, either for a battalion of Marines, or a portion of the 23d Regiment of Royal Welsh Fusileers.

Lord Grosvenor is building a picture-gallery behind his mansion in Grosvenor-street, which, when finished, it is said, will be the noblest gallery in the kingdom.

Barnard the Player.—This unfortunate man has at length found an asylum, and in justice to the humanity of certain members of the profession, we are happy to observe, that the poor man, whose decay of mind has rendered him useless to the theatre, and had gradually sunk him to a state of the most abject penury, has been, under the advice of Dr. Haslam, and a committee of his brother actors, consigned to a private asylum of lunatics, at Hoxton, where he will have every attention which his unfortunate situation demands. The committee have agreed that he shall have a weekly inspecting visit from each of his old colleagues. The Secretary of the Theatrical Fund, assisted by a committee, has been enabled to accomplish this object.

Athlone, Dec. 12.—An attack was made last night on the house of Craggan, the seat of George Longworth, Esq., at the hour of six o'clock, just as the family were at dinner; they entered the rear of the house, and secured the servants; they then proceeded to the dining-room. On hearing their approach, Mr. Longworth, jun. ran to the door, when he received a stab from a bayonet in the arm, another in the head, and a third in his body, which entered his shoulder, and came out at his breast. Mr. Longworth, notwithstanding those desperate wounds, rushed to a room, where he procured a dagger, with which he killed one of the villains on the spot, on which the rest precipitately retreated. The servants being still in confinement, Mr. L. himself went to the stable, saddled his horse, rode into Athlone, and now lies at the doctor's dangerously ill. An inquest was held this day on the man who was killed. On examining his body, the sign of a cross was observed on the back of his right hand!!!—The unfortunate woman who was compelled to eat the soap, for purchasing it from a Protestant, died on Thursday last.—Westmeath Journal.

The additional buildings which are attached to the Royal Cottage in Windsor Park, were originally intended for the accommodation of Sir Benjamin Bloomfield. Since the secession of the worthy Baronet, part of them are occupied by his successor, Sir Wm. Knighton; and the apartment to the right, on the entrance, is converted into a library, which is filled with useful and entertaining books. A very large portion of them are in French.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. Newman, the broker, mentioned in our last paper as having forged a stock receipt for 4000l. put an end to his existence on the morning of Saturday se'nnight, in a field behind his house at Hampstead, by shooting himself through the head with a pistol. He was most respectably connected, and a distant relation, we believe of the late Mr. Alderman Newman. Till a very short period before the fatal event, he was considered very successful in business, and a few months back could have retired with a handsome fortune. The intelligence that the forgery was discovered was conveyed to him on Friday evening by a friend, who found him entertaining a large party at dinner, to celebrate the anniversary of his marriage; and Mr. Newman, at the moment he entered, was in a high state of convivial enjoyment. On hearing what had occurred, and that there could be no safety for him, save in speedy flight, he betrayed no particular emotion, but invited the friend who called on him to join the party assembled. On the following morning, at an early hour, he slipped unperceived out of the house, in his dressing-gown, and proceeding to the field beyond his garden, there committed the fatal act. His family had no apprehension of what had occurred, but on missing him, search was made after him, and persons were sent to town to learn if he had attended his office. The body was not discovered till Sunday afternoon. It is said that he entertained the intention of replacing the stock on the following day, had not the discovery been made.

The late Marquis of Hastings.—Naples, Nov. 29.—"Arrangements having been made on board the Revenge, for receiving the Marquis of Hastings and family on board, by the officers giving up the ward-room and the cabin in it—he was, on the 20th, brought down from the Palace at Malta to the shore in a sofa arranged for that purpose, and put into the Admiral's barge, and towed alongside—to prevent the noise of the oars in the boat in which he was; he was hoisted in, and carried to the cabin in the ward-room quite safely, and at day-light next morning the Revenge went to sea; he was in such a weak state when brought on board, that it was quite wonderful his surviving one hour after the other. He was removed from Malta quite against the opinion of all the medical men. The ship had, fortunately, a very quick and very quiet passage, being only three days; but, on the arrival of the Revenge, he was so ill that it was found impossible to move him—therefore, the ship remained at Baia Bay, to take advantage of the smooth water—the Admiral, as usual, doing every thing he could, and putting himself to many inconveniences. The Marquis lingered in the most melancholy state, showing the greatest firmness and resignation I ever heard of; and on the 23d, at about eleven at night, he breathed his last, surrounded by his unhappy wife and four daughters. His son is not here, but is expected every hour. So well was he convinced that his time was close at hand, that he took leave of his children several days before his death, and told his medical man not to give him any thing to prevent the event taking place at once, as he was sure nothing would save him. In this nobleman's death, a wife has lost the best of husbands, children the best of fathers, and I think, if possible, poor Malta has lost even more—the good he has done, and what he had planned to do for that island, requires a much more able pen than mine to explain. It may be most truly said, that the Maltese have lost the best friend and protector they ever had. Another letter, from an officer of the Revenge, states the following remarkable request of the illustrious deceased:—"The late Marquis of Hastings, in a letter found amongst his papers after his death, requested that on his decease, his right hand might be cut off, and preserved until the death of the Marchioness, when it was to be interred in the same coffin with her Ladyship! In pursuance of his direction, the hand has been amputated."

On Friday was paid over to the Consolidated Fund, the sum of 9,4671. 5s. 9d. the contribution to the public service of the Marquis Camden for the present year. The sum received by the public since July, 1817, when Lord Camden made this sacrifice of private emolument, is 86,8171. 13s. 10d. His Lordship's contribution during the war amounted to 43,4571. 7s. 7d.: in the whole, to 150,275l. 1s. 6d.

Desperate Affray with Poachers.—On Monday night, about 11 o'clock, one of the keepers at Heydon-hall, Norfolk, with one of his assistants, were watching, when they came upon several poachers, who immediately pursued them. To this keeper the poachers had more than once vowed destruction, and in the course of the chase often repeated their intention; fortunately he was a fast runner, and got to a farm-house, where he hid himself for shelter. His companion was, however, overtaken by them, and most cruelly beaten. The poachers then went to the house where they supposed the man to be hidden, called up the farmer, and searched the premises in vain. After they were gone, the keeper sallied out, and made his way to the hall, where he gave the alarm, and about 20 servants were immediately assembled, who went out, accompanied by the Hon. Mr. Edwardes, the son of Lord Kensington, who headed them. Upon their coming up, the poachers ran away, and were pursued by the watch across some fields towards a meadow. The poachers, on jumping over the hedge, stopped a few yards off. The watch were following, when Mr. Edwardes, who had sprung upon, and was in the act of jumping down the hedge, received a stunning blow on the face by a large stone, and, as he reeled from the blow, one of the poachers shot at and desperately wounded him in the arm and on the side. The gamekeeper immediately fired both his barrels at the fellow, who fell, apparently dead, or most desperately wounded—he dropped on the discharge as if his strength had left all his limbs. The two charges are supposed to have taken effect, one upon the lower part of the neck, and the other in the body. Two or three guns were immediately fired by the poachers almost the instant following, and wounded five more persons; one had part of his ear shot off, another his face badly lacerated, and the other three shot in a lesser degree. The poachers then dragged their man out of the ditch into which he had fallen, and carried him away: The watch left them, being anxious to take off their wounded. Mr. E. Lytton Bulwer, who was visiting at Heyden, and several gentlemen, immediately commenced a pursuit of the poachers on horseback. The blood from the wounded poacher was traced to a long distance as far as Cawston Woodrow, when the track was lost, as the men, appeared to have walked on the turf. They were seen at Booton by a person, and about six in the morning a large party were also observed, as if making their way to this city or the adjacent villages. An application was made at Bow-street on Thursday, and an officer despatched to endeavour to apprehend the ringleaders

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

We received yesterday evening, by express, the French Papers of Thursday. The speech of the Minister for Foreign Affairs (which will be found in another column), is given in the Etoile of Friday's date, and with this exception it contains little of importance to the English reader. Its feeling is shown by copious translations from English papers—especially those which tend to show the unity of action of the French and English Cabinets on the subject of Portugal, and accounts of the movements and embarkations of our troops.

[From the Etoile dated Friday.]

The Nuremberg Correspondent announces that, in consequence of the intervention of the Ambassador of a great Power, orders have been sent to the Austrian fortress of Mongatoch, to grant to Prince Ipsilanti, if he is still destined there, all the liberty compatible with his situation as prisonar of State. It is even said that he is te be allowed the pleasurns of the chase, on the guarantee of his word of honour that he will not pass certain prescribed bounds. This conduct is considered as the forcrunner of the entire liberation of this Prince. The same Journal says, that since the return of Lord Clanwilliam, the English Ambassador, from Berlin, there have been frequent conferences between him and M. de Bernstorff. Several couriers had set out from the Office of Foreign Affairs, on different destinations, wita dispatches, which are thought to be connected with the affairs of Greece.

They write from the frontiers of Moldavia, under the date of the 2d December—"Travellers who arrive from the interior of Moldavia relate that the two Commissioners of the Porte, Hadi and Ibrahim Effendi, would not, on their return to Ackerman, receive the Hospodar Prince Ghika, who wished to pay them a visit. It was hence concluded that he had displeased the Sultan, and that he would be speedily deposed."

The great Russian ship of 900 tons, which has been for some months past in the Basin at Havre, has just been purchased on account of the Government of Hayti, and is, it is said, to be employed in the transport of the coffee destined by that Republic in payment of the debt to France. It is estimated that it will carry 8,000 bags of coffee, and that the profit of freight will repay the purchase and fitting out, in three voyages.

CHAMBER OF PEERS—SITTING OF THE 5TH.

The President of the Chamber of Deputies at this sitting delivered in the resolution of his Chamber, on the proposal which had been made by the Minister of Justice, to suspend the Habeas Corpus. The Marquis of Alegrete stated the urgent necessity of forming a Commission of War, and another of Foreign Affairs, as well as a Commission of Petitions.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.—SITTING OF THE 5TH.

The order of the day, on the discussion of the laws relative to the Gardes de Surete, Article 9, provides, that in the Cities of Lisbon and Oporto each battalion shall be commanded by a Lieut.-Colonel Major, and Adjutant.—Article 10. In towns of smaller population, companies shall be composed, consisting of fifteen men at the least, and not exceeding fifty-two.—Article 11. The uniform, arms, and equipment of the foot-guards shall be the same as those of the chasseurs of the army, and those of the horse-guards after the model of the light cavalry; none but national cloths shall be used.—Article 12. During the first three months, there shall be a review every Sunday of the Gardes de Surete; they shall not be permitted to go more than one league from their residence.—Article 13 prescribes the form of oath which they are to take, in the following terms:—"I swear to be inviolably faithful to the Apostolical Roman Catholic Religion, to the King, to the Nation, and to the Constitutional Charter."

Upon the motion of M. Barroza, the Chamber decreed that the Commandants of Provinces may suspend the organization of the Gardes de Surete in suspected places. The articles which follow relate to discipline. The 18th article authorizes the Gardes de Surete to arrest and hand over to the competent authorities any individual uttering seditious cries, or circulating inflammatory works.

BERLIN, DEC. 15.—This morning, as his Majesty was quitting his cabinet at the usual hour, he had the misfortune to fall in such a way that the right leg bent under the left, and the result was the fracture of both bones, about three inches above the ancle.—Shortly afterwards Doctor Wieble adopted the customary means of setting the limb; Doctors Grafe and Ufland then arrived, and these three physicians, in order to tranquillize the public mind, have made the following reports:—

First Report—"His Majesty, in proceeding to his accustomed occupations, has had the misfortune to fall down a staircase which leads to his cabinet; the result has been a fracture of both bones of the right leg; the situation of his Majesty is not such as to justify any uneasiness."

Second Report, six o'clock—"Nothing alarming has taken place; his Majesty is tranquil and calm; there is nothing remarkable in the case of his Majesty; a slight fever, as is usual in similar cases, has come on, which, however, excites no apprehension."

The Duke of Wellington is to be Constable of the Tower, in the room of the late Marquis of Hastings, and his Grace resigns the government of Plymouth.

In the Arches Court, Doctors' Commons, on Wednesday, the arguments in the case of "Westmeath v. Westmeath," for divorce, the facts of which have been so often before the public, were concluded; and the Principal, Sir John Nicholl, deferred judgment till next term.

The health of the Lord Chancellor is so much restored, that he has issued notice that immediately after the holidays he will sit to hear lunatic and bankrupt petitions at Lincoln's-inn Hall.

THE ARMAMENT FOR PORTUGAL.—PORTSMOUTH, SUNDAY AFTERNOON.—An Admiralty messenger arrived this morning from London, with despatches for Sir George Martin to despatch the Romney and Pyramus, with the 4th Regiment on board, to sea, without a moment's delay; also to send a small vessel out, to cruise off the Owers, to prevent the Glocester from coming into Spithead, but to direct her to proceed on without delay; she has the Guards on board, from Deptford. The 1st division of the 63d arrived yesterday afternoon, and instantly embarked on board the Melville, which ship was towed out of harbour yesterday morning by two steam-boats. The 2d division of the 63d arrived this afternoon, and immediately embarked on board the Melville, which ship, no doubt, will proceed to-morrow, not to wait for others, as the wind, which is now fair, may change in a short time, and be the means of the whole force being delayed. The 4th embarked on Thursday in the Romney and Pyramus, and only sailed this morning, owing to contrary wind.

A Further proof of the excellency of SPILSBURY'S PATENT ANTISCORBUTIC DROPS, after more than fifty years' established reputation, by the case of Thomas Ralt, No. 17, Gedling-street, Bermondsey, of a most violent Scrophula, which had resisted the effects of other medicine, till at length being recommended to try the Drops, which, by taking of the same regularly, according to the printed directions, he experienced a perfect cure. This valuable Medicine is prepared and sold 15, Soho-square, in Bottles, 6s. and 10s. 6d. and 1l. 2s.; likewise sold by Messrs. Sutton's, Bow Churchyard; Newberry's Edwards', St. Paul's; Butlers, Cheapside, and 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh, 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Barclay's, Fleet Market; and all country venders.—The Treatise by the late F. Spilsbury on Scurvy, Gout, and Diet, 4s. 6d.

AT SIMPSON'S MEDICINE WAREHOUSE, No. 28, Henrietta-street, Covent-Garden, London, are sold
The ARABIAN VEGETABLE PILLS, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per Box, free from mercury or antimony, inestimable as a Family Medicine for the removal of Indigestion, Bilious and Nervous Complaints, and as a mild Aperient.
The ROYAL ELIXIR of LIFE, in Bottles of 11s. each, strengthens the Stomach, increases the Appetite, dispels Spasms and Gout in the Stomach, and prevents all the inconveniences produced by excess at table.
The ANTISEPTIC BOTANICAL TOOTH-POWDER, 2s. 9d. per Box, cleanses, whitens, and preserves the Teeth, and fastens them, even if loosened by mercury.
These articles are sold (by appointment) at all respectable Medicine Venders, Chemists, and Druggists, throughout the kingdom.
Superior Eau de Cologne and Swiss Eau d'Arquebusade, Mason's Convent Soap, &c. &c.

HORSES.—WORM and CONDITION BALLS. They will effectually destroy every species of Worm to which Horses are subject, without requiring any alteration in Food or cessation from Labour. If these Balls be given two or three times a year, they supersede the use of other Medicines, as they not only improve the health and vigour of the Animal, but also purify the blood and materially add to the glossy appearance of the coat. The Proprietor, who is known as having himself kept a numerous Stud, has used them for Thirty Years with the most satisfactory results. They only require a trial to prove their efficacy. References can be given—Sold in Packets at 9s. containing Nine Balls, with Directions for Use, by Courtney, Regent Circus, Oxford-street; Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Smith, 29, Haymarket; Prout, 226, Strand; Butler, corner of St. Paul's Church-yard; and Wilmott, 83, St. Margaret's Hill, Borough.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which fire opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 209, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 1l., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

SILK and BEAVER HATS.—At a time like the present, it behoves the most opulent to act economically in the purchase of a HAT, particularly when all the vehicles of advertisements teem with pretended Cheap Goods! a name only, for one half of the Hats offered to public notice are in the end the dearest of all others. To purchase a good article, bearing a small profit, is the safe road to economy.
PERRING'S HATS are manufactured by workmen experienced in the trade, and are made of such qualities as cannot fail to meet the wishes of the wearer.
The Double-edged SILK HAT surpasses any attempt at imitation, and is really the best Hat ever invented, price 17s. Good Wearing Silk Hats in a variety of Shapes, made in the usual way, 12s. 15s.
BEAVER HATS can be made at almost any Price, but none are worthy the attention of the Wearer under 20s. 22s. 24s. such are of good texture, light, and Waterproof, and will in the end prove in value equal to the purchase.
GENTLEMEN'S TRAVELLING CAPS of every description, in Furs, Cloth, Oil, Silk, &c. &c. at 12s. Waterproof.
YOUTHS' and BOYS' HATS in great variety. Light Summer Hats, &c. 413, Strand, two doors west of the Adelphi Theatre, and at Hammersmith.

MOST URGENT CASE OF DISTRESS.

APPEAL to the Benevolent and Generous Feelings of the British Public, from a Young and Respectable Couple, with a Family of Three small Children, which have together been driven to the last extreme of want and distress by the Arrest of the Husband, on whose personal exertions, in an occupation connected with Newspapers, was their only and entire reliance for support. The sum for which the Husband is in custody is only £12 10s. (the amount of an acceptance). Such is their utterly destitute state, that every means has been exhausted by which a meal could be procured for their three helpless children. The last resource of the unfortunate (that of pledging apparel, &c. at less than one-eighth of its value), is no longer in their power. Under these circumstances of absolute want, the present application is made, in humble reliance on that charitable sympathy with which the British Public have ever been found ready to relieve the really distressed—no other means in the present case being available to prevent the Wife and Children seeking refuge in a Workhouse, or of procuring the personal liberty of one who has ever been willing to earn a subsistence by honourable industry. The smallest Donation will be thankfully acknowledged.

Subscriptions will be received by Mr. Adams, 2, Somerset-place, Kennington Common; Mr. Goetz, 8, Wardour-street, Soho; Mr. Templeman, Newsvender, near Percy-street, Tottenham-court-road; Mr. Anderson, Bookseller, 50, West Smithfield; and at the Office of this Paper.

BRANDY equal to Cognac at 16s. per Imperial Gallon.

THE extensive demand for Spirits at the present season, induces the Directors of the FRENCH BRANDY DISTILLERY COMPANY to remind the Public, that they are selling Brandy, equal to Cognac, in quantities not less than Two Gallons, at 16s. per Gallon, for Cash on delivery.
As many persons have experienced great inconvenience by delay in the execution of their orders, and it being impossible to expedite them all with the dispatch desirable, it is necessary to observe, that Families requiring an immediate supply can only insure the same by sending for it direct to the Distillery.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.
Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.
Warehouse, 107, Strand, corner of the Savoy Steps.—The Original Fish-Sauce Warehouse.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale under the title of
"MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."
C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.
C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will he found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is strongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.
To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

SORE THROATS, HOARSENESS, &c.

BUTLER'S ACIDULATED CAYENNE LOZENGES, are particularly recommended for habitual sore Throats; relaxation of the Uvula; enlargement of the Tonsils, and that description of hoarseness which arises from relaxation of the membranes of the Throat, and the parts contiguous.
The Cayenne Lozenge has been found of great utility to such Persons as are frequently in the habit of speaking in Public; they may therefore advantageously be used in the Senate, at the Bar, and in the Pulpit, and the highest testimony in the Musical World has been advanced in their favour, especially in those cases, where, from the constant use of the voice, or the influence of a humid atmosphere, the membranes have become relaxed, and diminished in their tone.
These Lozenges are also recommended as a stimulus, during Field Sports; they are refreshing, and prevent sore Throats, Hoarseness, &c. to those who are unaccustomed to exposure in the morning, before the dew has passed off, and in the moist and foggy evenings.
Sold in Boxes, at 2s. and 4s. 6d. by Messrs. BUTLER, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Wilmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom, where may be had BUTLER'S ANTIACID LOZENGES of QUININE, for relieving Heartburn, Flatulence, Indigestion, Gouty Affections, and giving tone to the Stomach. In Boxes at 2s. and 4s. 6d.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhea, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases, together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.
Principiis obsta; sero medicina paratur.
By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author: Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.
"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add, as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

N.B. Be careful to ask for Butler's Pectoral Elixir.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

Private letters received on Thursday contains the important intelligence of the submission of Spain to the terms of the English ultimatum. Though this result might reasonably have been expected, backed as the remonstrance was by the earnest co-operation of France, and the cordial sanction of the other great Powers, yet with a Government like that of Spain, whose conduct has repeatedly baffled all calculation, this acquaintance was by no means certain. The subject is alluded to in the Etoile, though not in such explicit terms

PARIS, DEC. 26.—I have twice or thrice mentioned to you that England had transmitted to Spain certain conditions on which, as the ally of Portugal, she would consent to abstain from hostilities against Spain, either by a direct attack on her commerce and territory, or by facilitating the return of the Constitutional exiles, to endanger her internal repose. This ultimatum was cordially supported by the French Government, which threatened to withdraw the French troops from Madrid if Ferdinand refused compliance. I have now the power of announcing that the most important of these conditions have been agreed to. The Camarilla, if not entirely changed, has submitted to acknowledge the Portuguese Charter, and to renew diplomatic relations immediately with Lisbon. An Ambassador will be forthwith sent to the Princess Regent of Portugal, to announce this change of system, and a Portuguese Envoy is to be received with all due honour at Madrid. With regard to the recall or punishment of the obnoxious and intriguing Captains-General, I have not heard any positive information; and the final change of Ministry (which has partially taken place) only awaits the finding of proper successors.

The measures may now be adopted too late to repair the evil already done, but they are as decisive as could be expected.

The Chamber of Deputies has been in a secret sitting on the Address,

The Freneh Ministry expect that the arrival of English troops will soon extinguish the rebellion in Portugal.

The following is a copy of the speech of Hyde de Neuville, one of the ultra :—

" I demand that the Commissioner, who shall be appointed to concur in drawing up the answer to the Speech from the Throne, be specially directed to insist, that with all due regard to Parliamentary decorum, the answer of the Chamber shall be such as may raise our national dignity, which has been outraged by the arrogant and ridiculous philippic of Mr. Canning, and by the incredible speech which has been forced upon our Minister for Foreign Affairs. It is necessary that England should know, that if we have any burden, we have not any manner of need of assistance to relieve us of it. It is necessary that Mr. Canning should know, that we wish for peace—that we will endeavour to maintain peace,—but that we do not fear war; and that, in short, there are no longer any malcontents among us when a question arises of avenging the honour of the country. Honour is a standard which will always in France produce a union of all opinions.

" Convinced that every man who is a friend of the glory of the Bourbons—that every man who is a friend of legitimacy, of the Charter, and of national liberties—that every man, in short, who has pride, who has honour in his heart, and French blood in his veins, cannot but think as I do, I confidently submit to the bureau of the committee a proposition dictated by grief and patriotism."

LISBON, DEC. 13.

CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.—SITTING OF THE 9TH.

M. Barrozo read the project of law for arming the students of Coimbra.—Adopted with slight amendments.

After reading the project of organization of the Guards of Security, M. Guerreiro rises, and submits the proposition, to authorize the Government to arm regiments, and employ all foreign soldiers whatever who have taken refuge in Portugal.—They should preserve the same organization that they had in their respective countries.—This proposition is sent to the committee charged with making a report on that of the same sort made by the Baron de Quintella.

The Committee of Finances reported respecting the plan submitted to the Chamber by the Minister, to cover the deficit. The loan proposed would be 2,000 Contos de reis, at 5 per cent. interest, with a sinking fund of 1 per cent.—The opening of this loan authorized.

SITTING OF THE 11TH.

A report was expected on the project of law relative to the Portuguese emigrants; but the sitting confined itself to the adopting some articles of the regulation.

SITTING OF THE 12TH.

The discussion of the regulation is resumed.

A Secretary reads the Message of the Minister of War, who, agreeably to the orders of the Princess Regent, proposed to decree that the wives and daughters of the soldiers who have, or should be killed in the deplorable war stirred up by rebels, shall continue to receive their pay on the peace footing; this disposition being applicable to the subaltern officers of the second and third lines, as if they were of the first.

The urgency is decreed, and the report fixed for the following sitting.

Don Franciseo Manuel Trigozo de Maguo Morato announces that the Princess Regent has named him Councillor of State for life.

M. Cordeiro demands that the new Councillor of State shall no longer continue to sit in the Chamber of Deputies.

MINISTRY OF WAR.

The Count de Taypa, who quitted his seat in the Chamber of Peers, to fight under the orders of the Count de Villaflor, has distinguished himself already in a charge of cavalry. General Azeredo, in a despatch (in arrear), writes from Torridello, that in consequence of the insurrection which has broken out at Lamego, at the instigation of Col. Mallo-Pitta-Ozorio, revolt has manifested itself also at Viseu. Francozo remained faithful, notwithstanding the revolt of some militia.

Count Alva has transmitted to the Princess Regent, letters written to him by the Captain-General of Andalusia, and the Governor of Ayamonte, announcing that, agreeably to the orders of their Government, they are ready to deliver to him the arms and equipments belonging to the deserters of the 14th Regiment of Portuguese Infantry and the 4th of Chasseurs. The Count Alva has named two officers to receive these objects.

The Commandant of Lower Beira writes from Castel Branco, that the rebels have appeared in force on that frontier, in the neighbourhood of Valverde and Penamalor. Every effort will be made to repulse them.

The Commandant of Upper Beira informs the Ministry that the ex-Lieutenant-Colonel of the Regiment of Francozo has entered at Castel-Rodrigo, where he maltreated the Judge of Fora, pillaged the public chest, and set free the prisoners. From thence he took the direction of Almendra. The revolt broke out at Villa-Nova de Faz-era. It was repressed by a detachment of the 6th Infantry.

Don Antonio d'Azevedo, Governor of Abrantes, writes of the date of the 4th, that he hastens to put that place in a state of defence.

The rebels of Algarve passed the Guadiana the 7th, and took the direction of Terena. They afterwards made a flank march on Saint Antonio de Terruge, in the direction of Monforte.

POLICE ORDINANCE.

Don Rodrigues de Bastos, Intendant-General of the Police of the Kingdom, caused to be posted up, on the 12th, the following ordinance:—

" Considering the abuse which has recently been made of assemblages, and the necessity of renewing the ancient laws for the maintenance of the public tranquillity, incessantly compromised by the heat of parties, it is ordered as follows :—

" Every popular meeting or assemblage in the streets or places of the capital, or any other towns, which has not for its object a market or religious ceremony, is rigorously prohibited, both by night and by day.

" The civic rounds and military patrols shall disperse these assemblages. Every individual resisting shall be arrested, and punished according to the rigour of the laws.

" Every individual, who either within or without the assemblages, shall insult or provoke other persons, on account of the difference of opinions, shall be seized and delivered over to justice.

" The Constitutional Government is a Government of order, moderation, and equity; its only enemies are not those who attack it with arms in their hands, but also all those who, declaring themselves its frenzied detractors, or its most zealous defenders, cause suspicion and distrust, and destroy the union which is so desirable in great crises."

The Marquis de Chaves, who is leading the rebel army, or rather the rebel banditti, in the north-east of Portugal, is of the Silveira family—one of the richest, if not the richest family in Portugal. He is supposed to have acquired an immense addition to his fortune out of the contracts for supplying the British troops in Portugal, during the late war, with mules and provisions.—What at this moment renders him so extremely wealthy is, that his estates lie in Old Portugal, and particularly about Chaves, where he is carrying on the war, whilst most of the Portuguese Nobility, having had a part of their property in the Brazils, have been impoverished by the separation of the two countries. His present command of money seems to be unbounded, and his connexion with the Jews, the most numerous and wealthy of the ready money classes of Portugal, is extraordinary. But Jews will not, of course, advance money except upon security, and as the Marquis's estates have been confiscated by the Government for his present conduct, his Israelitish supporters must either be very deep in the secret, and have a great confidence in the cause, or the Marquis must be able to give them better security than that of his landed property between the Minho and the Douro. It is certain that this rebel has an exchequer at his command; for he pays his soldiers, and induces the peasantry to join him, by pay and bounty of no ordinary amount. The wandering monks and priests, that are traversing the country like fiends of mischief, and exciting the superstitious poor to rise in support of Church and King, are munificently supplied with money by the Marquis. Antonio de Silveira, brother of the Marquis, has for some time been at Rome and Madrid, from whence he may have brought a supply of cash, and of bulls and plenary indulgences, to aid the cause of the rebels. He is now in Spain, on the northern frontier of Portugal, aiding and abetting his more active brother. It was supposed to have been his plan to fall upon Chaves, whilst the Marquis attacked Braganza; but finding the town defended by the liberal party, he remained quiet within the Spanish frontier. His brother, the Marquis, used to be a great favourite with the Queen-Mother of Portugal, who, at the commencement of the rebellion, attempted, it is said, to escape from her keepers, in order to put herself at the head of the rebel army. A crazy, diminutive old woman, at the head of the Army of the Faith, would have been a singular spectacle. But the Marquis de Chaves was also a personal friend of the bull-fighting Don Miguel, who is kept in a sort of honourable surveillance at Vienna, and having unwillingly resigned his crown to his brother Don Pedro, he is determined to try and regain it by the agency of such men as the Marquis de Chaves. We believe that this rebel Marquis is very well known to the Duke of Wellington and Marshal Beresford, who, it is hoped, will prevent his doing any mischief in future.

FRENCH PAPERS LAST RECEIVED.

(From the Etoile of Friday, Dec. 29.)

PARIS, DEC. 28.— If we may believe the reports that are spread out of the Chamber, respecting what passed in the secret committee, the following is the substance of it :—

It is said, that in the secret committee yesterday, M. de Bouville ascended the tribune, and spoke against the address, and against the intervention of England in the affairs of Portugal.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs ascended the tribune to declare that there existed no treaty between England and France, except a convention respecting navigation, entirely foreign to present events, which is advantageous to both countries, and that this is the only public act which has been concluded.

His Excellency said that England, with the consent of all the Powers, had taken upon itself to put down the enterprise of the Spanish revolutionists assembled in Portugal. He concluded by saying, that the events now passing, furnished no pretext for France to make war upon England.

M. de Labourdonnaye followed the Baron de Damas in the tribune.

The Minister of Finance asked the adversaries of the address if they thought that the Ministry could incur the blame of the nation for not having taken the lead in the affairs of Portugal, of which, added the Minister, we are not the allies, but to which England is bound by treaties in a particular manner. His Excellency is said to have added, that the allies of France were all the powers of the continent, and that if any power attempted mal a propos, and without reason, to disturb the general peace which Europe enjoys, all the others would join to repress such an enterprize.

M. de Lezardiere, and M. de Beaulieu spoke after the Minister of Finance.

After these two speeches the close of the general debate was resolved on.

The Chamber then proceeded to the discussion of the paragraphs.

The 1st paragraph was adopted without a debate.

The 2d relative to the military code was adopted with a slight modification.

The 3d relative to the press passed.

The 4th, 5th, and 6th, were also adopted.

At half-past five o'clock only the last paragraph remained to be voted.

In the Secret Committee of this day the discussion of the last paragraph continued. The address voted will be presented to the King by the great deputation this evening at eight o'clock.

PARIS, DEC. 28.—It is affirmed that instructions have been sent to the Baron D'Ollenfells, the Imperial Internuncio at Constantinople, to take an active part in the negotiations carrying on with the Divan by the Ambassadors of France and England, relative to the affairs of Greece. The most important preliminary is the cessation of hostilities between the Turks and the Greeks, and it is believed, that this is a point agreed upon.

LIES OF THE DAY.

(From the Constitutionnel.)

The Apostolics of France have borne part of the expense of the expedition of the Marquis de Chaves.

(The Constitutionnel again.)

An extraordinary courier has arrived during the night at Paris, bringing the positive news that the ultimatum of England has been accepted by the Spanish Cabinet.*

PARIS, DEC. 27.

It is said, that in the Secret Committee to-day, the Minister of Foreign Affairs ascended the tribune to add some details to the statement which he had made in the Chamber of Peers. He endeavoured to show that on the occasion of the charter given by Don Pedro, France had done what it ought to do as well towards Spain as towards Portugal. He acknowledged the right of England to recover her allies, but he declared that France has not abandoned Spain, and that if the King has thought fit to recal his Ambassador, the legation has remained at Madrid, and will not refuse to Spain either its council or its aid.

It seems that M. de la Bourdonnaye followed the Minister for Foreign Affairs. His speech, in which ideas of the most elevated policy were observed, made a strong impression on the assembly. He proved, that the object of England is not to command a part of the Peninsula, but the whole of it. To give to England the means of thus increasing its power, is running into our own ruin —for England looks upon the debasement of France as a necessity; as a condition of its own existence.

M. de la Bourdonnaye also examined the character of our alliance with England. The enemies whom we are called upon to combat are the most faithful friends of John VI., that wise monarch who desired the independence of its people. The friends whom we are called upon to support are those same revolutionists who, for several years past, have threatened all thrones, and have made unhappy attempts in Italy and Spain.

M. de Villele followed M. de Bourdonnaye, and declared that France had no war to make as long as things remained in their present state.

The Chamber then heard successively Messrs. de Bouville, Lizardiere, de Martignac, Hyde de Neuville, Mechin, and Casimir Perier. It seems that the general discussion was closed, and that the Chamber proceeded to that of the paragraphs. The first was adopted without difficulty; the second with a slight modification.

The third paragraph relative to the press passed. It is said to mention that the first benefit of the reign of Charles X. was the restoration of the liberty of the press, and that France loves that liberty. The fourth, fifth, and sixth, were passed.

All the Ministers were in their places. M. de Moustier, the late French Ambassador in Spain, appeared for the first time at this sitting, but did not speak.

TO THE EDITOR.

" Sir,—In the secret committee, which has just taken place in the Chamber of Deputies, I felt it my duty as a Deputy of France, and as a Deputy especially representing the manufacturing interest, to paint in its true colours, the distress of commerce, the state of languor and even of annihilation, in which all the manufactures, and all kinds of industry in the kingdom now are.

" I say that thousands of hands are without work, and the industrious classes struggling with the most dreadful misery.

" I said, that the bare fear of war had already paralyzed all maritime enterprises. I said the truth: it was my duty.

" Lastly, I said that war would ruin all our hopes, and that we could not assign bounds to the dreadful calamities which it would bring in its train.

" I am opposed to those paragraphs of the proposed Address, in which the prosperity of France is spoken of in emphatic terms.

" You will make whatever use you please of my letter. I only desire to make you acquainted with my opinion in this important discussion.

" I have the honour, &c.

" PETOU, Deputy of the Lower Seine."

(From the Constitutionnel.)

PARIS, DEC. 27.—The Quotidienne guarantees to its readers the details contained in its bulletins of the Grand Apostolic Army.

It seems that the Quotidienne is much better and much sooner informed of the events in Portugal than our Ministry. Its expresses arrive with greater celerity: they even defy the telegraph, whose arms, so active during the campaigns of the elections, seem to be now paralyzed. It would be curious to know from what fund the expenses and the expresses of the extraordinary couriers are defrayed, which keep our congregation constantly informed of the progress of its faithful allies—the Portuguese rebels.

GREECE.

INTERCEPTED LETTER FROM THE SERASKIER OF ROMELIA TO THE GRAND VIZIER AT CONSTANTINOPLE, RELATIVE TO THE SIEGE OF ATHENS.

The citadel of Athens, as you know, has been, from time immemorial, built upon a high rock, difficult to climb, and it can neither be mined nor attacked by assault. It is at the distance of six hours' journey from the isthmus of the Peloponnesus, near the isles, and is situated at the extremity of the other provinces. It is an ancient place, and has produced in former times many celebrated philosophers, and still possesses a great number of ancient works, which are the admiration of the learned throughout Europe; therefore it is regarded as a place peculiarly belonging to the Europeans and other infidel nations. And as not only the people of Europe, but also all the infidels who bear the name of Christians, look upon Athens as a place of pilgrimage, they defend it, and make every effort to prevent it being torn from the hands of the infidel rebels, and have agreed by common consent to assist it by land and by sea. The rebel force is at present formed into two corps, placed in two positions, near the isthmus. Besides this, some Hydriot boats are continually cruising in the neighbourhood, to the number of 20 or 30 at a time; and as their intention probably is to effect an unexpected disembarkation in the provinces which are in our power, and to cause great devastation, our troops employed in guarding the maritime coasts are constantly on the alert. The rebels are numerous. For my part, I have relinquished sleep and rest; and in spite of the assistance of the infidel people, I am busy in reducing the rebels, aided by the miraculous benediction of our formidable Sultan.

Nevertheless, in existing circumstances, it is absolutely necessary that an intrepid and experienced Pacha should be always present at the seige of the citadel of Athens, and that the management of that siege should be intrusted to him; for if the citadel should remain one day free from the presence of a Pacha, the provinces would be instantly in confusion; and since I cannot find time, on account of my other occupations, it is indispensable that the governor of Euboea, Omar Pacha, should be immediately appointed to superintend the siege.

From the first day of my arrival I occupied myself, as I was in duty bound to do, day and night, and with all my energy, to obtain possession of the monasteries and houses in the power of the infidel Greeks. I have scarcely been able, after surmounting a thousand difficulties, to purge Athens from the infectious existence of the Gidours: and in spite of all my efforts, in employing mines, I have not succeeded with the miners of Constantinople. However, acting on the information of persons who assured me of the extreme skill of the men who work the saltpetre at Scopium, who, it is said, would be able to bore from one part of the rock to the other, I have despatched a messenger on foot to bring me ten of these people, and I am promised that they will be here in eighteen days. I hope in Allah, that if these men are as skilful as is related, the affair of Athens will be finished; for the citadel, having a warlike garrison, cannot be otherwise reduced.

It is impossible to describe the difficulties which I experience in supporting my army. I have hardly been able to prevent famine by purchasing, at a fixed price, the provisions which my troops sell me, and which they have taken from the enemy in different attacks. I have, moreover, caused ten mills in the environs of Athens to be repaired, which can grind as much as 50001b. of flour per day. I have, appropriated this flour exclusively to the support of the army which besieges the citadel. Notwithstanding this, however, we are still in want of provisions. In order to protect these mills from the enemy, it is necessary to keep from 80 to 100 men in each of them. Although I have formed a corps of 7000 chosen men to send against the Peloponnesus, I have not yet despatched them, on account of the impossibility of furnishing them with provisions for four or five days. If we had trusted only to the provisions which should have come to us from Larissa, the army would already have perished from hunger. The provisions which arrive in the space of a month are scarcely sufficient for five days. To-day we have not a grain of corn left, and I am in extreme distress. As it is impossible for me to attend at the same time to the provisioning of the army and to the military operations, it is necessary that you should direct some other persons to furnish me with the provisions which I want, in flour and not in grain, because the mills which I have established are not sufficient for the support of the army. It being then necessary that we should receive flour from Larissa, although I have written to persons in authority in that city, I beg that at the same time decisive orders may be despatched without delay. For the love of Allah, have pity on the situation of the true believers, and take care that a considerable quantity of provisions are sent to us here as soon as possible.

I again supplicate that a young and brave Pacha may be charged with the siege of Athens. This citadel is not like others. If my humble prayer should be favourably received, it would be of service, that the Pacha in question, to whom the siege would be intrusted, should come here before I have myself posted the necessary troops in the environs of Athens. I ought not to move from here a single inch, for it is more than certain, that both our front and rear would, in that case, be placed in a very bad situation.

As soon as the Pacha shall have arrived, and I have placed him in command, I will march immediately to my destination, that is to say, to the Isthmus of the Peloponnesus, according to the directions which I have received. I take Allah to witness, that wherever my duty calls me, I will, sheltering myself under the protection of his holy spirit, demonstrate my zeal by the sacrifice even of my life. Circumstances, however, require that the aforesaid Pacha should be charged with the siege of Athens. If any disturbances, any incursions of the infidels should take place in Eubœa, we will despatch thither the necessary troops.

PROVINCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

A Smuggler Killed.—On Monday evening last, an affray took place at Cromer, Norfolk, between one of his Majesty's Lieutenants of the Preventive service and a gang of smugglers. Just as the Lieutenant was retiring to bed, information was given him that many carts were below the cliff, to the northward of the town, with an expectation of taking a cargo of smuggled goods; and that if he went to a certain spot, it would not belong before they passed. He instantly hastened to the place alone, and there watched the arrival of the expected prize; he did not remain long before one of the carts made its appearance. He directly pushed for the head of the horse, and desired the party to stop, being seven or eight in number, telling them who he was. One of them made use of some coarse language, and threatened to murder him on the spot; he instantly drew his pistols and shot the man; the smugglers picked him up directly, put him into the cart, which was empty, and drove off instantly.—Norwich Mercury, Dec. 22.

As a man was passing along the bank of the river Irwell, on the side opposite the Old Quay, he was attacked by some villains, who, not content with plundering him of all the money he had about him, had the barbarity to break both his legs! We trust the wretches will not long escape the hands of Justice.—Manchester Herald.

The number of men committed to the House of Correction at Wakefield, for not obeying orders of bastardy, between the first day of January and the 10th of December, is 425; the largest number confined at one time was 111, the number at present is 95. A year and a half ago, the average number was about 22. Reckoning the conveyance to prison, for which 1s. a mile is paid by the riding for each person, and their maintenance whilst there, of at least 3s. a week for food, clothing, and bedding, the whole expense is no trifle. Surely, the law that entails upon the public such a formidable expense, without producing the smallest earthly advantage to any one, except the conducting officers, loudly calls for a revision.—Doncaster Gazette.

David Wilkie, R.A.—We are much gratified in being enabled to state, on the authority of a gentleman recently arrived from Italy, that this distinguished artist and excellent man, in whose welfare the country is so deeply interested, has recovered so much from his late illness as to give a well-grounded hope of his being soon able to resume entirely his professional occupation.—Edinburgh Observer.

Mr. Whitty, of Axminster, has completed a splendid carpet, to be sent to the Grand Seignior of Turkey, as a present from His Majesty. It measures more than 400 square yards, at two guineas per yard. The trade of Axminster is in an improving state.—Taunton Courier.

Last Sunday week, about 11 o'clock at night, a gang of poachers, six in number, were discovered shooting in one of the woods belonging to Sir Charles Ibbetson, bart. at Denton-park, by the keeper, W. Hancock, and two assistants. Notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, the keepers immediately attacked them, and after considerable resistance, succeeded in securing one of the party, named Peter Simpson, who was taken the next morning before the magistrates, and having been convicted upon the clearest evidence, was committed to prison, to take his trial at the next Otley sessions. He was afterwards admitted to bail. The other five have made their escape. The conduct of the keepers and the assistants seems to have been extremely resolute, and praiseworthy. Three pheasants were found in Simpson's possession, and a gun, and one bludgeon with lead in it, were found near the place.—Leeds Intelligencer.

About eleven o'clock on Tuesday morning, a shocking accident occurred at the foundry of Messrs. Radfords and Waddington, David-street. A number of the workmen were engnged in putting up a steam-engine. They were getting the valve into the engine-house, when the plank on which it rested broke in two, and the ponderous substance fell upon the head and neck of a young man about twenty years of age, an apprentice to Messrs. Radfords and Waddington, named James Thompson, and killed him on the spot. The head was dreadfully crushed, and nearly severed from the body.—Manchester Herald.

On Monday, the 18th, a melancholy accident occurred at Stockwith, near Gainsborough, in the death of Mr. Charles Smith, of the firm of Smith and Hemsworth, rope-manufacturers. He had gone out shooting, attended by his servant: he incautiously passed through a hedge, trailing his double-barrelled gun partly behind him, when the trigger was caught by some of the branches, and both barrels exploded, lodging the contents in his under-jaw and neck. He died almost immediately.

Early on Wednesday morning a man named Francis, a mason, at Castle Carey, was found dead, with his head crushed between two slabs of Keinton stone. From the circumstance of a rope passing round the uppermost stone, which had been left leaning against the wall, and from the position in which the deceased was lying, it is most probable that he had intentionally pulled it on him for the purpose of self-destruction. The intellects of the unfortunate man had been for a long time deranged.

THE EXPEDITION TO PORTUGAL.

Plymouth, Dec. 23.—About two o'clock on Monday morning, the different public departments here were put into motion by the arrival of a messenger from town to hasten the embarkation of troops in the Windsor Castle, Capt. E. D. King, and to expedite the departure of that ship. The troops, consisting of the 1st battalion of the 60th, and detachments of the 23d, 43d, and 96th regiments (the whole about 600 in number,) went on board without loss of time. The Windsor Castle sailed on Tuesday at noon, and the wind having settled about sunset at S.E., there is every reason to suppose that she got well down the channel.

The following general order was issued previous to the embarkation of the 60th:—

"The 1st battalion of the 60th regiment will embark this morning for Lisbon, in his Majesty's ship the Windsor Castle. The interior system, producing uniformity in the appearance of this battalion, and regularity in the conduct of the soldiers, affords unequivocal proof of the zeal, assiduity, and ability of Lieutenant-Colonel Bunbury, who commands, and of strict attention on the part of the officers under him. It has acquired, though recently recruited, great precision in the field movements, and is not less commendable for steadiness under arms. Major-General Sir John Cameron has, in consequence, much pride and satisfaction in being able to detach on foreign service from his command, a battalion of such excellent promise. The thanks and best wishes of the Major-General attend the officers, non-commissioned officers, and private soldiers of the 1st battalion of the 60th regiment."

It is reported, but we hope without truth, that Colonel Bunbury, during the hurry of embarking his regiment (the 6th), on Monday last, was robbed of 340 sovereigns.

"Portsmouth, Dec. 27.—The wind continues both favourable and of moderate strength, so that as the transports are got ready for the dragoons going to Portugal, they embark without the least inconvenience, and sail directly out of the harbour to the Tagus. The greater part of the 12th Lancers have thus proceeded; and this afternoon a transport, with the staff-officers' horses (30) of the army, sailed direct from alongside the dock-yard jetty to Lisbon.

"We are anxiously looking out for 14 sail more transports from Deptford, which are intended to take the 10th Hussars and Waggon train. It is in every respect so desirable to get them away before a change of wind comes, that not a moment of the present most favourable weather should be let slip.

"His Majesty's brig Calliope, Lieutenant Pinney, was this morning ordered to be fitted to take Mr. Rocafuerte, the Mexican Minister, to Vera Cruz. The Calliope will return to England immediately after having landed the Minister. He goes home with the treaty of commerce concluded with this country."

CURIOUS SPECIMENS OF OLD ROMAN RITUALS.

Benediction of the Dove-cote, Cock and Hen Roost, and other Aviaries.—Everlasting God! before whose view are all the angels, and by whose nod all things are governed, who also, in thy excellence, doth not cease to regard the meanest objects which are necessary for human frailty, and who givest food to all flesh, and fillest every living being with blessing, as supplicants we implore thee to shed thy benediction on this pigeon-house (or poultry, or keep of geese, ducks and drakes, &c.), that redounding to us, thy servants, by the agency of thy grace, the glory of thy majesty may be exalted.

Benediction of the Seed of Silk-worms.—God, the creator of things, who causest seeds to give fruit and increase, and who mercifully grantest them to come to our use, complacently heed our supplications, by the intercession of thy blessed apostle James, and deign to bless and sanctify with thy benignity these seeds of the worms which produce silk, so that they may yield their works abundantly; inasmuch as they contribute to the adornment of thy church and of thy holy altars, and redound also to our uses. Through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Benediction of the Sword.—Deign to bless, we ask, O Lord, this sword, and this thy servant, who desires, under thy inspiration, to wear it; fortify the guards of thy piety, and keep him unharmed by all his enemies. Through the Lord, &c.

(Here holy water is sprinkled, and the sword is delivered, with a genuflexion, the priest saying)—

Take this sword in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and use it for your defence.

Law of Libel.—A new American dictionary has recently been published at New York, by a person of the name of Anson, who thus defines the word incongruous:—"Incongruous, a., absurd, unsuitable, inconsistent, the English law of libel."

The business of the House of Commons, after the recess, will necessarily begin very late each day. There are forty-one election committees to be ballotted for; two are to be ballotted for each day, and the ballot days will be Tuesdays and Thursdays. There must be 100 Members present before four o'clock, or the house will be adjourned, and no other business can be proceeded in till the committees are named. The naming of them, all the Members having to be called over, &c. will occupy about one hour and a half each day, and the ballots will not conclude till May 15.

The matters printed for the House of Commons for last session (which, it may be remembered, was a short one) occupy twenty-nine rather bulky folio volumes, being five or six volumes more than the usual number; and those volumes are independent of the Journals, Votes, and the Private Acts, &c. In the course of that session, which began in February and ended with May, there were seventy-nine new Acts of Parliament added to the Statute Book.

Resurrection Extraordinary.—On Monday, Christmas-day morning early, the burial-ground behind the workhouse of St. Sepulchre, situate in West-street, Smithfield, was discovered to have been robbed of the contents of the graves, and no less than five bodies taken: the miscreants, it appeared, had the boldness to pass through the yard of Messrs. Harvey and Biggerstaff, wheelwrights, as a ladder was found next morning on the premises, and several pieces of glass bottles thrown from a wall over which they had first taken their plunder, but had afterwards availed themselves of the yard-gate, which was found open in the morning. At present no trace of the robbers has been found.

A man named George Marshall, a mate on board a Sunderland trader, lying in the river off Stepney, was drowned on the morning of Thursday:—It appeared that Marshall was some time since engaged as mate on board the Janet, and that the ship having performed her voyage to London, Marshall had gone on shore on Wednesday. In company with some companions, he had spent the evening merrily, and had indulged rather freely in the bottle. On his way to the ship he met an unfortunate female, whom he invited to accompany him on board. This was about half-past two in the morning of Thursday. As they were stepping from a boat into the ship, Marshall fell into the water, and being a heavy man, he nearly capsized the boat. The unfortunate woman attempted to save him, and in the effort was drawn into the water. Drags were speedily procured, and after some time spent in searching for the bodies, they succeeded in getting out the woman, but the sharp part of the instrument used as a drag caught in her neck, and wounded several of the blood-vessels, particularly the carotid artery, so severely, that, before surgical assistance could be procured, she bled to death. The body of Marshall was soon after dragged out of the water in a lifeless state, and, notwithstanding every exertion on the part of those who were present, animation could not be restored.

HIS MAJESTY'S LETTER TO THE ARCHBISHOPS OF CANTERBURY AND YORK.

(Copy) Whitehall, Dec. 18.

My Lord,—I have the honour, in obedience to the commands of His Majesty, to transmit to your Grace a letter signed by the King, authorizing your Grace to take proper measures for the promoting subscriptions within your Grace's province for the relief of the manufacturing classes in some districts of the United Kingdom.

It is proposed that these subscriptions shall go in aid of those which have been entered into in the metropolis for the same benevolent and charitable purpose. I have accordingly to desire, in compliance with the terms of His Majesty's letter, your Grace will take immediate steps for promoting the objects therein set forth.

I have the honour to be, my Lord,
Your Grace's most obedient humble servant,
ROBERT PEEL.

To the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, &c.

"George R.

"Most Reverend Father in God, Our Right Trusty and Right Entirely Beloved Councillor, We greet you well! Whereas the manufacturing classes, in some districts of the United Kingdom, have suffered, and are still suffering, severe distress; and whereas many of Our subjects have entered into voluntary subscriptions for their relief, and have, at the same time, most humbly prayed Us to issue Our Royal Letters, directed to the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Archbishop York, authorizing them to promote contributions within their several provinces for the same benevolent purpose; We, taking the premises into Our Royal consideration, and being always ready to give the best encouragement and countenance to such humane and charitable undertakings, are graciously pleased to condescend to their request. And We do hereby direct, that these Our letters be communicated by you to the several suffragan Bishops within your province, expressly requiring them to take care that publication be made hereof, on such Sunday, and in such places within their respective dioceses, as the said Bishops shall appoint, and that upon this occasion the Ministers in each parish do effectually excite their parishioners to a liberal contribution, which shall be collected the week following, at their respective dwellings, by the churchwardens and overseers of the poor in each parish; and the Ministers of the several parishes are to cause the sums so collected to be paid immediately into the hands of Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smith, bankers, of our city of London, to be accounted for by them, and applied to the carrying on and promoting the above-mentioned good designs. And so we bid you very heartily farewell. Given at our Court at Windsor, the 16th day of December, 1826, in the 7th year of our reign.

"By His Majesty's command,
"ROBERT PEEL.

"To the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, for a Collection in aid of the Subscriptions entered into for the Relief of the Manufacturing Classes in the United Kingdom."

COURT OF ALDERMEN.

On Thursday the Lord Mayor held a Court of Aldermen, pursuant to appointment, to consider the petitions of Edward Archer Wilde, Esq., and sundry inhabitants of the ward of Vintry, against the election of Henry Winchester, Esq. and Sheriff, to be Alderman of that ward.

A petition, from a great number of freemen inhabitant householders of the ward, praying the Court to dismiss the former petitions and to swear in Mr. Sheriff Winchester, was presented and read.

The Court was attended by Mr. Sergeant Wilde and Mr. F. Pollock, as Counsel for Mr. Wilde; Dr. Lushington and Mr. Brodrick, Counsel for the inhabitants who petitioned against the return of Mr. Winchester; and Mr. Bolland and the Hon. C. E. Law, on behalf of Mr. Winchester.

Mr. Sergeant Wilde was heard at considerable length in support of Mr. Wilde's petition, and insisting that as the first wardmote was dissolved and not adjourned, the election had become void.

Mr. Pollock made some additional observations, and the poll-book was produced and delivered in, and it appearing that there had been two other poll-books used on the first day of the election, from which entries had been transferred into the one on which the scrutiny was proceeded on, and which alone had been used on the two last days of polling, and the same being contrary to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, he also submitted that the election was void.

Mr. Bolland and Mr. Law were heard against the same, and Mr. Sergeant Wilde was heard in reply.

The Court was then cleared, and after some deliberation adjudged Mr. Sheriff Winchester's election to be null and void, and requested the Lord Mayor to issue a precept for a wardmote to be held for the election of an Alderman. The several parties were called in and informed thereof, and the Lord Mayor fixed Monday next for the wardmote.

Benefit of Clergy.—As the true meaning of the term may, perhaps, not be generally known to our readers, we give the following definition:—Felony, which comprehends almost numberless species of crimes, is subdivided into two classes—with or without benefit of clergy, Benefit of clergy at present signifies an exemption from capital punishment in all felonies where the legislature has not taken away that benefit by express words. The origin of this principle, which is very little understood, is as follows:—At the time the Catholic religion was the established one in this country, the clergy claimed an exemption from punishment for all secular offences; and the legislature was so far duped by them as to grant them that privilege; therefore, whenever a priest was convicted of a crime, for which another man would suffer death, he was discharged, without punishment, on proving himself to be an ecclesiastic. The clergy did not fail to avail themselves of this advantage; and, if any credit is to be given to historians, were guilty of all kinds of enormities and depredations. This induced the Parliaments at various times to subject them to capital punishments, for particular offences, by taking away from those offences the benefit of clergy. In those dark superstitious times, every person who could read was presumed, in law, to be a priest in orders; and, till the reign of Anne, a man who was not possessed of that qualification, was liable to be hanged for an offence which one possessed of it would only be burnt in the hand for: but since that time, laymen are allowed the benefit of clergy once. The clergy, however, are entitled to claim it as often as they have occasion, and are exempted from the panishment of burning in the hand by the statute of 1 Edward VI. which extends the same privilege to peers of the realm, whom it also exempts from capital punishment for the crimes of house-breaking, highway-robbery, horse-stealing, and robbing of churches. Felony without benefit of clergy are capital offences, of which Sir William Blackstone, in his time, enumerates 160, and since his death, upwards of 50 have been added to the catalogue. We trust that in the alterations in our criminal code about to be proposed by Mr. Peel, these circumstances will receive their due share of that gentleman's attentive consideration.

The Funds during the week have been perfectly tranquil. Yesterday they opened with firmness, and the only alarm was a report among the merchants of the City, connected with the trade to Portugal, that the Rebels had entered Oporto, which, after having been given up to pillage, was burnt, and the vessels in the Douro sunk. On tracing this rumour, we find it originates in a policy of insurance being opened on a vessel from Oporto, at a premium much higher than usual, and the whole is believed to be a manœuvre of some of the stock-jobbing body, to spread the alarm and create a fall in the funds, and it must be highly gratifying to the Royal Family to learn that, notwithstanding the excitement of the public mind as to the political news relative to Spain and Portugal, yet the state of his Royal Highness the Duke of York preceded all inquiries after news. We can truly state this to be the case in the City, where empty compliments are unknown.

Consols for the Account closed at $80\frac{5}{8}$. In Foreign Funds, or in Shares, there has been little alteration.

THE AGE.

LONDON, DECEMBER 31.

THE DUKE OF YORK.

It is with the deepest regret we have to state, that the indisposition under which his Royal Highness the Duke of YORK has laboured for so many months, and from which a confident hope had been entertained that he was gradually recovering—has, within the last week, assumed a most alarming aspect, and has led to apprehensions of the most serious nature. We learn, from an authentic source, that for some time back it has been found necessary to place his ROYAL HIGHNESS in a most painful attitude, his legs being constantly in a horizontal position; and in order to induce a discharge of the water with which his frame has been affected, scarification has been performed to a considerable extent. These precautions, however, do not seem to have had the desired effect. His ROYAL HIGHNESS'S strength has been gradually declining for some days, and on Monday his medical attendants found that the wounds in his legs had assumed a most dangerous character. Every precaution that consummate skill could suggest was resorted to, and such medicines were administered as were best calculated to alleviate the pain under which the Royal patient laboured; but, we regret to state, with but little advantage, although some intervals of rest have been obtained.

On Tuesday evening, Sir ASTLEY COOPER felt it necessary to apprize his MAJESTY of the symptoms which had been developed, and for that purpose proceeded express to Windsor. His MAJESTY was deeply affected at the intelligence, and, on the next day, arrived in Arlington-street, on a visit to the ROYAL invalid. His MAJESTY remained in the room with his Royal Highness for two hours, and manifested the most affectionate sympathy for his sufferings. On the same day, the other branches of the Royal Family were in attendance, and the enquiries of the Nobility and every class of society, proved the deep interest which the unhappy state of his Royal Highness had excited.

On Thursday the sufferings of his ROYAL HIGHNESS, which he bore with exemplary fortitude, had but little alleviation; and at his own especial request, he was attended by the Bishop of LONDON, who administered to him the Sacrament. Expresses were sent off to Windsor, with the reports of his medical attendants; and on Friday his MAJESTY again arrived in town, and proceeding directly to Arlington-street, remained there from half-past two till half-past four o'clock. In answer to the numerous enquiries which were made, it was announced that "his ROYAL HIGHNESS had had a good night's repose, and was a little better." It did not appear, however, that there was any mitigation of the alarming symptoms to which we have already alluded; and although every pains were taken to calm the public anxiety, it was impossible not to observe, that the most painful apprehensions are entertained. The Duke of SUSSEX, the Princess SOPHIA, the Duchess of KENT, the Bishop of DURHAM, and Mr. GREENWOOD, were admitted to his ROYAL HIGHNESS during the day, and his medical advisers remained in constant attendance. It appears also, that his ROYAL HIGHNESS was enabled to sign several official documents in the course of the morning.

We are sorry to hear from those who are able to from the best judgment of His Royal Highness's state that no hopes are entertained. His Royal Highness is perfectly aware of his danger, and his fortitude, temper, and composure, excite surprize and the highest admiration. He still interests himself deeply in the important business of his office, and possesses memory and collectedness of mind not less perfect than when in the full enjoyment of his health.

From the last enquiry we were enabled to make yesterday in Arlington-street, we are under the necessity of stating that no change had taken place for the better.

Public attention continues fixed upon the affairs of Portugal; but no news has arrived during the week, which is calculated to throw a new light upon the perplexed affairs of that kingdom, nor indeed can we expect any, until we receive intelligence of the landing of our troops at Lisbon, and the effect thereby produced upon the public tranquillity. It appears that the people of Portugal cannot maintain their Constitution, without the intervention of British arms. At present our news from the Peninsula is transmitted through the medium of the French papers, and they are barren of interest. We have received by express those of Friday. The Etoile gives a brief account of the discussion in the Secret Sitting of the Committee of the Chamber of Deputies for framing the Address, and contradicts the statement that the King of Spain has accepted the Ultimatum, no such intelligence having been yet received; while the Constitutionnel as roundly asserts the contrary, and mentions that the British Ambassador at Madrid has been officially informed by the Spanish Minister, of FERDINAND'S intention to make the fullest concession to restore amicable relations with Portugal.

We attach little importance to what FERDINAND will do in the exigency of the moment. He accepted the alliance of BONAPARTE, and consented to remain a vassal in inglorious captivity, while his people were struggling against military despotism. He swore to maintain the Constitution of the Cortes, and he hanged and banished those who framed it, the instant he joined the Duke of ANGOULEME in the Bay of Cadiz. To crown his perfidy, he even proscribed the Generals MORILLO and BALLASTEROS, who deserted their national flag to join his despotic banner. FERDINAND will, no doubt, when he sees that France has discouraged his project, denounce the instruments of his base designs, and await, should his throne survive so long, another opportunity of attacking the Constitution of his neighbour; but we are anxious to hear what Portugal will do; for when a band of rebels have been able to cover above 100 miles of her territory at the very first irruption, we fear that their cause must be espoused by a considerable portion of the people. A few days must, however, determine this point; and we shall hail with joy the arrival of any intelligence calculated to sustain a belief, that Portugal is in a condition to maintain her independence.

In the Secret Committee of the French Chamber of Deputies on Thursday, an animated debate upon the present policy of France and England is said to have taken place, in which the pacific party prevailed, notwithstanding some forcible remonstrances against the interference of this country in the affairs of Portugal.

England now performs a plain and imperative duty, and the Courts even of the absolute governments of the Continent have sense and justice enough to acknowledge the propriety of our proceedings. The opinion of the Austrian Court on the affairs of Portugal is sufficiently ascertained by the advice given to Don MIGUEL, who some time since took, at Vienna, the oath of adherence to the new Constitution; and the Austrian Ministry are, if not the souls, the brains of the Holy Alliance.

It will be seen that M. PETOU, a deputy from the Lower Seine (which includes Havre and Rouen, and is probably, for trade and manufactures taken together, the most considerable department in France), in the course of his speech, described the distress and stagnation now existing in all kinds of industry in that kingdom, and he observed that "the bare fear of war had already paralyzed all maritime enterprize." This will shew the difference between the condition of England and France. The apprehension of war has produced no such consequences here, neither do we believe that if the probabilities of hostilities with France were greater than they now (happily) are, they would check the improvement now visible in our manufacturing districts.

WE APPLES!

We should never know half the great people of this world, if they did not, every now and then, help us to some information respecting themselves. A bookseller by the name of RIDGWAY has been cutting a most distinguished figure in the journals of the last week, in consequence of a speech of Mr. CANNING'S, which the said RIDGWAY is publishing, being anticipated in last Sunday's Bull. But RIDGWAY shall speak for himself.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

"Sir,—Mr. Shackell, the printer of the John Bull, has shamefully abused my confidence, by inserting in the John Bull, of this day, a speech delivered by the Right Hon. George Canning, at Lisbon, in 1816, which speech was confidentially entrusted to him, to be introduced into a collection of Mr. Canning's speeches a present in progress of publication.

"I am anxious to assure you, that if it was the intention either of myself, or of the gentleman who is engaged in the collection of Mr. Canning's speeches, that the speech should appear in the newspapers, we should have preferred that it found its way to the world originally through your respectable paper, rather than through a publication of the character and principles of the John Bull.

"I will not say that the fraud that has been practised is inconsistent with the habit and manner of conducting the John Bull newspaper; but I must say, that the mode in which the speech found its way into it, is at variance with all the notions I have ever entertained of honesty and fair dealing.

"I remain, Sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

"169, Piccadilly, Dec. 24." "JAMES RIDGWAY.

Upon this showing, the man SHACKELL appears to be a very sad fellow, and not only past the possibility of having any thing to do again with "honesty and fair dealing," but what is of far more importance, of being re-instated in RIDGWAY'S good opinion. However, there is no knowing what may happen; and thus we find that, in four and twenty hours, the said RIDGWAY changes his opinion to the following tune:—

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TIMES.

"Sir,—Since the appearance of my letter of this morning, I have had an interview with Mr. Shackell. That gentleman has given to me, and to the Editor of 'Mr. Canning's Speeches,' such an explanation as has satisfied both him and me, that the Speech published in the John Bull came into the possession of the Editor of that paper in a fair and regular course of business.

"I have only to add, that the explanation given to me by Mr. Shackell, is so full and satisfactory, as to justify the high opinion of his integrity, which from a knowledge of twenty-five years I have entertained, and which, I believe, he deservedly possesses.

"I remain, Sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

"169, Piccadilly, Dec. 25." "JAMES RIDGWAY.

How all this has been brought about is no affair of ours, or any other persons, but the parties concerned—but it must be of some consequence to the world to know, that a man's actions may one day be "at variance with all notions of honesty and fair dealing," and the next "justify the high opinion of his integrity which, from a twenty-five years knowledge of him, you entertain"—at least RIDGWAY says, "I think this, I entertain that, and I believe t'other"—and that is an authority which surely must satisfy the country, particularly until the affairs of Portugal are in some respect settled.

EPIGRAM

ON THE AUTHOR OF A FORTHCOMING COMEDY.

———, 'tis said, a comedy has writ,
Replete throughout with novelty and wit;
If it has wit, to both I will agree,
For wit from ——— must be novelty!

We submit the following article to our readers without comment—if we were to say a word, it would not be against the substance of the document, so much as against the impolicy of circulating such a composition at the present inauspicious moment:—

ADDRESS OF THE CATHOLICS OF IRELAND TO THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND.

Englishmen, Fellow-Christians, and Fellow-Countrymen,—We, the Catholics of Ireland, at the commencement of a new Parliament, deem it our duty to ourselves and our country, again to appeal to the good sense and impartial feeling of our English fellow-subjects against the unjust disqualifications under which we labour, for a conscientious adherence to opinions which, in our mind, we think right.

Fellow-Christians,—Our religion is your religion—the religion of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The first doctrine of our common Founder is peace and good-will to all men—the golden rule of Christianity is to do unto others as we should wish that others should do unto us. If in aught we differ, we do it conscientiously and on conviction. We only exercise, like other dissenters, that right of choosing for ourselves, which is the boast of the Reforma-

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

GUILDHALL.—A case of a very animated description and arising out of connubial ty, was heard before the Alderman. The parties were Mr. Carpenter, the pastry-cook in Fleet-street, and Alice his wife.

Mrs. Carpenter, who exhibited a dreadfully discoloured eye, was the complainant upon this occasion, and stated, that after her separation, before the magistrate at this office, some months since, she advertised for a situation, and obtained one, but her husband managed to coax her back again. On returning to the house, in Fleet-street, she learned that Fox, the girl by whom her husband had an illegitimate child, and who had been the cause of all their unhappiness, was then in the second-floor, together with her sister, both of them in a state of pregnancy, the one by some doctor about Fleet-street, the other by her husband, Carpenter, again.

Carpenter—That is false, your worship.

" I will swear he did," replied Mrs. Carpenter. " I perceived on Saturday night that he was in a very unhappy state of mind, walking to and fro in the shop in a most melancholy way; and I know he was expecting every minute to see his woman, Fox, pass the window. He knew I suspected it, too, but I took no notice of his watching. I mustered all the little endearments I am mistress of, and said, 'Pray come and sit down, here is every thing to make you happy.' 'I never shall be happy again,' was the answer I had. I then taxed him with his connexion with Mrs. Fox, and he brought a pack of cards, and, spreading them out before me, said, 'Here am I, and here is the club's woman—that is Fox—she is near me.' I told him I would not be amused with such rubbish, and threatened to fling his cards behind the fire. I told him that if he fancied Fox loved him, he was deceived; she only loved the marrow of his bones.

" The what?"—asked the Alderman.

" I meant his substance—his property"—said Mrs. Carpenter.

" When was the assault committed? Pray come to the time of the assault," said the Alderman.

" It was committed about two o'clock on Sunday," replied Mrs. Carpenter." " He began with saying, I'll go to America. 'Why, go there, dear?' said I. 'Love will drive me there,' said he. 'Ah,' said I, 'divest yourself of that misplaced love, and you will again become a happy man.' I told him, I required the advice of a doctor, and he said, I might pay one out of my separate income; he could not afford; and he began complaining of being impoverished. 'Well you may keep back,' said I, 'while you are keeping two families;' for, your Worship, I myself have the task every Monday, of paying his girl, or some person for her, 5s. which he chooses to allow her. 'Oh! the poor wretch,' said he, sighing, 'for aught I know, she may be wanting a morsel of bread. This time two years, how comfortably we were altogether.' I was going to get out of his way when he inflicted the bruises upon my face and eye which you now behold; and he afterwards tore a very costly shawl and two handsome dresses into tatters. Before I was going to leave him, he had told me, he would have my betters in the house (meaning Fox) to sleep with him on Christmas night; and I said, I would lie"——

Alderman—Did you say so, Carpenter?

Mr. Carpenter—No, by G—d, I did not.

Alderman—Had you the two pregnant young women in your house when you brought your wife home again?

Mr. Carpenter (trembling with agitation.)—No.

Mrs. Carpenter—You shall swear that.

Mrs. Carpenter (furiously).—I'll swear any thing. (A laugh.)

Alderman—Did you bruise her face in this shameful manner?

Mr. Carpenter—I'll be upon my oath I never did it; and I will convince you I am telling the truth.—She has heard some friends have settled three guineas a-week on me, and she has sworn I shall not enjoy it. When I came home on Saturday night, I, in my usual way, kissed her, and said, " My love"—

The Alderman—Do let us keep to Sunday, Sir.

Mr. Carpenter—Well, then, on Sunday we dined very comfortably together, and then I went down into the bake-house to prepare some mince-pies. She followed, and being Christmas time, I filled a glass of spirits, and said, " Here's my love to you." She became jealous, and flew at me like a tigress; but I kept her off, and she then ran up stairs, seized a chair, ran into the street, and smashed four guineas' worth of windows in the shop front in the twinkling of an eye. Mr. Ottley, an opposite neighbour, came over, and I carried my wife up stairs to bed, and then, in my vexation, opened her drawers, and tore her finery; but I deny most solemnly having struck her once. The black eye she received from the shutter bar in her fit of violence; and as to the young woman, Mrs. Carpenter herself will swear I know not where to find her. By this pretended jealousy, my wife will certainly bring destruction on me and our twelve poor children. My morals were never questioned in my first wife's time.

Alderman—Do you swear that your husband produced those marks of violence in your face?

" As I am in the presence of my God," cried Mrs. Carpenter, eagerly, " he did it."

" Then," replied the Alderman, " you must find bail, Mr. Carpenter. The sessions alone can deal with such a case as this with effect; and I entreat of you, Mrs. Carpenter, that you never consent to give up your marriage settlement under any vows or conditions whatever."

BOW-STREET.—Benefit of Barracks.—Joseph Jarvis, a private in the Guards, appeared to complain against the landlord of the Horse and Groom public-house, Whitcomb-street, on whom he had been billetted, for refusing to lodge him any longer, and turning him into the streets.

The landlord appeared to answer the charge, and being called on to account for using the complainant in the manner described, he admitted that the charge was true; but urged in his defence, that the behaviour of the complainant was such as to warrant the treatment he received. His conduct, he said, was insolent and overbearing in the extreme, and the language he was in the habit of using was of the vilest and grossest description. On Tuesday night the complainant was particularly offensive, and he (the landlord) was obliged to call him to order, in reply to which the complainant assailed him with a fresh torrent of abuse, and actually struck him a violent blow on the face; on receiving which, said the landlord, I certainly turned him out of doors, and considered I was fully justified in doing so, as no man has a right to be insulted with impunity in his own house.

It appeared that the complainant, on being refused any further accommodation at his former quarters, applied to his serjeant for redress, who laid the matter before the adjutant of the regiment, who refused to have any thing to do with the business, and referred the complainant to a magistrate. The landlord, in the mean time, proposed to find a lodging for the soldier within a door or two of his own house, but positively refused to let him occupy his former lodging, in consequence of his frequent acts of violence, and the violent treatment he experienced from him.

Both Sir Richard Birnie and Mr. Halls were of opinion, that the landlord was bound, by the terms of the Mutiny Act, to receive the soldier, and afford him accommodations as before. The offer to provide him with other lodgings could not be acceded to, because the man's billet being at the Horse and Groom, if he were called out at a moment's notice to join his company, he would not be found there. If the landlord was again assaulted or insulted, he could apply at the office for redress, but he was bound by law to comply with his present demand.

A young man, named Henry Udell, was charged with attempting to shoot a Miss Pincher, one of the " dress girls" residing at an infamous brothel in Bedford-court, Catherine-street, Strand, kept by a Jew fellow and his wife, of the name of Jacobs.

It appeared that the defendant was induced to accompany the complainant to the house in question, he being intoxicated at the time. A dispute occurred between them, and the prisoner, as he alleged, in order to repel an attack with which he had been threatened by the complainant, if he did not accede to her demand of more money, drew forth a loaded pistol from his pocket, and vowed to settle all demands by discharging the weapon, which he held close to the person of the complainant, whose screams soon brought the whole household to her assistance, among whom a fellow of the name of Nathan, who it appeared is the resident bully of the establishment, was first to lay violent hands on the defendant. The pistol was soon wrenched from his grasp, and the young man was immediately assailed by the crew in whose power he had fallen. He was beaten without mercy; two of his front teeth were knocked out, and he lay in a state of insensibility until the arrival of Hedger and Mason, two officers of Bow-street, by whom he was conveyed to the shop of Mr. Weatherfield, a surgeon residing in the neighbourhood. The defendant, on recovering his senses, found that he had been robbed of his purse containing three sovereigns and a half, and he insisted on charging his accuser with the robbery, but as he offered no proof of the fact, the charge could not be sustained, and the magistate, after commenting on the impropriety of carrying a loaded pistol about him (the weapon was charged with buck-shot), called upon the defendant to find bail for threatening to shoot the complainant, who, notwithstanding her mode of life, was entitled to the protection she claimed.

The above is one of the many cases of riot and bloodshed that occur almost nightly at those infamous receptacles of vice and villany that abound in the neighbourhood of Covent-garden, the owners of which, who are principally Jews, live on the prostitution of young girls, many of them not more than 12 years of age, to whom they supply paint, dresses, food, and lodging, on condition of receiving in return " the wages of their sin." The shoals of unfortunate young creatures by which the public avenues to the two great theatres are nightly infested, are clothed and supported by the keepers of the various brothels in the neighbourhood, who manage by means of threats and coercion to exert an entire control over their miserable victims, whose nightly exhibition in the streets is really a disgrace to the metropolis, and seems to attach conduct the most culpable to whatever quarter the power to remedy so great a nuisance belongs. We know, of our own knowledge, that several indictments have been preferred by individuals against notorious brothels in the neighbourhood to which we have referred, but in almost every instance the prosecutors have been bought over, and the indictments have fallen to the ground. The magistrates of this office have, we know, repeatedly tried to clear their district of the nest of young prostitutes by which it is infested; but until some strong and effective measures are taken by the proper authorities against the owners of these infamous brothels, it is useless to think of adopting any other means to remedy the evil.

Matrimonial Duets.—A Mrs. Miller and a Mr. Pierce, were brought before Sir R. Birnie, the first on a charge of robbing her husband, a publican of Salisbury. He stated that Mrs. Miller had left his house on pretence of visiting her sister. She had, however, unknown to him, taken away about 300l. in cash, and a quantity of plate. On discovering this, he had traced her to Deptford, where he found her living with Mr. Pierce, who was a tradesman of Salisbury. He gave them into custody, and 290l. was found, with the plate, in her box, which she acknowledged belonged to her husband.

Mr. Pierce said, nothing improper had passed between himself and Mrs. M.; he had lent her some money which he now expected to be repaid to him, and had merely received her in order to protect her from her husband's ill-usage.

Mrs. Miller said, that ill-usage was the cause of her leaving her husband.

Sir Richard Birnie ordered the money to be given up to the husband, and discharged Mr. Pierce, as none of Mr. M.'s property was found on him. He advised the husband to advertise his wife, and avail himself of the opportunity of getting rid of her. The parties then left the office, and the anger of the injured husband was so far appeased on recovering his money, that he called a coach, and kindly invited his lady to take a seat therein, for the purpose of returning to Salisbury by the first conveyance. The wife, who had a similar offer from her gallant, seemed puzzled to decide between love on one side and duty on the other; after a brief struggle, however, she stepped into her husband's coach, which drove rapidly away, while that which contained her gallant moved slowly on in an oppesite direction.

HATTON-GARDEN.—Dear Dancing.—Nelson Byrne, brother to the celebrated dancer Oscar Byrne, and a professor of the same fascinating art, was brought before the Magistrates of this office, upon an order of affiliation issued at the suit of the parish of Hampstead, in consequence of a child, of which he was the reputed father, having become chargeable to it.

Mr. Byrne entered the office with a most jaunty air, and appeared so big with his own importance, that one would have thought he had as high an opinion of his qualities as the celebrated professor of the " tip-toe" art, Vestris—who considered himself and Voltaire as the only clever men in the world. With the most perfect indifference, he rested his elbows on the clerk's desk, and listened to the charge sworn to by the mother of the child, Elizabeth Farrington, a well-dressed interesting-looking young woman, who told the story of her light o'love conduct with " proper emphasis and due discretion," positively charging Mr. Byrne with being the father of the male child of which she had been delivered in July last.

Mr. Rogers—Do you deny being the father of the child charged upon you?—I know too much of the law for that.

Well, what is your defence? Are you not the father of the child?—Defendant (after some hesitation) said, " Oh, of course, if you decide that I am, I must submit."

The solicitor for the defendant interfered, and said that he was instructed to charge the young woman with having a criminal intercourse with the brother of the defendant both before and after the time the latter individual was charged with having been on an intimate footing with her. The defendant, too, in addition to what the solicitor stated, made a charge of a most indelicate nature against the young woman.

The Magistrate then asked her, upon the solemn oath which she had taken, was the charge made against her true?—She, in the most positive terms, denied the truth of any part of it.

The Magistrate, believing the young woman, desired that the order should be made out. The incidental expenses attendant upon the birth of the child, &c., amounted to upwards of 9l.

The defendant, who was ordered to pay 3s. per week and find bail, then left the office.

UNION-HALL.—Dangerous Amours.—A woman named Wilson, applied for a warrant against a man named Gregor M'Gregor. She stated, that on Christmas Eve the said M'Gregor came to her house, accompanied by two females. They all retired to a room, and having remained there for some time. She heard the two women slip down stairs, and the street-door being open, they ran out of the house. Soon afterwards, M'Gregor came blubbering down into the room, wrapped up in a blanket and complained that the woman had left him, taking with her the whole of his clothes, and not leaving even his trowsers to go home in. She observed, that she could not help his misfortune, and added, that in future he should be more careful of the company he kept. M'Gregor, instead of thanking her for her advice, began in good broad Scotch to abuse her, and to accuse her of being a particeps criminis in stealing his breeks. She in vain assured him to the contrary, and requested him to leave her house. " What," said he, " do you want me to gang hame without any breeks." " Certainly," replied Mrs. Wilson, " I have nothing to do with your breeches, and I have none to lend you, therefore, out of my house you must and shall pack." M'Gregor finding that there was no prospect of obtaining a suit, ran up to the room, where he had been stripped of his garments, and pulling the blankets, sheets, and counterpane off the bed, he wrapped them round his body, armed himself with the poker, and rushed out of the house, swearing mightily that he should " smash" the first person that interrupted him. Mrs. Wilson ran after him, and, in the pursuit, he fell, from the weight of the bedclothes; she then thought she was sure of him, but found herself mistaken, for, recovering his legs, he flung off the two blankets, and sprung forward again with such speed as speedily to distance Mrs. Wilson, and then escaped with the rest of the property.

The Magistrate—Mrs. Wilson, I should like to know a little of your history before I grant a warrant against an individual who was robbed in your house. Pray do you keep a brothel?

Mrs. Wilson—I keeps a house of accommodation for ladies and gentlemen.

Magistrate—Oh, that is the genteel appellation you give to your sink of iniquity, is it; then, Mrs. Wilson, you may leave the office, for I shall grant you no warrant.

CONSISTENCY OF COBBETT.

To those who are aware that it has been the uniform practice of this political Bobadil to commence with bluster and to end with turning tail, the fact of his having abandoned his petition against the return for Preston has been looked for as a thing of course: 'so true is the saying of the philosopher, that " a boasting tongue is a manifest sign of a cowardly heart!" The following extract from the Mountebank's parting harangue to the mob, from the window of a pot-house in the market place of Preston, is amazingly characteristic:—

" I am extremely happy. I am so happy, that I believe any one would wish to be an unsuccessful candidate to enjoy the same state of happiness that I do at this moment. Indeed, I have not been so happy since my wedding-day. This is not the case with my opponents. They shall both be ousted, as sure as I stand before you. A new election shall take place in March. I am quite sure Mr. Stanley will never show his face among you again. I will petition the House. I will set the election aside. I will oust the half idiots from their seats. The expense of the petition will be borne by others, and not by me. I shall plead my own cause. I shall examine my own witnesses. I shall cross-examine the witnesses of Stanley and Wood. I shall frame my own charges. I shall be assisted by my three sons. Great interest will be excited by the trial. The eyes of the whole country will be fixed upon this committee. I pray for your happiness and prosperity. I pray for the happiness and prosperity of your wives and children. God bless you all!"

The intolerant spirit of the See of Rome seems to be maintained in full vigour at present. In an official document, dated the 2d of this month, we find an extraordinary instance of petty vindictive persecution directed against the unfortunate Israelites. The Most Reverend Father Inquisitor of the Holy Office of Ancona, Senigallia, &c. has, " in obedience to the commands of his Holiness Leo XII." issued a circular, ordering all Jews to dismiss their Christian servants, females as well as males, not excepting such of the former as may be employed as nurses. This Papal Bull also prohibits the introducing into the houses of Jews any Christian for the purpose of lighting fires and candles on Friday evenings, on Saturdays, or on any Hebrew festival whatever. The violaters of this Inquisitorial order are liable to severe penalties, to be inflicted " at the pleasure of the Supreme Holy Congregation."

On Wednesday night about nine o'clock, the family of Mr. James Udart, of Clifton-street, Hoxton New-town, were thrown into the greatest grief, in consequence of a dreadful accident that befel an only daughter, a child about twelve years of age. Miss Udart was standing very near the kitchen fire, playing with a favourite cat, when, by some means, her dress came in contact with the bars of the stove, and became instantly in a flame, and the poor child was enveloped in a huge body of fire. Her shrieks brought her parents to her assistance, and Mr. Udart, with great presence of mind, threw his child down, and covered her over with a piece of carpet, by which means the flames were extinguished. We regret to state that the little sufferer is so dreadfully injured about the chest from the burns, that very little hopes are entertained of her ultimate recovery.

Burial of a Man Alive.—The last papers from the Arabian Gulf bring an account of the seizure and barbarous murder, at Bussorah, of a courier, conveying letters from a rebel chief to persons in that town. The unfortunate man was bastinadoed, to extort a confession that might implicate certain innocent persons, whose integrity, perhaps, had caused them to be expelled from the sunshine of Court favour, but without effect; he was then conveyed to a public cross-road, where, on his requesting some water to drink, it was poured into his mouth, mixed with clay; after which his two feet were fastened separately to stakes at the sides of a pit, in such a manner that his head and body were hung reversed within it; the earth was then thrown in, and the wretched sufferer buried alive.

A person named Soan was maltreated and severely cut with a sabre across his nose, face, and shoulder, as he was returning from a stable, with a lantern in his hand, where he had been at work, late on the night of Saturday se'nnight, near the Ship Inn, Hastings, by one of the blockade men, who was at the time in a state of intoxication. The case has been heard before a bench of magistrates, and the sailor has been committed to Hastings gaol for further examination. His general conduct had heretofore been excellent; and the affair in question occurred on the night of the day that many of the preventive men had volunteered their services for Portugal.—Sussex Advertiser.

A very sanguinary contest took place on Wednesday night, on the grounds of Mr. Bradshaw, at Worsley, between some poachers and the gamekeeper and assistants. It seems that the gamekeeper was on watch along with some other men, and that they fell in with several poachers, who made a desperate resistance to the efforts which were made to take them into custody, during which the gamekeeper was shot in the groin, and one of his assistants was much hurt by a blow on the head with the butt-end of a musket. The poachers effected their escape, but we understand that the man who shot at the gamekeeper is known, and that an active search is making for him. The gamekeeper, whose name is Peter Berry, lies dangerously ill. When will these contests about a few worthless hares and partridges be at an end?—Manchester Gazette.

Two females, who lived in a village near Loughrea, in the county of Galway, having a small fortune, received the addresses of two men, who were considered by their friends as below them in rank. They made an appointment with their lovers to bring them all the money they could collect on a certain night, and meet them at an appointed place for the purpose of eloping. One of the females came some time before the other, and also before the men; she concealed herself until the other should arrive. In a short time the men came, and then the other female. The pretended lovers seized her immediately, took from her all the money she had, and threw her into a burning lime-kiln. The female who had been a concealed spectator, fled as quickly and as secretly as she could—overtook a carman, who concealed her under hay on his cart, until he came to the nearest police-station, where they informed the police of the transaction. They instantly went to the spot, where they found the murderers, and got the money in their possession. Having secured them, they examined the lime-kiln, where they found the remains of the unfortunate victim of credulity burned to a cinder, her two hands alone excepted. These she had held the side of the kiln with, above the flames, so that they were not consumed. The police brought with them the murderers, and they are now lodged in our county gaol.—Galway Independent.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Intelligence from the coast of Egypt has reached the City by a French vessel of war, arrived at Toulon so late as the 25th Nov. All merchant vessels were under an embargo, on account of the sailing of another expedition for the Morea.

The following are extracts from the German Papers received this morning:—

BERLIN, DEC. 19.—Accounts from Moscow of the 15th say that the Moskowa was covered with ice, which was so thick that carriages could pass over it without danger: but the weather having become milder, heavy rains succeeded, the ice broke up, and a great number of accidents occurred.

SWITZERLAND, DEC. 19.—The Court of Turin having made an application, requesting that the Representative Council of Geneva would abolish the French law relative to marriage in the villages formerly belonging to Savoy, which have been ceded to that Canton, and recognise only such marriages as lawful as are performed with the ministers of religion, the law in question was abolished in January, 1824, in those villages, and the Council of State was at the same time commissioned to make a report in the Sitting of December, 1826, on this new state of things, and also on the possibility for which it might have prepared the way of extending to the rest of the Canton the obligation of the religious solemnization of marriages. The Council of State was of opinion that this extension could not be prepared without danger to the rights of sovereignty and the guarantee of the civil code, and therefore proposed to defer the discussion of this question for three years more.

On the 11th an interesting question came before the Representative Council of Geneva. M. Odier wished the Council to declare whether the whole detail of its sittings should be printed and published; and if so, that measures should be taken that it might be done as completely and faithfully as possible. M. Odier noticed the inconveniences that would result from it. Where the State was governed like a family, it was foolish to ape the representative assemblies of great nations, and it was not necessary to publish every thing that was said and done in the Councils. M. Odier was warmly opposed, and he consented to withdraw his motion for the present.

On the 15th, at half-past eight in the evening, a shock of an earthquake was felt in several parts of the city of Zurich, and also in Schaffhausen, which made the clocks and windows shake, and made the pannels of the wainscot crack. It was a few minutes before nine the same evening that the shock was felt at Augsburg.

The King arrived at the residence of the Duke of Rutland, in Arlington-street, about half-past two o'clock on Friday afternoon, in his travelling chariot and four, from his Royal Lodge, in Windsor Park, to visit the Duke of York, with whom his Majesty remained till half-past four o'clock, when the King left town on his return to the Royal Lodge.

Expresses are frequently sent by the medical gentlemen attending the Duke of York, of the state of his Royal Highness, to the King, at the Royal Lodge in Windsor Park.

The Earl of Liverpool's health has lately much improved. The Noble Earl came to town on Thursday morning, and had a consultation with the Cabinet Ministers who were in town. In the evening, the Noble Earl returned to Coomb-wood, Surrey.

The Lord Chancellor continues to go on favourably: his medical attendants expect that his Lordship will shortly be able to resume his duties in the Court of Chancery.

THE LATE MURDER AT FEICHAM.—We understand that two gypseys have been, within these few days, apprehended at Aylesbury, for the murder of Akehurst and his housekeeper. Cobbler Will and Mary Ayres are discharged.

In consequence of informations received at the head police-office, of an intended duel between Mr. Fullman, jun. Mary-street, and Mr. Edward Dicks, Gardener's-place, peace officers Irwan and Mahon, of the above establishment, proceeded to their respective dwellings, took them into custody, and had them bound to keep the peace.—Dublin Evening Post.

INQUEST ON THE LATE J. BRIC, ESQ.

Yesterday (Wednesday) the inquest, to inquire into the circumstances of this melancholy affair, was held at Phipsborough.

Patrick Lynch, was called in and examined. Several questions were put to him, and the answers returned confirm the statement given in another part of our paper relative to the cause of the duel.

[illegible] whether Mr. Bric, after he raised his [illegible] answer to a question, [illegible] in his former position? [illegible] arm and dropped it again, was repl[illegible] say deceased was he replied in the negative; witness could not [illegible] raised his exactly in the same position when he fired as when he [illegible] arm the first time.

The evidence having closed, the Coroner briefly charged the Jury, who relired to consult upon their verdict. After deliberating for about 45 minutes, it was announced that they had agreed, and the room was instantly filled, when the following finding of the Jury was read:—

That the said John Bric, late Barrister-at-law, was killed on the morning of the 26th of December, 1826, at a field called the Dean's Dairy Field, in St. George's parish, county of Dublin, by a bullet fired from a pistol, at the said time and place, by Mr. William Hayes, of No. 23, Grafton-street, Dublin, in a duel fought then and there between him the said John Bric and Wm. Hayes; and that Mr. David Fitzgerald, Attorney, of 15, Mabbott-street, and Mr. William Gregg, jun. of Kildare-street, Dublin, were then and there acting as seconds, aiding, abetting, and instigating the said John Bric and William Hayes, to fight said duel; said Fitzgerald being second to Mr. Bric, and Mr. Gregg second to Mr. Hayes; and that Mr. Hayes has fled for shooting and killing.

We understand that warrants have been issued for the apprehension of the parties included in the above verdict.—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

PILES.—A Medical Gentleman from Edinburgh having been afflicted with this distressing complaint for more than seven years, and being aware of the danger of cutting, after consulting several eminent Surgeons, from whom he derived but little benefit, was recommended to Mr. Van Butchell, Surgeon Accoucheur, 2, Half Moon-street, Piccadilly, who has effected a perfect cure in the short space of two months.—In testimony of Mr. Van Butchell's superior treatment of this disease, he is induced to give publicity to his case. Cards of address may be had by applying to Mr. Craddock, Chemist and Druggist, 51, Crawford-street, Bryanstone-square.

AT SIMPSON'S MEDICINE WAREHOUSE, No. 28, Henrietta-street, Covent-Garden, London, are sold

The ARABIAN VEGETABLE PILLS, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per Box, free from mercury or antimony, inestimable as a Family Medicine for the removal of Indigestion, Bilious and Nervous Complaints, and as a mild Aperient.

The ROYAL ELIXIR of LIFE, in Bottles of 11s. each, strengthens the Stomach, increases the Appetite, dispels Spasms and Gout in the Stomach, and prevents all the inconveniences produced by excess at table.

The ANTISEPTIC BOTANICAL TOOTH-POWDER, 2s. 9d. per Box, cleanses, whitens, and preserves the Teeth, and fastens them, even if loosened by mercury.

These articles are sold (by appointment) at all respectable Medicine Venders, Chemists, and Druggists, throughout the kingdom.

Superior Eau de Cologne and Swiss Eau d'Arquebusade, Mason's Convent Soap, &c. &c.

CANDLES.—To Families and Consumers of Candles in general.—PIDDLE, Candle Manufacturer, Tallow-melter, Soap-maker, Importer and Dealer in Sperm and other Oils, &c. 49, Dorset street, Manchester-square, most respectfully informs the Public in general, he is selling the under-mentioned articles at wholesale prices, viz.—the best Store Candles, 6s. 6d. per dozen; Waxed-wick Moulds, 8s. per dozen; fine Wax Candles, 3s. 6d. per lb.; Sperm ditto, 2s. 6d. per lb.; Palace Wax Light, 3s. 2d. per lb. Mottled Soap, 78s. per cwt.; Yellow ditto, 68s. per cwt.; and Curd ditto, 10d. per lb.; Windsor and Palm ditto, 1s. 6d. per lb.; Brown Windsor, 2s. per lb.; the finest Sperm Oil, 5s. per gallon (the imperial measure). The above articles are warranted of the very best quality. J. B. flatters himself, in consequence of the extreme low prices above stated, and the respectability of his establishment, (having been established upwards of thirty-five years,) he shall ensure the patronage of the Public; and as the lowest price is affixed to each article, prompt payment will be required. Letters post paid. Country Orders duly attended to.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 209, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for £1., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies:" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

Warehouse, 107, Strand, corner of the Savoy Steps.—The Original Fish-Sauce Warehouse.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of

"MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is strongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

CHAMPAGNE.

AIR—"I've been roaming."

I've been thinking, I've been thinking,
And there's naught—as I'll maintain,
Crowns our drinking, crowns our drinking,
Like a sparkle of Champagne!
I've been thinking, &c.

Oh! there's nothing, no, there's nothing,
'Mid our plagues, I'll say again,
Half so soothing, half so soothing,
As a bumper of Champagne!
I've been thinking, &c.

I've been sighing, I've been dying
For a treat, and I protest
I've been trying, I've been buying
At Charles Wright's, the very best.

I've been thinking, I've been thinking,
And there's naught, as I'll maintain,
Crowns our drinking, crowns our drinking,
Like a bumper of Champagne!

Trace awhile to Port and Sherry!
Join, my lads! the jovial strain,
And a merry, hey-down-derry
Sing in honour of Champagne.

Why the deuce should we complain?
Jolly hearts! I say again,
Oh, there's nothing, no, there's nothing,
Like a bumper of Champagne!

BILIOUS AND LIVER COMPLAINTS.

AS a mild and effectual remedy for all those disorders which originate in a morbid action of the Liver and Biliary organs, namely, Indigestion, loss of Appetite, Headache, Heartburn, Flatulencies, Spasms, Costiveness, Affections of the Liver, &c. &c. DIXON'S ANTIBILIOUS PILLS (which do not contain mercury in any shape) have met with more general approval than any other Medicine whatsoever. They unite every recommendation of mild operation with successful effect; and require no restraint or confinement whatever during their use. In tropical climates, where the consequences of redundant and vitiated bile are so prevalent and alarming, they are an invaluable and efficient protection. They are likewise peculiarly calculated to correct disorders arising from excesses of the table, to restore the tone of the stomach, and to remove most complaints occasioned by irregularity of the bowels.

Sold in Boxes at 2s. 9d.; 4s. 6d.; 11s.; and 22s.; by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-st. Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Willmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom.

IMPOSTURE UNMASKED.—The progress of Merit, although frequently assailed, is not impeded by Envy and Detraction. The aggression of ambuscade terminates in defeat; and conscious rectitude ultimately triumphs in the attainment of the grand object—public approbation. The test of experience is the guarantee of favour, and has established WARREN's BLACKING in general estimation; of which there exists not a stronger proof than the tacit acknowledgment of a host of servile imitators, who surreptitiously obtrude on the unwary a spurious preparation as the genuine article, to the great disappointment of the unguarded purchaser, and manifest injury of WARREN, whose character and interest by this iniquitous system are equally subject to detriment. It becomes therefore an indispensable duty to CAUTION THE PUBLIC against the manœuvres of Unprincipled Venders, who having no character to lose, and stimulated by avarice in their nefarious pursuits, aim at the acquisition of money through any medium than that of honour! The original and matchless BLACKING bears on each bottle a short direction, with the signature

ROBERT WARREN

All others are counterfeits; and in many instances the imposition labels are artfully interlined with a different address, in very small characters, between the more conspicuous ones of "No. 30," and "STRAND." It is earnestly recommended to Shopkeepers and others who are deceived by base fabrications of WARREN's BLACKING, to return the detected trash to the source whence it came, and expose the machinations of rascality to merited obloquy.

WARREN's BLACKING is surpassingly brilliant;—it excludes damp; gives pliancy to the leather; retains its pristine virtue in all climates; and, combining elegance with comfort, is an article equally of indispensable fashion and utility. Sold by every respectable Vender in Town and Country, in bottles, at 6d. 10 12d. and 18d. each.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhœa, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases, together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author. Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street, Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add, as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

ADVENTURES of a SERJEANT in the FRENCH ARMY, during his Campaigns in Italy, Spain, Germany, Russia, &c. from 1805 to 1823, written by HIMSELF.

"Robert Guillemard, whose Memoirs are here presented to the public, was drawn as a Conscript in 1805. He was sent on board Admiral Villeneuve's fleet, and was the man who shot Lord Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar; subsequently to which, he witnessed the assassination of his own Admiral, to [illegible] ing whose death he was personally examined by Buonaparte. He then join[illegible] the Army in Germany, was present at the taking of Stralsund, and, marchi[illegible] into Spain, was made prisoner by a Guerilla party. Having made his escape he was sent on the Russian Campaign; and, at the battle of Borodina, was taken by the Russians, and banished to Siberia, where he remained in captivity till 1814, when he and a few others were suffered to return. At the time of Napoleon's re-appearance from Elba, Guillemard was serving in the Duke of Angouleme's army, in the South, and describes the massacre of the Protestants at Nismes. Soon afterwards he assists Joachim Murat (King of Naples) in escaping from Toulon to Corsica. Guillemard's final campaign was in Spain in 1823; after which he retired to his native village, whence his Memoirs are dated. The Historical Documents, published in the Notes of this extraordinary recital, contain some curious details hitherto unknown."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PORTUGAL.

In the paper entitled O Portuguez, we find the following official article, which contains the latest intelligence from the armies published by the Government :—

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE WAR DEPARTMENT, DEC. 22.

Extracts from the official communication received to-day by this Ministry :—

"Brigadier Azeredo writes from Mortagoa, under date of the 19th instant, as follows :—'I have the honour to request that your Excellency will acquaint her Serene Highness the Infanta Regent, that I this day arrived at Villa de Mortagoa, with the battalion of militia of Sonre, and 10 or 50 cacadores of No. 7, &c. The rebels are in Tondella. I do not know their number ; but whatever it may be, I hope in a few days to dislodge them, and as soon as Colonel Antonio Pinto orders the detachment of Infantry, No. 22, now in Coimbra, to join me, I shall march for Tondella.

"General Stubbs, in a communication dated the 19th, describes the movements of some troops, which the Marquis d'Angeja had detached for Beira Alta, in order to co-operate with General Azerdo.

"From Lower Beira, on the 19th, the General writes—'I have the honour to acquaint your Excellency, that in accordance with General Count de Villa Flor, I this day directed the forces under my command to advance to Belmonte, part by the way of Capinha, and part by Fundao and Covilhan. The latter portions are now preparing to cut off the communication from Fundao and Covilhan, whence the rebels intended to convey the objects which they wished to carry off.

"RODRIGO PINTO PIZARRO,
Chief of the 1st Division."

"Her Serene Highness the Infanta Regent, having destined for the service of the army, 30 horses from the Royal stud, the same has been communicated to his Excellency the Minister ad interim of War, by his Excellency the Master of the Horse, in order that directions may be given in the Royal stables for forwarding them to their destination.

"The Government having, in the supplement to the Gazette of the 17th instant, pointed out the mode in which those persons who are anxious to serve the cause of patriotism, by giving or selling horses for remounting the cavalry, or mules for remounting the brigades of artillery, may concur in that object—those individuals who intend to give horses and mules may address themselves to the Minister of War, and those who wish to sell them may apply to Lieutenant-General Jose Antonio de Rosa, President of the Committee for remounting."

In consequence of indisposition, the Princess Regent was not able to attend the prorogation of the Cortes ; and the closing speech of the session was delivered by the Bishop of Viseu. We extract from the Lisbon Gazette the official account of the proceedings which took place on this occasion :—

"MINISTRY OF THE HOME DEPARTMENT.

"LISBON, DEC. 24.—The Most Serene Senhora Infanta Regent having, in the name of the King, appointed the 23d of the present month for the Royal sitting of the closing of the General Cortes, she ordered the same, by her decree of the 20th instant, to be communicated to the Chamber of Peers and the Chamber of Deputies of the Portuguese nation.

Both chambers assembled in the hall of the Ajuda Palace on the said day, at 11 o'clock in the morning. The formalities and etiquette practised in the former Royal sitting were observed with respect to their introduction and reception. Her Royal Highness could not attend in consequence of indisposition, but the Ministers were present. The Bishop of Viseu, Peer of the kingdom, Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, delivered the following speech :—

"'Worthy Peers of the kingdom, and Senhores Deputies of the Portuguese nation.—Her Serene Highness the Senhora Infanta Regent, on the opening of the session of the Cortes of the present year, congratulated you on seeing you assembled around the throne of her august brother and King, Don Pedro IV., ready to consolidate, by a faithful execution of the fundamental law given to us by a generous monarch, the establishment of wise institutions, like those to which other nations are indebted for their prosperity and glory, and which were already, in a great part, well known to, and guarded by, our ancestors, though they have since fallen into disuse, and been forgotten in consequence of the operation of time and events.

"'On the closing of the same session, she again congratulates you, because in your constant gratitude for the generosity of our august Monarch, in your respect for the constitutional charter, in your noble desire of repairing the ills of the country, and renewing the days of its fortune and illustrious fame, you have confirmed, in the most unequivocal manner, the hopes which the Portuguese conceived of the prudence of the legislator, of the wisdom of the law, and of your known patriotism.

"'In this short period you have, doubtless, recognised with regret the defects of our agriculture, the slow progress made by our commerce, the very exhausted state of our finances, and the decay of military discipline and gallantry ; and you will, with vigilant efforts, endeavour to remedy those great evils by adequate and prompt measures ; but as to know the evil, and to apply with speed the proper remedy, is all that is wanted to obtain a good result, well-founded hopes may be encouraged, that, with more time, in other legislative sessions you will raise our Portugal to that due degree of prosperity and political consideration which corresponds with her situation, with the number and solidity of her alliances, and with the vigour of mind and comprehensive, as well as circumspect, genius of her citizens.

"'Such agreeable and well-founded hopes cannot be disappointed by the defection of some cowards, and the delusion of some part of the population by artful persons. Certain ill-disposed men from the frontier of a neighbouring nation, where they were received, have practised deception, and misled some incautious people. Religion menaced, fundamental laws violated, are the vain phantoms with which they have excited fear, and by which they have succeeded in disturbing that union which they, as Portuguese, ought to prefer above every thing.

"'The Government, however, has not neglected to appeal to the patriotism, led astray indeed, but not extinguished, in their hearts ; nor has it forgotten to meet with precautions and impediments the progress of the contagion. Faithful soldiers march with valour and constancy to defeat the plans and counteract the progress of the cowardly and disloyal ; and strengthened by the assistance of our ancient and faithful ally, Great Britain—assistance given with the most generous promptitude—we may confidently hope to overcome still greater obstacles.

"'The contract of espousals is celebrated between her Faithful Majesty the Senhora Donna Maria II., and the most Serene Senhor Infant Don Miguel, taking away all pretext from seditious intriguers, and all ground of distrust from the deluded, must prove an efficacious remedy against discord, rather originating in error than in perverse intention, among a people who have been misled by designing men.

"'Worthy Peers of the kingdom, and Deputies of the Portuguese nation,—You may rely that her Highness the Senhora Infanta Regent will, in the mean time, prepare to continue in the following session to display her ardent zeal for the good of the country, and to promote it with efficacy and wisdom.

"'In this manner, her Highness trusts that the tree of the State, which has from so many peculiar and extraordinary causes fallen into decay, will recover vigour, and flourish amidst the sincere praises of our contemporaries, and the benedictions of our posterity.'

"Having concluded, the aforesaid Minister and Secretary of State said, addressing himself to the members of both Chambers :—'In conformity with the decree of her Highness, the session of the Chambers for the year 1826 is closed.'

"The members then withdrew, the same formalities and etiquette being observed as on their introduction.

"To the above is added, the law giving the Government a summary power of imprisonment for two months."

PRIVATE LETTER FROM LISBON.

The reception of the news from England has been enthusiastic, and not the slightest doubt can be entertained relative to the result of the contest, now that those who were timid from the fear of compromising their own interests, will be encouraged to display their true opinions. Had the resolution of the English Cabinet been delayed, or been less promptly put into execution, it is possible that a conspiracy might have been framed at Lisbon by the party of courtiers and intriguers, who expected to see the troops of the Marquis de Chaves backed by the Spaniards, and, as they thought, by other powers, finally succeed in their parricidal enterprise.

According to the last news from Lisbon, Count Villa Flor, who commanded the army which repulsed and defeated the invaders of the province of Alemtejo, had crossed the Tagus with his army, and entered the province of Beira, in order to oppose any attempt which might be made by the remains of Magessi's defeated corps to re-enter Portugal on the north-side of the Tagus. In the two rencontres which had taken place in Alemtejo, Count Villa Flor's troops had shown the greatest decision and fidelity, the commander himself, and all the officers remaining in front of their troops during the whole of the action ; at the same time that the officers of the rebels conducted themselves in the most cowardly manner, keeping in the rear, and leaving to the soldiers the whole brunt of the action. In the army of the Count Villa Flor there are found serving as volunteers several of the younger sons of many noble families.

The Marquis d'Angeja, Governor of the province of Minho, was about to cross the Douro, in order to put down the rebellion which had broken out at Lamego, instigated by a Colonel of a regiment of militia, who is a relation of the Marquis de Chaves, and founded upon the same system of falsehood which has all along been employed to gain the ignorant among the Portuguese people. It was said at the departure of the steam-packet from Lisbon, that the Marquis de Chaves himself, with the principal body of rebels, had been beaten at Amarante ; and it is a matter of fact, that they had not been able to pass the limits of Tras-os-Montes ; and that even before being apprized of the arrival of English auxiliaries, they were beginning to waver in their resolutions.

Nobody can deny that there are Spanish officers and soldiers in great number with the Marquis de Chaves ; and as a further proof of the connivance of the Spanish authorities at the attempts of the Portuguese refugees, it may be added, that even General Quesada, Governor of Andalusia, and whose conduct had been more guarded than that of the other Spanish Governors, after having recently requested the Count d'Alva, Governor of Algarva, to send for the artillery, arms, and equipments, which had been carried away by the fugitives from Algarva, has, after all, only effected the restitution of the artillery and ammunition, declaring that the muskets and other arms had been stolen and carried away by the refugees themselves.

It may be given as a piece of certain intelligence, that the Infanta Regent, yielding to the suggestions of Sir W. A'Court, had consented to receive again the Spanish Ambassador, Count de Casa Flores, whose functions had been declared suspended since the entrance of the rebel forces, and that this condescension of her Royal Highness had been communicated to the Ambassador in an official note, with the express condition that the Charge d'Affaires appointed by the Regent of Portugal would be received, and his Government formally recognised (which the reader may recollect had not taken place during the mission of Count Villa Real) ; and as a further condition, the dispersion of Magessi's troops, which had re-entered Spain, was exacted. This act may be regarded as a decisive proof of the discretion which prevails in the British and Portuguese Councils, as, in the present state of things, Spain had certainly no right to expect that the first step towards a reconciliation would be made by Portugal.

SPAIN.

It would seem that Ferdinand's Cabinet is about to undergo some change—at least as to the persons who compose it. It also appears, that an army of observation is to be assembled in Old Castile and Estremadura, the command of which, it is said, will be given to General Rodil, who distinguished himself by the defence of Callao.

(From the Moniteur of Tuesday, Jan. 2.)

"MADRID, Dec. 18.—The whole of the Royal Family are in perfect health.

"Several detachments of Portuguese Royalists entered into Spain last week, in order to raise recruits, and penetrated as far as Viseu, and other villages of the Sierra, which are in the jurisdiction of the Captain General of the Province of Seville. As soon as he was informed of it, he gave the most positive orders for the full execution of the treaties in force between Spain and Portugal, and in consequence, addressed a circular letter to all the governors of the fortresses in his province, to disarm and disperse all the Portuguese emigrants. As soon as the latter were informed of these orders of the Captain-General, they took flight and returned to Portugal.

"DEC. 21.—Gen. Rodil, the hero of Calloa, of whose approaching nomination to a high office we have already spoken, is just appointed second Commandant-General of the Provincial Militia of the Royal Guard, of which the Count de San Roman remains Inspector-General, and first Commandant. M. de San Roman will especially command the battalions of grenadiers, and General Rodil the chasseurs.

"The latter, which succeed the grenadiers, whose three years' service in the capital was expired, have just arrived at Leganes, Vicalvara, Caramancheles, and Ietafe.

"A very important piece of news was communicated to us yesterday. Our government replied a week ago to the last application of the English and Portuguese Governments, that it consented to receive a Charge d'Affairs from Portugal. We must consider this concession as a kind of recognition of the Portuguese Government by ours, it is, at least, a tacit recognition ; for what matters it to the relations between two countries, whether their agents are Charges des Affaires, Ministers Plenipotentiary, or Ambassadors ! In consequence of this arrangement, M. de Casa Flores, our Ambassador at Lisbon, is going to return hither, and a Charge d'Affaires will be immediately sent to Portugal.

"The Duke de l'Infantado used to receive the diplomatic body three times a week. M. Salmon has received it only twice since he has been in the administration ; and he has just declared, that he can now receive it only on Sundays. His Excellency adds, in his circular, that if any member of the diplomatic body has any thing so urgent to communicate that he cannot wait till Sunday, he is requested to inform him of his intended visit the day before. What is the meaning of this regulation ? Is M. Salmon already busy in making up his accounts ? It is affirmed that M. D'Offalia arrived at Madrid the day before yesterday, and that he did not come without being sent for by high authority. We know also, that M. Sobrado, formerly member of the Council of Castile, so well known for the exclamation which escaped him at the return to the council of most of the members who had been dismissed, "that he would not sit with negroes"—an exclamation which caused the King, who was justly irritated, to dismiss him, and banish him to Grenada. We know, we repeat, that M. Sobrado has just arrived in this city, and it has been generally reported since Tuesday in our Salons that M. de Offalia is going to resume the office of Minister of State, and that the Department of Grace and Justice will be given to M. Sobrado. Don Louis Lopez Ballesteros is also to have a successor, who is not mentioned. In consequence of these nominations, M. Salmon, it is said, will have the embassy to Rome, whither M. de Casa Flores, now Minister at Lisbon, also much wishes to go. The Count de la Puebla, who was for a time Ambassador in France last year, has also come forward to obtain this embassy of his Majesty. These are the reports in the Court and city ; they put all our place-hunters in motion."

COMMENCEMENT OF HOSTILITIES IN COLOMBIA—DEFEAT OF GENERAL BERMUDEZ AND THE FEDERAL PARTY AT CUMANA.

An arrival from Cumana has brought important news from that section of Colombia. A battle took place on the 19th ult. between the troops of Gen. Bermudez, and the militia who declared for the Federal System ; in which the former were defeated, and Gen. Bermudez obliged to fly to Barcelona.

We have been favoured by a respectable Mexican house with an extract of a letter containing the following paragraphs :—

(Extract of a letter from Cumana, dated Nov. 25, 1826.)

Ere this you will probably have heard some bad reports about this place. I will, therefore, inform you of what is going on, as there have been many harsh things said of this place by Bermudez.

You are aware, by what I wrote you, that this city had called on the Governor for a reform. To this General Bermudez declared himself an avowed enemy, and called us a set of rebels, &c. &c.

These sentiments, and the despotic manner in which he has for the last two years governed, caused the Provinces in general to disacknowledge him as Commander-in-Chief of the Department, not in a rebellious manner, but by the formula of a civilized body, which met together, and declared their instructions respecting Bermudez, and also their wish to adhere to the Caracas' system of a federal form of government.

General Morayas, who commanded here, and was seconded by Colonel Montes, which latter had hitherto been at the head of the popular commotions, got frightened and abandoned us, at the same time joining Bermudez, who had taken the battery at the mouth of the river by some foul means ; the greater part of the respectable inhabitants of the town fled, some to Bermudez, and others to the opposite coast, leaving only about half a dozen mercantile characters here.

The population wanted to attack Bermudez the moment he landed, but the prudent counsels of a few of us prevented the commencement of hostilities. One night the whole force was marched out to attack, but by the exertions of a few was prevented. The insults and intrigues of Bermudez, however, aggravated the people so much, that there was no restraint on them, and on the 19th, after offering to surrender the battery to the Intendant, Col. Valnilla, it was discovered Bermudez was preparing to attack, and had the second battery in his possession, which, up to that time, had been occupied by either party.

As preparations for this ill result had been made, it was determined, by the military commander, Colonel Ruiz, to attack from the three batteries thrown up during the two preceding nights. About twelve, a tremendous fire was opened by two vessels of the opposite party, which had been watching our movements, which was returned with spirit ; and in one hour they were silenced, and most of the men killed. General Bermudez had only 400 men, half of whom were with him from force, and a few of whom did actually join our party. Repeated sallies were made from the battery, but they were soon repulsed by the Militia.

Our force consisted of one thousand men, and the action lasted till night, during which General Bermudez fled to Barcelona. Great part of the armed force have retired to their homes, but are ready at a moment's notice, besides others from Campano, &c. At present we are quiet, and expecting General Marino from Caracas. The whole of the movements here have been directed by Gen. Paez, at Caracas.

DREADFUL HURRICANE AT SANTA CRUZ.

The following is an extract from a letter which reached town on Wednesday morning, dated Santa Cruz, Teneriffe, the 22d of November, 1826, giving an account of a dreadful hurricane with which that island was visited on the 7th of that month :—

"The noise produced by the raging sea and wind awoke me very early in the morning of the 7th inst., and upon going to the top of the house, as customary, I perceived it was blowing a violent gale from the S.E., and consequently that the vessels in the bay were in great danger, as it is only sheltered by mountains from the north and west : it increased progressively all day, accompanied by rain ; three vessels were wrecked, but only two lives were lost, and at night it blew tremendously until about one o'clock, when the wind changed to the north, and the hurricane commenced. The noise caused by the wind and rain, which fell in torrents, was really awful : the water in the street rushed like a river to the sea, and we were occupied all night in bailing the water from the house, which is large, but not a single room escaped. The following day and night it continued, but with decreased violence, and on the morning of the 9th it abated, and I was able to go out. I found that the change of wind had enabled the remaining vessels to get under weigh, and they were out of sight. The damage done to the town consisted in a few small houses having been blown down, all injured more or less, gardens destroyed, the pavement in the streets in part torn up, and bestrewed with stones, tiles, &c., the bridge washed away, and also (which appears incredible) two 25-pounders driven from one of the castles into the sea ; the water had rushed through the post-office a yard in depth, carrying away some letters, and destroying others, but, fortunately, no lives had been lost. As the town is sheltered from the northerly wind, it was naturally imagined that the other parts of the island had suffered most, and the greatest anxiety prevailed. At length accounts arrived from different parts, all proving that our fears had been justly entertained, and that we had been comparatively well off. You can well imagine that water rushing from lofty mountains, increasing in its course, must necessarily carry away every thing opposed to it, and that, consequently, the destruction it causes must be great—this has been experienced here. Such was the force of the water that came from the mountains, that the stones, trees, animals, &c. which were brought by it, have caused the sea at Port Orotava to retire 300 yards, so that you can now walk on land to where there were previously five fathoms of water. In its progress it carried away a battery and the guard, with the exception of a corporal and one soldier, and only two old dismounted guns remain to denote where it once stood. The beautiful Valley of Orotava has suffered, perhaps, more than any other part, and the loss of lives and property is at present incalculable ; above 100 dead mutilated bodies have already been found there, but these must be few in comparison to the number buried in the rubbish ; in one district alone, 112 houses have been carried away, with also the cultivated land near them : some estates have been entirely, and others partly destroyed ; small villages partly swept away, with their inhabitants, vineyards destroyed, cattle lost, and, in fine, all the numerous disasters which a catastrophe of this kind can occasion. On that side of the island where port Orotava stands, two vessels were lost, one near that town, a French vessel, and only four seamen miraculously escaped ; the rest, consisting of the captain, mate, 10 seamen, and three merchants, passengers, perished : the other was a Spanish vessel, bound to Havannah from which, I believe, only three men were saved. From parts of wreck seen near the coast, it is presumed much damage must have been done at sea. In Candelaria, the convent, containing the Virgin, so much celebrated for her miraculous appearance here at the time or shortly after the conquest, and which was so greatly venerated by all the inhabitants of these Islands, was washed away, and also a castle, in which a soldier and his family had sought refuge, but perished. Not only has this island suffered from the hurricane, but also some of the others; and it is known that great damage has been done in Canary, where nine vessels were lost, with part of their crews."

(FURTHER PARTICULARS.)

I feel myself almost inadequate to give you even a very imperfect description of the hurricane experienced here and its effects; but in endeavouring to state what I have seen and heard from persons, upon whose veracity I can depend, you may rely upon the melancholy tale not being exaggerated.

The 7th instant commenced with a heavy gale from the S.E., which continued increasing the whole of the day, and the fate of the vessels at anchor appeared inevitable, but fortunately only two Spanish and one American brigs came on shore and were dashed to pieces, only two lives were lost. In the afternoon, the rain increased with the wind, and at night we were completely deluged with water; the street in which I live appeared a river rushing with the greatest rapidity to the sea; at about one, a.m., the wind changed to the north, and blew a tremendous hurricane, surpassing any thing I could have imagined, the rain increasing in proportion; the whole of the night we were occupied in bailing out the water from the different rooms; and notwithstanding the house is one of the strongest in this town, not one room escaped; thrice I was completely wet through, and greatly feared part of the house would be blown down; at day-break I discovered all the remaining vessels were out of sight, and conjectured the change of wind had enabled them to get under weigh, which proved to be the case; the rain and wind continued all the following day and night, but with rather less violence, and on the morning of the 9th it abated, and enabled me to go out and witness the effects of the storm. I found a few small houses had only been destroyed, but almost all had been injured, parts of streets had been torn up by the force of the water, a bridge completely washed away, and the streets bestrewed with stones, tiles, &c.; walls enclosing gardens partly, and some entirely, levelled, while the rain had washed away the earth, trees, &c. Out of the Post-office letters are supposed to have been driven into the sea, and many of those remaining rendered useless. Such was the force of the wind and water, that from one of the castles two twenty-four pounders were carried into the sea; fortunately it was ascertained, that with the exception of the mate and seamen of the American vessel, no lives had been lost. The confusion produced by this hurricane, which has never before been experienced here, can only be conceived; the fear of the rest of island was depicted upon the face of every one; justly was it imagined, that we must have suffered nothing in comparison with other towns, as this is greatly sheltered by mountains from the northerly wind: too true was the conjecture, and you will perceive that here we have been extremely well off.

Laguna and its vicinity suffered considerably; fourteen persons have been already found dead, and many more are supposed to remain under the earth, stones, &c. which have been washed from the high land; all the wind-mills, except five, blown to pieces; houses completely destroyed, and others severely injured. It was distressing to see numbers of poor in the streets, who lost every trifle they possessed, and, almost naked, bewailing their misfortune. A subscription (a very uncommon thing here) has been opened to prevent them from dying by starvation. In Candelaria, the Convent, and the Virgin, famous for her miraculous appearance, was washed into the sea, and also the castle, in which a soldier and his family took shelter, or rather repaired for safety, perished, and other accidents; but I shall desist from naming many of the different villages and districts, and confine myself to that part of the island which has most suffered, which is the valley of Orotava and the surrounding country.

I have two letters from Port Orotava, from different persons, which confirm each other, and their account agrees with those which have been received here. One vessel was wrecked there in the night, and only four seamen escaped; they say they belonged to La Jeune Gabrielle, twenty-one days from Bordeaux, bound to the Isle of Bourbon, the Captain, Mate, ten seamen, and three merchants, passengers, perished, nor have their bodies been found. In Port Orotava forty-five bodies have been buried, and in the villa of Orotava forty-eight. The battery of San Carlos, with the cannon and guard, with the exception of a corporal and one soldier, swept away, and only two old dismounted guns remain to denote where it once stood. In one district, between Port Orotava and the villa of Orotava, 112 houses have disappeared, with also their corresponding pieces of land, vineyard, &c.

It is quite impossible at present to form any calculation of the loss of lives and property, which must be immense, for not only houses have been destroyed, but a vast deal of cultivated land which cannot be restored to its former state without considerable time and money, much more so than would be required in England, as here the mountainous state of the country causes the water to rush with greater force, and tears up every thing in its course. Had the hurricane continued a day longer, I have not the least doubt but that Port Orotava, from its situation, would have been destroyed. I can easily imagine the fear which must have been felt for its fate, particularly from the state of one barranco (ravine) close to it, which proceeds from very high land.

A Spanish vessel bound to Havannah was also lost in a place called Valle Guerra, and but few men saved; and from parts of wrecks being seen near this coast, it may be presumed several vessels have perished at sea. The Island of Canary has also suffered from the hurricane, but I have not seen any particular accounts, and only know that nine vessels were lost there with a great part of their crews, and I fear we shall receive bad accounts from the other islands.

In the midst of the painful reflections which a calamity of this kind must necessarily produce, and particularly to those who are interested in it, your letter reached me and its contents only serve to increase them. One of the greatest miseries which I think can befal mankind is to have urgent claims without the ability to satisfy them, accompanied by an ardent wish to do so.

ACCIDENTS FROM FIRE-ARMS.—Lately, a dreadful accident occurred at the Rev. Mr. Wilkinson's, who keeps an extensive school in Aldenham. It seems to have been a practice with the senior boys to amuse themselves with fire-arms, by firing at a mark with ball. On the present occasion, one of them, about 17 years old, was showing his dexterity, when, unfortunately, the ball lodged in the back of another pupil, the son of Dr. Pidcock, of Watford. Mr. Foot, of Edgeware, and Mr. Ward, of Watford, were both sent for on the instant, and a messenger was despatched to London for Sir Astley Cooper. Every attempt, however, to extract the ball has hitherto proved fruitless; but we understand great hopes are still entertained of his life being saved. The young gentleman who was the accidental cause of his schoolfellow's sufferings, is in great distress of mind from the unfortunate occurrence. It is somewhat remarkable, that about two months since, as Dr. Pidcock was passing the school, on hearing the report of fire-arms, he called, and pointed out the impropriety of such dangerous weapons being allowed in hands so inexperienced, and Mr. Wilkinson immediately prohibited their use in the school; though, as the melancholy catastrophe proves, they had been used without his knowledge. A few days previously, a son of Thomas Haworth, Esq., of Elstree, in the absence of his parents, whilst amusing himself with a powder-flask, by making trains, &c., a spark accidentally communicated with its contents, the explosion of which seriously injured his face and hand; he is, however, likely to do well, with the loss of a thumb.—Essex Herald.

RECEPTION OF THE ENGLISH TROOPS IN PORTUGAL.

As every incident connected with this subject is of value, the following short narrative, collected from a gentleman who accompanied the Sir Edward Banks, both going and returning, will be acceptable:—The Sir Edward Banks was taken up for the service of Government about the 14th ult. to carry despatches to Lisbon. No troops were on board, the advantages of employing steam-vessels for such a purpose on any great and sudden emergency not being then thought of; but she carried a small number of sailors, volunteers from the tender off the Tower, which were placed on board the Ramillies, flag-ship, in the Downs. She left the river on the 16th, and arrived in the Tagus on the 21st. It is probable that the news of the King's message, and of the armament for Portugal, had been sent off by expresses over land, as it reached Lisbon on the 19th, when it was made known to the Chambers and to the people generally, by whom it was received with the highest demonstrations of joy. On the 20th, by an arrangement with the authorities at Lisbon, 400 mariners had landed from the British ships of war, and taken possession of Fort Julien, and a fort on the opposite bank of the Tagus. On the 21st our informant visited the theatre, and witnessed the exultation displayed by the audience at the gratifying intelligence. The national hymn was chaunted in full chorus by all present, and its repetition frequently called for. The public joy was the greater, on account of the deep despondency into which the people had previously sunk, on hearing of the progress of the rebels, and the uncertainty they continued in with respect to the interference of England. It is said that arrangements had been made for the reception of the Princess Regent on board of one of our ships of war in the Tagus. His Majesty's ship Pyramus, which, it will be recollected, sailed from Portsmouth on the 18th ult. in company with the Romney, was the first vessel with troops on board that entered the Tagus: this took place on Christmas day, and the circumstance was hailed by the spectators as an auspicious omen. The scene is described as one of the finest that can be imagined. The Tagus was covered with boats filled with spectators; and one gallant troops, in full uniform, and with arms presented, on deck, passed up the river, amidst the heartfelt acclamations of the collected multitudes. The troops, composing the second division of the 4th regiment of foot, remained on board on the following day, when the Sir Edward Banks sailed on her return to England; but preparations were making for their reception, and for assigning them quarters in the city. The Sir Edward Banks has brought dispatches for Mr. Canning, for the Admiralty and Navy Boards, and for the French Ambassador—a proof, amongst many others, of the amity with which our proceedings are regarded by his Government. A fast-sailing cutter was taken up two days before the Sir Edward Banks left, to carry despatches to Falmouth, but no account of its arrival has reached town. At the time the Sir Edward Banks came out of the Tagus, it was understood that the Romney, which sailed from Portsmouth in company with the Pyramus, was in the offing, but that vessel was not seen. On passing Cape Finisterre, however, she saw two 74-gun ships, probably the Gloucester and the Wellesley, the latter of which bears the flag of Sir T. Hardy, steering for Lisbon, where they would arrive, in all probability, on the 28th. Sir J. M. Doyle came to England as passenger in the Sir Edward Banks, which reached Portsmouth at 11 o'clock on Sunday night, and as he travelled post, the news was received at the Admiralty at a very early hour on Monday morning, before it was sufficiently light to employ the telegraph in announcing it. The troops which arrived had made an excellent voyage, and are reported to be in the best condition and spirits.

NEW FRENCH LAW RELATIVE TO THE PRESS.

The law on the press in France, has been very much modified since the project passed the Council of State. It is still, however, considered as alarming both to booksellers, authors, and journalists. It will entirely destroy more than one-half of the existing journals—it will entirely prevent the publication of pamphlets, and will go far to annihilate the enterprises of booksellers in more extensive works. At present a journal pays only 7½ centimes, or ¾d. of duty. By the proposed impost it will pay double. At present, any number of proprietors may possess the property of a journal, and only one of them be liable, either for its offences against the law, or for its debts to individuals beyond the sum placed in commendite.

By the proposed law the number of proprietors is reduced to five, and each is liable for its conduct before the Courts to the full amount of its debts, or of its punishment in the fines and imprisonments which may be awarded it. By the present law, no name is required by Government but the name of the responsible editor and publisher. By the new project, the name of every proprietor must appear at the head of every number that may be printed in the 365 days of the year. M. Lafitte, for instance, is in part proprietor of the Journal du Commerce. Will M. Lafitte remain any longer in a property which renders him liable to be sent to gaol for a paragraph, over the publication of which he may have had no control?

The Constitutionnel has, probably, ten or twelve proprietors. The half of them must sell their shares. The inconveniences and hardships of the law are so great, that even the journalists, who are the friends and supporters of Ministers, do not suppose that it will pass.

Then, with regard to books the evil is still more alarming. By the existing law, the book may appear on the day the deposit is made of the five copies. By the proposed law, five or ten days must intervene, in which time all sorts of intrigues will go to destroy the credit of the work, or to concert measures for prosecuting the author.

THE LATE DUEL IN DUBLIN.

The friends of Mr. Hayes beg most unequivocally to state, that from the moment the insult was offered to him, up to the time of his being put upon his ground, both he, and those acting for him, manifested every disposition to a just a difference which it was their unanimous and decided opinion did not call for a meeting; and they think the following correspondence between the parties will prove that in place of Mr. Bric having been driven to adopt that which terminated so fatally, Mr. Hayes was actually goaded into the measure he felt it necessary to come to in his own defence, which will appear from the last letter sent:—

"11, Mabbot-street, Ten o'Clock, Sunday Night.

"Sir,—To put an end to our correspondence, I delivered you a message this day at five o'clock, from Mr. Bric, when upon you told me your friend, whom you did not name, would call upon me on or before seven o'clock. Your messenger, but not your friend, called at the hour so appointed, which occasioned me to send you a verbal message. I feel that I have lost the greater part of the night, and have been at the trouble of a correspondence which I did not bargain for. Suffice it to say, that I shall be at home all this night, and unless I hear from you in the usual way before twelve o'clock this night, my friend and I shall act accordingly.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant.

"W. Hayes, Esq. "DAVID FITZGERALD."

Upon the "pacific" tendency of this, so far as Mr. Bric was concerned, the friends of Mr. Hayes do not feel called upon to make any observation, except that the last letter is not in the hand-writing of Mr. Fitzgerald, although signed by him, and they trust that the motives by which they are actuated in withholding the name of the person by whom they have reason to think it was written will be duly appreciated.

From sentiments of feeling and delicacy they absented themselves, and withheld these documents from the Jury impannelled by the Coroner, nor should they ever have met the public eye, but for the unjustifiable observations made upon the conduct of Mr. Hayes.—Dublin Patriot.

STATE OF TRADE.

Though last Tuesday's market was a holiday one, a considerable quantity of business has been done this week, at a trifling advance. Buyers continue anxious to secure full stocks at the present low prices, but the manufacturers are not disposed to push sales just now, being generally of opinion that a brisk demand will take place early in the new year. If so, we earnestly hope the poor weavers and other operatives will reap some benefit.—Manchester Gazette.

The year 1827 seems, as yet, as if it would commence in the most cheering manner. Trade has considerably improved within the last month; and the only complaint we can now hear of is, the poor remuneration which is obtained for labour, and this complaint is made by both the employer and the employed. The only evil which our townspeople have to grapple with now is, the low price of the goods manufactured, and not the want of orders. We are acquainted with several concerns, where the workmen have been obliged to labour during the whole of the late Christmas holidays, and many who were only closed for one day. In order that our readers may form some estimate of the great reduction which has taken place in the price of goods, we need only state that the master manufacturers have, in some cases, been called upon by the merchant or his agent, to make a discount of from 50 to 65 per cent. on their respective goods; and a gentleman trading at Birmingham assured us, that as much as 80 per cent. had been asked and granted there, for ready money, on some articles which are manufactured at Sheffield. We confess such things ought not to be, and that something must be done, and speedily, to relieve our failing manufactures. In our last we gave an extract from the report of the Franklin Institute, and our readers would no doubt be surprised at the encouragement which is held out to the manufacturers of the United States; and it could not but particularly strike their attention at the progress which they are making in the manufacture of those articles for which Sheffield has been so long famous.—Sheffield Mercury.

We understand that a strong sensation has been produced among the turn-out spinners, and indeed the working spinners generally of Oldham and its neighbourhood, by a notice given by the masters of between twenty and thirty cotton-factories, on Saturday night last, to their work-people, of a reduction of one-eighth of a penny per score for spinning, after the expiration of the present week. It is expected that on next Saturday evening notice will be given to the same effect at several more factories. The factories at which this notice has been given are situated in the neighbourhood of Oldham, in Saddleworth, and on the borders of Ashton parish. A meeting of the journeymen is appointed in Oldham on Monday next, for the purpose of determining what course to follow in consequence of this decision of the masters.—Manchester Guardian.

The shipwrights in Port-Glasgow, like their brethren in Greenock, are, and have been unemployed for several weeks back, except three or four who are kept to superintend the apprentices. This distress among this class of mechanics and the other trades dependent on them for employment, is very great, both in Port-Glasgow and Greenock. There is no ship-building going on to employ them, and the ship-owners prefer the laying up of their vessels, to the fitting them out for sea at a great loss, consequently there is a lack of employment at the repairing of vessels. Many of the shipwrights have had only two, three, or from that to ten days' employment in six weeks, and at a period, too, when vessels usually fit out for sea.—Edinburgh Star.

We are happy, indeed, to state that the trade of this district still continues to exhibit favourable symptoms of amendment, and encourages us to hope that the improvement will be progressive and lasting. A little more business is done, though as yet the terms on which this increased activity takes place are such as to offer very little emolument to the manufacturer. Our correspondent from Hebden-bridge states that the wages of the labouring poor are improving a little in that neighbourhood. Certainly the present year closes with prospects on the whole less gloomy than those which attended its commencement.—Wakefield Journal.

We are sorry to state that the herring fishery in the West Bay has completely failed this year. The fishermen have scarcely been paid for their time.—Sherborne Mercury.

BANKRUPTS, INSOLVENTS, &c. IN 1826.—The following lists have been accurately taken from the Gazette. In them will be found the numbers of bankrupts, declarations of insolvency, notices of the petitions of insolvent debtors, heard both in Portugal-street and in the different country circuits, and of dissolutions of partnerships, during the different months in the last year:

It now appears that the destination of the Galatea and Plumper, which sailed about the 12th ult. with sealed orders, was Oporto; and that they have been instructed to cruise off that harbour for the protection of British property. Some of the merchants connected with Oporto attended at the Treasury on Saturday, to learn in what situation they were placed, and received assurances to that effect from Mr. Herries.

PORTSMOUTH, Jan. 3.—The wind having got round to the eastward last evening, with a severe frost, the whole of the 10th Royal Hussars, and the remainder of the 12th Lancers, were this morning safely embarked on board transports, and, it is expected, will sail for Lisbon early to-morrow morning.

CHATHAM.—The Alfred, a razee from a 74, is now in an advanced state towards completion, at this port. She is to carry 50 guns when cut down, according to which she is rated in the Admiralty list. The burden of this ship, which is 1,741 tons, will enable her to carry peculiarly heavy metal; and she will thus be a formidable opponent to enemies' frigates of her class.

On Tuesday last, such of the freemen of this borough who voted for N. Malcolm, Esq. at the late election, and chose to accept of it, received a Christmas-box of five guineas each. The thirty-three plumpers who voted for John Wilks, Esq. the unsuccessful candidate, received post letters on Sunday, with five pounds enclosed in each, as a new year's gift, or friendship's offering.—Boston Gazette.

On Sunday last, as Mr. Smith, the gamekeeper of Bryan Cooke, Esq., of Owston, near Doncaster, and two assistants, were ranging in the plantations, they suddenly came upon a poacher, who immediately fled. The three pursued him, but Smith being the swiftest runner, got ten yards in advance of his assistants, and was on the point of seizing the poacher. The man, finding escape impossible, turned round and shot the gamekeeper dead on the spot. The man was then pursued by the assistants, who made him prisoner, and he was taken to Doncaster gaol.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

An old friend, under the signature of Bounce, will perceive that we have partly availed ourselves of a contribution he was kind enough to send us, which contained a valuable hint—and we shall be extremely glad to hear from him again.

SPECTATOR will see that we have expressed the opinions we feel in common with him, upon the subject on which he has addressed us.

Our other favours shall be replied to next week.

THE AGE.

LONDON, JANUARY 7.

The decease of his Royal Highness the Duke of YORK was yesterday announced, to the most unfeigned and profound sorrow of the public, which has sympathized from the commencement of his ROYAL HIGHNESS's severe affliction in the sufferings which the ROYAL DUKE has endured with such exemplary fortitude and resignation. The popular virtues of this amiable Prince were calculated to impress the affections of a generous and loyal people; and the testimony unequivocally borne to the excellence of the ROYAL DUKE's domestic character, has supplied abundant information on that portion of his existence, which, in personages of his illustrious rank, is of necessity passed beyond the knowledge of the million.

The union of his public and private virtues have naturally endeared him to an affectionate and admiring nation, which has not only seen its valiant army surpass in discipline, bravery, and morality, the aspiring soldiery of Europe, but has also to bless the indefatigable exertions of the Illustrious DUKE in all the amiable offices of charity, which was one of the most prevailing and active virtues that animated his Royal heart. His ROYAL HIGHNESS had the singular felicity to exhibit, on a subject which has long disturbed the tranquillity of his country, a firm inflexibility of decision on the inadmissibility of Roman Catholic pretension. Above the mean calculations by which an ephemeral reputation is sought, His ROYAL HIGHNESS, on that important point, embarked the accumulated weight of his public and personal influence, thereby manifesting to the constitutional adherents to the religion of the realm an open detestation of those insidious and pernicious evils, which once oppressed the liberties of England, which now pollute the very stream of existence in the deluded Sister Kingdom, and which elsewhere have exalted a bloody and despotic priesthood above monarchical authority and popular right. The sagacity, the manliness, the virtue of his ROYAL HIGHNESS, so visible in the determination which he had expressed on this especial point, will indissolubly bind his memory to the affection and respect of every English Protestant.

It may silence the exceptious tenacity of malice to discover, in that cold and scanty eulogy which is extorted from his very enemies themselves, that multitude of meeker, yet quite as Christian qualities, which constituted the peculiar charm of his beneficent and social nature. It, notwithstanding, has appeared to some an act of decency and justice to approach the estimation of so excellent a Prince with Heathen stoicism and gratuitous severity. Before the ashes of the Royal Duke were cold—before the knell of his mortality had reached the heart of orphanage and widowhood, and sent its sorrow to the abodes of humility, which his active charity had so often cheered, there have been those who, with splenetic tenacity, endeavoured to redeem the expiated errors (if human virtue can expiate offence), of a life abounding in perfections far more than ordinarily great and good. It has even suited the impartial and ingenious purpose of these 'honest Chroniclers' to obtrude on popular credulity a wanton lie, regarding the expences of a palace, in which the Royal Duke had no participation or concern. We neither envy the philosophy nor candour of such invidious friends to truth, and think the solemn advocacy of their abstract morals incomparably less allied to virtue than to affectation. It is impossible to reflect on outrages so barbarous, without feeling some concern for our common nature---without invoking the forgiveness that charity extends to the imperfections of those who are no more; and we believe that no flattery will be apparent in our saying that there are few whose hopes of Heaven, and whose memory on earth, are more felicitous than those of the Royal Duke whose dissolution has diffused throughout the kingdom such deep and sensible regret.

His Royal Highness was in his sixty-fourth year, being born on the 16th of August, 1763. His style and titles were as follow:—Prince FREDERICK, Duke of York and Albany, Earl of Ulster in Ireland, Bishop of Osnaburgh, a Field Marshal, Commander-in-Chief of all the Land Forces, Colonel of the First Regiment of Foot Guards, Colonel-in-Chief of the 60th Regiment of Infantry, Officiating Grand Master of the Order of the Bath, High Steward of New Windsor, and Warden and Keeper of New Forest, Hampshire, Knight of the Garter, and of various Foreign Orders, &c. &c.

We are called on to notice the Speech of the President of the United States, not by any particular development of novelty, either in its internal economy or foreign relations, which apparently are in the ordinary condition we have all along supposed; but in consequence of some remarks, with reference to the commercial system imposed by Great Britain on her colonies, to use the phrase of Mr. QUINCY ADAMS, "both insular and continental." It will be thoroughly perceptible to any one who takes the trouble to examine the laboured apology, by which the commercial regulations of the Union are upheld, in the PRESIDENT's communication, that something more than usual difficulty has presented itself to the defence of exclusions conceived on the part of the United States, in the most evident spirit of illiberality and petulance. By a trite, but inefficient method of defence, we discover Mr. ADAMS attributing, inferentially, on the outset of his oblique imputation on Great Britain, the want of those qualities in her international proceedings, which, in the present case, at least, so distinctively impress the character and conduct of themselves.

On the shewing of Mr. ADAMS, it appears that Great Britain extended to the option of the United States such terms of traffic with her colonies as she offered universally to other countries; but that on the refusal of the Union to accede to these proposals, Great Britain thereafter declined admitting the ships of the United States even on the terms on which she opened her ports to the navigation of other nations. Now, as Mr. ADAMS uses the peculiar tone of American pomposity, both in the closeness of his dialectick, and the self-sufficiency of contempt for any thing in the semblance of a favour or a boon from the concession of Great Britain, he commits a manifest absurdity in inveighing against the exercise of a right in the British Government, by which the retention of our ancient policy subjects the Colonies to certain salutary limits in their intercourse with foreign countries. If Mr. ADAMS questions the right of the parent country, his doubt would savour of a most unseasonable obtrusion of subversive principles, which, fortunately for mankind, have long since since lost their stimulating charm: if, on the other hand, he reproaches Great Britain with ungenerous tenacity in withholding what it has the power, and as well the option, to bestow, he is convicted of a glaring inconsistency in deploring the want of favours which he elsewhere emphatically disdains.

It must be palpable to those who attentively consider the reasonings of Mr. ADAMS on the special points of American forbearance and concession, that the very premises exhibited in the attempted establishment of his purpose, are conclusively demonstrative of qualities diametrically opposite: for Mr. ADAMS dwells with lively pleasure on the facts, which constitute the most rapid retaliation of the Union, on any act of Great Britain, which did not exactly quadrate with the interest and disposition of the States. Thus much for the candour and logic of Mr. ADAMS's statement to his liberal and ingenuous countrymen. We have thought it just to offer these remarks on one of the most elaborate tissues of prejudice and vulgar vanity that we ever remember to have seen, even from that great source of meagre selfishness and absurd presumption. It is disgusting to observe ameng those primitive sticklers for republican simplicity so invidious a leaven of inextinguishable rancour, mixed with the cold formality of their amicable assurance, and to remark with what malign satisfaction they would fain provoke the dignified and reposing spirit of a country which continues to its irreverent bastard issue the parental sentiments of indulgent hope and pity. The policy of Great Britain, equally humane and wise, has no ambition to engage in wild crusades, and to add further trophies to her unrivalled fame at the expense of human peace and happiness: she could derive no honour from the acquisition of extensive wilds—no glory from victories unproductive of consequences beneficial to civilized and social life; her sustained and antiquated character exalts her above the vulgar level of abuse, or, at all events, exempts her from the pains of over sensitive resentment. That her policy is pacific, is beyond a doubt, but that her abilities and energy are unimpaired, when principle and reason call on their exertion, is, at this instant, so resplendently evinced by our magnanimous assertion of the rights of Portugal, that argument would be superfluous on the subject. We have a thorough confidence in the efficiency of our national spirit, health, and wealth; and are, thank heaven, blest with moderation to abstain from precipitate hostilities, and enough sensibility to national renown to act with prompt and stern decision, when motives of sufficient gravity may urge us to the reluctant execution of severe and moral duties. But we are not so light in the estimation of Nations as to suffer by the oblique aspersions of authority itself, however petulant and disrespectful, nor exactly bound to notice the Jesuitical and semi-barbarous casuistry of latent hatred, which, in spite of the professions of official dignity, is manifest in every word of Mr. ADAMS's communication, respecting the unrivalled land to which his fathers had the honour to belong, and to which we are particularly happy to know that Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS has no claim, and still more happy to feel that he has no pretension.

It remains for us to add that Mr. ADAMS did not confine the object of his communication to the mere detail of the political condition of the United States; but that it was designed as a specimen of the critical ability, which it has of late been the fashion among a certain class of Transatlantic wiseacres, to discover in the Papers of the Yankee Coryphæus. We must say that we are as utterly insensible to the charms of Mr. ADAMS's style, as we are to the matter of his composition; and that we seek with equal ill success for the excellence of the one and the honesty of the other. It reminds us much of the dotted wilderness over which Mr. ADAMS presides, where all that approaches England is comparatively tolerable, and all that is vernacular is barbarous and bad. His concluding eulogy on treason is pure American fudge, and the whole of his exhibition would have been infinitely improved, and far more perfect as to morals and assimilation, if instead of the clumsy cunning, and beggarly pomp, so dominant in all productions of his spurious compatriots, he had imitated the open avowal of his hate with the manliness of those contiguous savage tribes which rival the United States in freedom and domestic comfort, while they surpass them immeasurably as a sincere and ancient people.

TOM RAIKES is so partial to punning, that, to enjoy it, he purposely employed a tailor of the name of NUNN, (formerly of Thayer-street.) The "yard, half-yard, three-quarters," being announced one day, Tom went out to meet him on the stair-case, and insisted on Snip's preceding him, which the tailor modestly resisted—when TOM, with a facetious smile, silenced him, by exclaiming, "Remember, I am secundum NULLO."

The death of Mr. BRIC, the Roman Catholic barrister, is a subject which has created a much greater sensation among the advocates of that wild party, than any circumstance which has transpired for many years, and is consequently calculated to excite an unusual degree of opinion amongst its opponents. The false notions of honour which are maintained by so many of Mr. BRIC's countrymen, and particularly by the more immediate partizans of his religion and polity, were never more fully brought into action than on this afflicting occasion; and no circumstance can therefore more strongly mark the fatality of their devotion than the issue of this most unfortunate affair. Without entering into any general discussion of the Roman Catholic character, or of its melancholy and erroneous bias in most points of view, we will confine ourselves to its display in the instance now under examination. On the signal being given for the parties to fire, we perceive, by the accounts in the Irish Papers, that Mr. BRIC exclaimed, "Now for GOD, and my Country!" and then madly and precipitately rushed into the commission of an offence, which, however falsely its consequence may be estimated by his Country, is the highest offence in the eye of his GOD!

A more glaring instance of self-deception than this never came under our knowledge: and yet it is to these fatal doctrines the leaders and supporters of this faction would reduce the followers of every other. And yet, mark the issue of all this vain glorious controversy, this deplorable commingling of earthly and unearthly persuasions—this wild display of ignorance and fanaticism. Mr. BRIC fell a sacrifice to the influence of his political and religious sentiments, and a few days have witnessed his death, his burial, and the forgetfulness almost that he existed—SUCH IS THE POPULARITY OF PARTY—and this party, above all others. But the fate of Mr. BRIC will not operate as any lesson to those who surrounded him in life, and are now left behind, stimulated by his doctrines, and not in the least deterred by his dissolution. It should, though—for his fall may be looked upon as a distributive chastisement on the hollow pretensions of a factious religion—and in that light alone do we fear his memory is now regarded. Mr. BRIC's death is thus far lamentable—that a man of high integrity, good attainments, talents, and enthusiasm—of estimable private character, and of social virtues, has passed away from life—the errors which his public pursuits led him into are more than atoned for by his decease: but with all these acquirements and recommendations, his memory will soon be numbered with "the things that were," and even now is not free from jocose insult. On hearing of the termination of the duel between Mr. HAYES and Mr. BRIC, it is said that Lord NORBURY observed, that he knew Mr. HAYES was an attorney, but never before heard he was a bricklayer. "Sic transit gloria mundi."

MATTERS OF SURPRISE,

IN THE YEAR ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND TWENTY-SIX.

IN JANUARY.

—That it should turn out, after all, that the Emperor ALEXANDER was not strangled—that HENRY GREY BENNETT should have taken a "valete" of England, and un valet of Spa, something about the same time—that Archdeacon GLOVER should tell the "circle" at Lillies he had any interest with the Electors of Sudbury, and that BETHELL WALROND should believe him.

IN FEBRUARY.

—That so good a motion as the one, regarding "the unjustifiable meanness and extortion of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster" should be negatived, merely because it was brought forward by a fool—that a beautiful comic actress should prefer "an old man," to many young ones, who are all anxious to drive the Chester mule—that the Margravine of ANSPACH, in noticing "the private theatricals" at Brandenburgh House, (in her memoirs) omitted giving some account of the parts played by herself.

IN MARCH.

—That Lord BELGRAVE subscribed so handsomely to the relief of the distressed manufacturers!—that Lord KING is not appointed "Court Fool" at once, to save him the nightly trouble he takes in the House of Lords.

IN APRIL.

—That a Magistrate should publicly sanction the forcible detention and prior theft of a dog in the public streets—that after the facts of theft so fully proved against the Steam Packet Office, in Piccadilly, it should still be kept open, and do as much business as ever—in Brompton Crescent, that PLANCHE should bring the Tigris to Tunis, and afterwards be appointed "jack-all" to Vauxhall Gardens.

IN MAY.

—That Mr. HUME does not get forcibly ejected by the Serjeant at Arms—that any one should back the "General" when they knew in whose hands the horse was, and that they should pay their money when they found he had lost—that ESTERHAZY should "pay the piper" for TULLY, (as JOHN LYSTER calls "my Lord")—that Mrs. COUTTS had not additional springs to her carriage, when any one, besides herself, was going in it, to the Spitalfields Ball.

IN JUNE.

—That Ecarté should be so particularly patronized—and that, at a dinner party at Yellow Ocre Hall, the host and C. MILLS should play from ½ past 10 to 12, and that Sir JOHN NEWPORT, Doctor and Mrs. LUSHINGTON, &c. who were present, should not leave the room—that Col. DAVIS, after the ignorance he has already displayed, should find people at Worcester to support him for the ensuing election—that persons should be found to throw away money on Foreigners, who would not subscribe a shilling to save thousands of their own countrymen from starvation—that CROCKFORD does not challenge TOM RAIKES, and if TOM should accept it when he did.

IN JULY.

—That Mr. WILLS, jun. was not blown before he started for Sudbury—that TOM BISH should pay £8000. to get into one house, and £2000. to get into another; and yet manage to do neither—that Lady GREY did not interfere to prevent the publication of BEAUMONT'S letters, respecting Lady SWINBURNE, particularly as BALL HUGHES told Lord HOWICK, he always understood that the "GREY mère was the better horse."

IN AUGUST.

—That BILLY LENNOX, when grouse*-shooting was so plentiful, should have had such bad sport with Lord GLENGALL—that Mr. SADLER, the aeronaut, was not killed long ago—to the people of Tewkesbury, that JOHNNY EASTHOPE should have spent so much upon the St. Alban's election, and yet leave the "Gilpin Junior" of poor Til, (upon whom he had spent quite as much) totally unprovided for—that the GROSVENOR family should have thrown away so much upon the Chester election.

IN SEPTEMBER.

—That Sir SNUFFLE SNUFFLE should ever have organized so large a sum as 10,000*l.*, and then be fool enough to advance it, on an ARCH-JESUIT'S security! for the purpose of getting BISHOP to direct the Oratories for him.

IN OCTOBER.

—That Lord COCHRANE should be disgraced, and Lord TEYNHAM unimpeached—at Oatlands, that any gentleman in the nineteenth century (married to a foreigner) should write to France for a HOG'S head of Claret, and call it, "un tête de cochon de Bourdeaux"—that ELLISTON should be out of Bedlam, and Mr. PRICE in America—and that CHARLES KEMBLE should give up the part of Hamlet to CHARLES YOUNG.

IN NOVEMBER.

—That the cockney, AULDJO, should be admitted into decent society, and that when in, he was not instantly kicked out—that Mr. ELLICE did not think it more advisable to prove himself not a GREEK, than to prove that others were so—that an English Editor should be branded for accusing BOCHSA of crimes, for the committing which, BOCHSA himself was branded—the Jury must have been brandy'd, when giving the verdict—that a Martial Court of Enquiry should be held upon a subject, not in any respect of a military nature—that the young "sturgeon," Lord BINGHAM, should be appointed to the command of the 17th Lancers.—

IN DECEMBER.

—That Mr. BROGDEN should not have followed Mr. SOUTHEY'S example, and vacate, "like a well-bred dog, who leaves the room, when he sees preparations on foot for kicking him down stairs"†—to Captain FORBES, that a winter theatre should lose 2,000*l.* before Christmas, and to FARLEY, that there should be no chance of recovering it afterwards—to the people of Brighton, that Mrs. COUTTS should be on shore, and half-seas over at the same moment—and, that the Duke of ST. ALBAN'S should suppose it was owing to her "child's call"—that BEASLEY could write a farce without a double entendre in it—to Mr. BALL HUGHES, that they should send to Portugal, instead of Constantinople, for "sublime PORTE"—that Mr. COLBURN should not puff Vivian Grey—and, "last, but not least," that the public should have taken the trouble to read all this nonsense.

* Quere goose-shooting!

THE REFORMATION IN IRELAND.

The melancholy and ever-to-be-deplored event which has consigned to the grave the great and illustrious Champion of the Protestant Constitution, casts, for the present, a shadow of national sorrow and lamentation over the great work of religious and moral improvement in the Sister Country. We anxiously hoped the mighty Disposer of human affairs would, in the bounty of his wisdom, have lengthened the days of the Illustrious individual, whose death we have to deplore, that he might behold the progress of reformation in a country which, for ages, has been benighted by the veil of bigotry, ignorance, and the influence of the Priesthood—that, in his goodness, he would have spared this distinguished personage to view the illumination of the Catholics of Ireland by the glorious rays of religious and moral education, and the happy change from political disquietude to national felicity—but it has pleased the hand of Heaven to interpose and deprive him of that triumph—a great and glorious triumph would it have been to him, who, by every act of his political life, manifested an anxious and uncompromising attachment for the support of that Constitution which had placed his illustrious ancestors on the throne of these realms—a constitution which, if an insult be offered to the meanest individual in the State, makes it the common cause of the empire—he struggled for its independence and permanency; and in the very latest act, by which his political career in this respect has been distinguished, the truth of his principles are manifested when addressing the House of Lords on the question of Catholic Emancipation.

We cannot but observe that the hour of death in all countries has been considered one of more than ordinary illumination, as if some rays from the approaching world had revealed to the soul an existence that was only to commence in death, and fixed its attention more firmly on some of the great subjects of political importance from which it was about to part for ever.—That this illuminatory principle had influenced the mind of the Illustrious deceased, we have reason to believe, for almost every interval from suffering was marked by a deep parental solicitude for the happiness and tranquillity of his country.

Thus the nation has lost—shall we say irreparably?—No, we hope not, one of the great bulwarks of its Constitution; for we trust and expect the glorious example which he has set will be followed by his successor, confirming and fulfilling the expectations of the people, and demonstrating to the world, that in order to render the Constitution of Great Britain permanent, she must never cease for a moment to be Protestant. It was our intention but for the melancholy event which we have occasion to deplore, to have discussed more fully the causes and effects of the great work which has commenced, and by which alone the infatuated people of Ireland can be emancipated from ignorance and bigotry—the influence of priestcraft extinguished—and the blessings of tranquillity enjoyed by all classes of the country. We have beheld with pleasure the rapid strides of religious and moral improvement, the extension and cultivation of the intellectual and political vision of the hitherto blinded Catholic laity. We congratulate, from our hearts, the individuals who have so successfully struggled in the work of the Reformation. We intreat them to continue their unwearied exertions in the glorious cause---we call upon every individual in Ireland who wishes the connexion between the two countries to remain fixed, to unite and co-operate in the pursuit of this national blessing; then may it be said, and truly said, that Catholic Emancipation has been accomplished—not emancipation in the sense understood by the agitators of the country, but emancipation from religious intolerance—bigotry, superstition, idolatry, priest-influence, and political faction—such will be the effects of the measure. Where are its causes to be found? They are visible in the several institutions, public and private, which have been founded for the dissemination of education without religious distinction. Many desperate and violent measures of opposition were resorted to by the Catholic Clergy, and other influential persons of that persuasion, to crush those institutions by every possible means. The Kildare-street Education Society had frequently been accused of favouring the work of conversion and proselytism, under the mask of extending the objects for which they were founded. Some of its members succeeded in consequence of such a charge, whilst the persons who had the hardihood to advance the accusation had totally failed to substantiate their proof of it. The Society, however, went on progressively and effectively with the work of education, and we now beheld the invaluable harvest of their labours ripening into maturity, by the conversion of upwards of 350 enlightened Roman Catholics, from the church of Idolatry to that of true Christianity, in one solitary county in Ireland.

THEATRICALS.

There is no institution whose purposes are more abused than are those of a theatre; but it would be a very difficult thing to determine whether the fault lies most with the managers, or with those who are their judges and supporters. There is very little difference, in our view of things, between the representation of such a production as the Murdered Guest, and the Gill's Hill Murder, excepting the moment chosen for its performance—for they are both in the true style of Old Bailey exhibitions, displaying crime in all its enormity, without giving any portraiture of those dark feelings which always lead to its perpetration. The object of tragedy (of which melodrama is your most degenerate bastard) is to exhibit those bearings of human mind and character, which are the forerunners of the great evil with which we are afflicted, and by showing the consequence to which sin will be certain of conducting us, to endeavour to prevent its commission. This great and important object has of late years been totally frustrated by the introduction of every continental horror, which the profligacy of rival states has embodied: and by these means some of the most disgusting details of private calamity have been wrapped up in a melodramatic shape, merely to gratify the natural curiosity which the actual occurrence had previously excited.

A much more revolting affair than the Murdered Guest has seldom been exhibited on the Metropolitan Stage, totally unworthy even of the equivocal reception it experienced, and calculated to bring neither respectability, nor profit, to the concern. It is impossible to deny that the thing was well acted, and served as a medium of showing off Mr. EDWIN'S talents to their best advantage—but beyond this, little more can be said, except that, from the appearance of the play-bills, we presume the Murdered Guest has by this time joined its ancestors.

The performance of the White Lady at Covent Garden Theatre has been on a much superior plan than it was done at the rival theatre, and from the time which has been bestowed upon it, we do not see how it could be otherwise. Still we do not think there is sufficient beauty in the music, or interest in the drama, to warrant any particular expense in producing it, and, above all, the fuss made by Mr. HOWARD PAYNE (the composer of the piece), in his little weekly publication, about Miss PATON'S secession from the character allotted to her therein. We cannot omit congratulating ROBERTS, on the display of his scenic abilities in this drama, and beyond that, there is little worth noticing in the paraphernalia belonging to it. The main feature in the performance is Madame VESTRIS'S representation of George, which was distinguished by all that archness and vivacity of manner, so peculiarly her own. Even SAWNIE himself could never have met, amongst all his countrymen, a more interesting specimen of the Highlander than she looked in her Trowsers and Tartan. It will help the pantomime certainly, but there are many other plays which, with the assistance of Madame VESTRIS, would have helped it considerably more.

The said Miss PATON, we find, has been making a fine sensation in our neighbouring isle, as will be seen by the following account from the Dublin Morning Register of Wednesday last, and it is therefore little to be wondered at, that she made such a precipitate retreat, even from the fascinations of La Dame Blanche:—

Miss Paton commenced her engagement on Saturday last, preceded by the stamp of the metropolitan mint, as to the perfection of her attainments, and by the tongue of common rumour, as to the peculiarity of private circumstances, of no ordinary nature. Under these demands upon public curiosity, it was not unnatural either to expect, or to find, a very crowded auditory on the evening of her appearance, nor less so to suppose that the display of her talents would subsequently secure the attendance which the anxiety to witness them, in the first instance, produced—a result which in both cases has been attained. It was not until last evening, we feel, that Miss Paton confirmed the utmost point that anticipation could ever aspire to—not because she displayed more science or execution, but because the music allotted to her on this last occasion was, technically speaking, more 'telling' than any of her previous efforts. Her Rosetta is a very agreeable and naive piece of acting throughout, reaching excellence often, and never coming within the pale of mediocrity—while of her singing, it is hardly safe to trust one's self to common expression. Of the introduced music, we may be permitted to say, that her 'I've been Roaming,' though conveying far more astonishment to the ear, conveys not as much enchantment either to the imagination or the heart, as the execution of the same ballad by Mrs. Waylett: but we should not think simplicity formed any great portion of Miss Paton's musical composition. She dwells in the sublime, almost exclusively, and her execution of the 'Soldier Tired,' may be considered the grandest effort the stage now can lay claim to, and one beyond which the genius of her children never reached—it has force, brilliancy, modulation—all that can charm you into a conviction of the intensity and grandeur of sound, bewilder you in its beguiling maze, and leave you there beyond the hope of extrication—the ear can never expect to listen again to any thing so allied to perfection. Her performance of The Minstrel Boy was only less commanding, in the proportion that its materiel is less capable; but, like its predecessor, was hailed with a burst of enthusiasm which must have conveyed to the enchantress the power of her spell. The Patentee could not have made a more important engagement. The remaining characters in Love in a Village were done comparative justice to. Among the ladies, we must foremost rank our first favourite, Mrs Waylett, whose representation of Madge was a very prominent feature in the opera, and whose execution of the established music in the part was given with all that sweetness and simplicity which have indelibly fixed her as the "admired of all beholders." Miss Forde's assumption of Lucinda was highly creditable, and her songs elicited unanimous approbation.

We have not further space to dilate upon the occurrences and on dits, past and in circulation, among the charming portion of mankind; but we cannot omit remarking, with much pleasure, that in consequence of HORACE TWISS'S admirable imitations, the other night, in Soho-square, his nephew has offered him 30*s.* per week at the "Garden:" that Mr. WALLACE'S opera and Mr. MORTON'S comedy are both in a thriving condition: and that, what between Mr. BISHOP and his talented pupil, Mr. G. RODWELL, Sir G. SMART'S musical abilities are rather in high estimation at Covent Garden Theatre.

BIOGRAPHICAL MEMOIR OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

His Royal Highness Prince Frederick, second son of George III., and brother to his present Majesty, was born on the 16th of August, 1763. When he was but seven months old he was elected Bishop of Osnaburgh, a nominal office, to which the Elector of Hanover has the power of influencing the election alternately with another European power. On the 25th July, 1771, his Royal Highness was installed a Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, in company with his two brothers, the Princes of Wales and Cumberland, in presence of the Sovereign. The education of his Royal Highness under the paternal eye of George the Third was strictly attended to, and the pictures which are left us of domestic life pursued under his Majesty's sanction, are such as convey ideas of his paramount regard for the blessings of a virtuous life. During their childhood, the Prince of Wales and the Duke of our memoir were remarkably attached to each other. They studied together, and played together, and were noticed as being extremely devoted to each other's society. A popular writer, who has given us some account of his own life, mentions, that having been brought to work in Kew-gardens, he saw there the two young Princes, whom he noticed as being very fond of each other, and both fine lively lads. On the 27th November, 1789, his Royal Highness was created Duke of York and Albany. This very year was marked by a circumstance so remarkable in the history of the Royal Duke as to require a particular mention.

On the 18th of May, 1789, Colonel Lennox sent a circular letter to the members of Daubigny's Club to the following effect:—"That a report having been spread that the Duke of York had said some words had been made use of to him (Col. L.) in a political conversation, that no gentleman ought to submit to," Col. L. took the first opportunity to speak to his Royal Highness before the officers of the Coldstream regiment, to which Colonel L. belonged; when he answered, "that he had heard them said to Col. L. at Daubigny's," but refused, at the same time, to tell the expression, or the person who had used it; that in this situation, being perfectly ignorant what his Royal Highness could allude to, and not being aware that any such expression ever passed, he (Colonel L.) knew not of any better mode of clearing up the matter than by writing a letter to every member of Daubigny's Club, desiring each of them to let him know if he could recollect any expression to have been used in his (Col. L.'s) presence, which could bear the construction put upon it by his Royal Highness; and, in such case, by whom the expression was used.

None of the members of the club having given an affirmative answer to this request, and the Duke still declining to give any further explanation than he had done before the officers of the Coldstream regiment, Col. Lennox thought it incumbent on him to call upon his Royal Highness for the satisfaction due from one gentleman to another. The Duke at once waived that distinction of rank of which he might have properly availed himself, and consented to give Col. Lennox the meeting required. The following is the account of the affair as published by the two seconds, Lord Rawdon (the late Marquis of Hastings), and Lord Winchelsea:—

"In consequence of a dispute already known to the public, his Royal Highness the Duke of York, attended by Lord Rawdon, and Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox, accompanied by the Earl of Winchelsea, met at Wimbledon-common. The ground was measured at 12 paces, and both parties were to fire at a signal agreed upon. The signal being given, Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox fired, and the ball grazed his Royal Highness's curl; the Duke of York did not fire. Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox observed that his Royal Highness had not fired. Lord Rawdon said it was not the Duke's intention to fire; his Royal Highness had come out upon Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox's desire to give him satisfaction, and had no animosity against him. Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox pressed that the Duke of York should fire, which was declined, upon a repetition of the reason. Lord Winchelsea then went up to the Duke of York, and expressed his hope that his Royal Highness could have no objection to say he considered Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox as a man of honour and courage. His Royal Highness replied, that he should say nothing; he had come out to give Lieutenant-Colonel Lennox satisfaction, and did not mean to fire at him; if Lieutenant-Col. Lennox was not satisfied, he might fire again. Lieutenant-Col. Lennox said he could not possibly fire again at the Duke, as his Royal Highness did not mean to fire at him. On this both parties left the ground. The seconds think it proper to add, that both parties behaved with the most perfect coolness and intrepidity.

"RAWDON.
"WINCHELSEA."

As soon as this affair of honour was concluded at Wimbledon, two letters were sent express to town, one to the Prince of Wales and the other to the Duke of Cumberland, giving them an account of the proceeding; and at the instant of the Duke of York's return, the Prince of Wales, with filial attention to the anxiety of his Royal Parents, set off to Windsor, lest hasty rumour had made them acquainted with the business.

Such was the caution observed by the Duke of York to keep this meeting with Colonel Lennox a secret from the Prince of Wales, that he left his hat at Carlton House, and took a hat belonging to some of the household with him. During the whole of the affair the Duke was so composed, that it is difficult to say whether his Royal Highness was aware of being so near the arm of death. One remarkable thing connected with this duel was, that the Earl of Winchelsea, the second of Colonel Lennox, was one of the Lords of the Bedchamber to his Majesty; and his mother, Lady Winchelsea, was employed in rearing his Royal Highness.

This transaction excited a great deal of interest. His Majesty was so affected by it, notwithstanding its fortunate termination, that he abstained in a great measure from his usual amusements. The Duke of York appeared the least concerned of the Royal party, and the following singular occurrence will demonstrate the feelings by which different members of the Royal Family were influenced on the occasion:—

"In consequence of the recovery of George III. from his lamented indisposition, the King's birth-day, in 1789, was celebrated with unusual splendour. The King, however, was not present during any part of the day, owing to the shock occasioned by the duel so recently fought between the Duke of York and Colonel Lennox. In the evening a most splendid ball was given; and notwithstanding what had so recently happened, and the established etiquette, that no person should stand up at country dances who had not danced a minuet, Colonel Lennox appeared in the circle with Lady Catherine Barnard. This the Prince of Wales did not perceive until he and his partner, the Princess Royal, came to the Colonel's place in the dance; when, struck with the impropriety, he took the hand of the Princess, just as she was about to be turned by the Colonel, and led her to the bottom of the dance. The Duke of York and the Princess Augusta came next, and they turned the Colonel without notice or exception. The Duke of Clarence with the Princess Elizabeth came next, and his Royal Highness followed the example of the Prince of Wales. The dance proceeded, however, and Colonel Lennox and his partner danced down; but when they came to the Prince and Princess, his Royal Highness led his sister to the chair by the side of the Queen. Her Majesty then addressing herself to the Prince, said, "You seem heated, Sir, and tired." "I am heated and tired, Madam," said the Prince, "not with the dance, but with dancing in such company." "Then, Sir," said the Queen, "it will be better for me to withdraw, and put an end to the ball." "It certainly will be so," said the Prince, "for I never will countenance insults given to my family, however they may be treated by others." At the end of the dance, her Majesty and the Princesses withdrew, and thus the ball concluded. The Prince, with his usual gallantry, afterwards explained to Lady Catharine Barnard the reason of his conduct, assuring her Ladyship that it gave him much pain to be obliged to subject a lady to a moment's embarrassment. It is now well known that the severe measures taken by his Royal Highness to discourage the practice of duelling, have almost succeeded in banishing it from military society.

Amid the political agitations of the year 1791, the marriage of his Royal Highness to a Princess of the House of Prussia, serve to cement more closely the relations which the Courts of St. James's and Berlin had found it their interests to contract, with the view of counterpoising the inordinate ambition and mighty progress of the restless Empress of Russia. The treaty touching this alliance was signed at Berlin, on the 26th of January, 1791, by Sir Morton Eden on the part of the King of England, as the representatives on behalf of his Prussian Majesty. By the first article of this treaty the marriage portion guarantee to his Royal Highness was stated to be 100,000 crowns in Fredericks d'or, viz. 40,000 as being the usual portion of the Princesses of the House of Prussia, and the remaining 60,000 for "paraphernalia." It was further stipulated, that in case the Princess should happen to die before her husband, without leaving issue, that then both sums should revert to the King and his successors, in as far as her Royal Highness should not have disposed of the latter; but the produce thereof was to belong to his Royal Highness in case he was the survivor. Her Royal Highness was likewise to have her trousseau, or her wedding-suit, supplied by her father. By the third and fourth articles, the Royal Duchess's pin-money was fixed at 4,000*l.* a year, and her morgen-gebe, or present from her husband the day after her marriage, was to be 6,000*l.* And in the fifth article, the King secured to her Royal Highness, if she survived the husband, a jointure of 8,000*l.* a year, with a residence and suitable establishment. The King, in his speech on the opening of Parliament, on the 31st Jan. 1792, communicated to both Houses the important change which had taken place in his family, and invited the Commons to consider of the means of enabling him to keep his engagements with his brother of Prussia. This part of the Speech from the Throne elicited considerable discussion in Parliament, the great disparity of the pecuniary advances and settlements made by the respective Courts being the principal topics of observation; and although no positive disapprobation of the match itself was expressed, yet an opinion not very favourable to the stipulations by which it was accompanied was indicated. In the result, however, the House voted to his Royal Highness, in addition to his then income of 12,000*l.* a-year, an additional annuity of 25,000*l.*, in consideration of his matrimonial alliance. Upon the 5th of April, the Address in which this provision was embodied was carried to the foot of the throne by the Speaker, and it expressed the entire approbation of the House in the step which had been taken, and a hope that the provision made would be thought worthy of the occasion.

On the arrival of the Royal party in England, they were remarried at St. James's the 24th of November.

His Royal Highness was now called into actual and severe public service. Troops were embarked for Holland, and the Duke of York was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the army on the Continent. On the 4th of September, 1793, his Royal Highness was defeated by the French, near Dunkirk. Nothing particular transpired till the 3d of May, 1794, when the French attacked him, but were driven back; the enemy, however, quickly re-appeared in the field, and gave a second battle to the Duke's forces at Turcoign, whom they defeated with great slaughter. It was in the year 1794, at the battle of Tournay, that his Royal Highness narrowly escaped being taken prisoner.

In the battle of Tournay, in 1794, the English Army was quite surrounded by the French, and no resource was left but to cut their way through an enemy infinitely superior in numbers; this was no sooner thought of than measures were adopted for the purpose. The French, however, not daring to oppose so brave a band, made a lane for them to pass through, and coolly received them on each side with showers of musketry.

In this movement his Royal Highness the Duke of York narrowly escaped being made prisoner. Accompanied by an Austrian General, and two other officers, he reached a village which had been taken the preceding day from the enemy, and supposing it still in the hands of the allies, they rode through it at full gallop. In turning the corner of one of the streets rather sharply, they discovered that the village was then in the hands of the French, and a column of the enemy facing them; the latter, supposing the Duke was at the head of a body of troops, at first fled, after having fired a volley at them, which killed the Austrian General by the side of his Royal Highness. Recovering, however, from this error, the French pursued the Duke and his two companions until they came near a river. The Duke threw himself off his horse, and so did one of the officers, and they waded through the river, the third taking the water with his horse. All this was done under the fire of the French, who had brought a six-pounder to bear upon them. On the other side of the river, the Duke fortunately met with a led horse of Capt. Murray's, which he mounted, and thus arrived in safety at Tournay.

His Royal Highness now retreated to Flanders, where he was soon joined by the Earl of Moira and additional forces. Having effected a junction with Lord Moira, the Duke stationed his troops near Breda and Bois le Duc, but from that position he was forced to retire to Grave. He was afterwards driven from Nimeguen, and finally our forces were under the necessity of abandoning all hope of making an impression against France in that quarter. The accounts which we have of the sufferings and privations of the unhappy men can only be exceeded by those of the French in the expedition to Russia. But his Royal Highness took every pains, and made every possible provision for promoting the comfort of the soldiers, and had his orders been complied with, it is certain the poor men would not have been left to endure such a weight of misery. His Royal Highness took his departure in the beginning of December for England. On the 13th of September, 1799, his Royal Highness landed in Holland, and took the command of an army of 36,000 men, of whom 17,000 were Russians. On the 19th of the same month he attacked the French near Alkmaer, but in consequence of the want of discipline or courage of the Russians, he was obliged to retreat. On the 3d of October he again attacked the French, and succeeded in defeating them. "Under the Divine Providence this signal victory," says his Royal Highness, "obtained over the enemy is to be ascribed to the animated and persevering exertions which have been at all times characteristics, and which on no occasion were ever more eminently displayed; nor has it often fallen to the lot of any General to have such just cause of acknowledgment for distinguished support." His Royal Highness then in the most liberal manner mentions the great obligations he was under to several under his command. At length, after further unavailing efforts on the part of our army, a suspension of arms was agreed upon, and finally the British troops embarked for England, along with the Russians, and prisoners were given up on both sides.

Thus ended those expeditions.

In obedience to the dictates of impartial history, we now proceed to a passage in the life of his Royal Highness, which, for the sake of morality, and out of regard to the memory of the Royal Duke, we would gladly have avoided. Our readers will immediately anticipate that we allude to the history of his unfortunate connexion with Mrs. Clarke, and its consequences. Rumour at first began to be busy respecting the official purity of the Duke of York. The vague charges which were thus set afloat, soon embodied themselves in the defined shapes of pamphlets, letters, &c. Those who are acquainted with the history of this era will not forget the eagerness with which the higher officers of justice attempted, by multiplied prosecutions, to intimidate the press. The Court of King's Bench was literally oppressed with the number of informations for libel, the principal portion of them relating to the case of supposed corruption on the part of the Duke of York. Insinuations in the beginning, and direct assertions ultimately, were circulated that such was the mighty influence exercised by Mrs. Clarke over the mind of his Royal Highness, and so notorious was that influence, that ladies and gentlemen of the highest rank became her humble suitors for military promotions for their friends—nay, it was well known even that Divines of the Church of England had, for a time, considered her as the fountain of ecclesiastical preferment. The newspapers of the day, teemed with paragraphs, some mysteriously alluding to these transactions, others more openly and explicitly condemning this corrupt and injudicious system of military administration. The cry of licentiousness and jacobinism was immediately raised against the authors or circulators of these reports, and to mention the existence of intercourse between the Duke and Mrs. Clarke, and to say that the lady was allowed to possess the least controul in military arrangements, were described as overt acts of treason, the tendency of which was to overthrow the House of Brunswick, the Constitution, and all the most valuable institutions of our country. This language was repeated in various quarters, and sanctioned by legal processes on the part of the functionaries of public justice. It was, therefore, under no small disadvantage that Col. Wardle, until that period unknown, stood in to the character of an accuser, the accused being one of the most distinguished and influential persons in the country.

On Friday, the 27th of January, 1809, Colonel Wardle introduced the whole subject in the House of Commons. He began by a modest apology for his own unworthiness, and spoke of the diffidence of the enterprise he had undertaken, which was not a little enhanced by the rank and Parliamentary influence of the accused party. He then expatiated on the height to which corruption had risen in the disposal of military patronage, alluded to the improper connection which subsisted between the Commander-in-Chief and Mrs. Clarke, and submitted five cases of corruption to the House, which he was prepared with adequate information to substantiate. The first case was that of Torryn. He paid Mrs. Clarke five hundred pounds on being promoted to the rank of Major; or more correctly speaking, this sum was paid to a silversmith on Mrs. Clarke's account, in part payment for a service of plate which had been ordered for the establishment of herself and his Royal Highness. The second case was that of an exchange which was effected between two Colonels (Brooke and Knight), and for which Mrs. Clarke received the sum of two hundred pounds. The third case was of a different description to any of the former. The charge in this instance was, that two most meritorious officers who mutually wished to exchange, were prevented from doing so, in consequence of their inability to make the customary presents which were expected on such occasions. The fourth case was more important than any of the former. A Major Shaw had, after repeated negotiations, obtained from Mrs. Clarke the assurance that he should receive the appointment of Deputy Barrack-master at the Cape of Good Hope, upon payment to her of the sum of 1,000*l.* He ultimately received the appointment, but was enabled to make good to Mrs. Clarke no more of the promised sum than 500*l.* The lady complained to the Commander-in-Chief, and the unhappy defaulter, instead of going out to enjoy his splendid income in the Cape of Good Hope, was kept at home, and forthwith reduced to half-pay. The fifth case was that of the levy. In the year 1804, Colonel French was appointed, through Mrs. Clarke's influence, to conduct a levy. He was to pay over to her a guinea of the bounty of each man, together with the sale or patronage of commissions to a certain extent. A loan was also to be raised by the same party for the use of the Duke of York, for which he was to obtain a considerable sum of money from Government for Colonel French, under pretence of being a reward for his services in the levy. The last case brought forward related to Captain Maling. This gentleman, through the influence of Mrs. Clarke, was first appointed to an ensigncy, and successively to the rank of Lieutenant and Captain, he being all the while acting as clerk in a public office, without ever having handled a sword, even for the sake of form. Such were the charges which were brought forward, and with the statement of which Col. Wardle prefaced a motion for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the conduct of the Commander-in-Chief with regard to promotions and exchanges in the army. The charges against the Duke of York were treated as the results of a seditious conspiracy, particularly by Lord Castlereagh and the Ministerial Members. The present Duke of Wellington was then a Member of the House, and warmly espoused the cause of the Duke of York, observing that his Royal Highness was entitled to the highest praise for the well-appointed state of the army, and expressing his satisfaction that at last specific charges, such as could be met, were brought against the Duke of York. After some debate the House agreed to receive the evidence that might be adduced by the accuser in a Committee of the whole House. The evidence was then gone through, the hearing of which occupied a considerable portion of the time of the House. Mrs. Clarke was a principal witness. On the 9th of March, the case being closed, Mr. Wardle moved an Address thereupon, in which, after reciting substantially the nature of the evidence, and the inferences to be drawn from it, he expressed an opinion that the Duke of York ought to be removed from his office of Commander-in-Chief. This motion gave rise to a long debate. Several amendments were proposed, one by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, declaring the innocence of the Duke; another by Mr. B. Bathurst, declaring him to be guilty, at the same time acknowledging his great official services.

Next day, Mr. Bankes proposed another amendment, much to the same effect as that by Mr. Bathurst. The amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was carried by a great majority. From the 10th to the 17th of March this debate was continued. On the 17th, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed some amendment in the resolutions already agreed to, which was finally inserted, but made no substantial variance in the resolution. However, whilst these debates were about to close, his Royal Highness waited upon the King, and tendered him his resignation in a written document, which commences in these terms:—

"The House of Commons, after a long and full investigation of the merits of certain allegations against him, passed a resolution of his innocence; he might now approach his Majesty, and venture to tender to him his resignation of the Chief Command of his Majesty's Army, as he could no longer be suspected of acting from any apprehension of the result, or be accused of having shrunk from the extent of an enquiry, from which, painful as it had been, he trusted he should appear, even to those who had been disposed to condemn his conduct, to have met with the patience and firmness which could only arise from a conscious feeling of innocence." Sir David Dundas was the successor of his Royal Highness, but the latter was in a very short time reinstated in his office. In his retirement, the Duke of York endeavoured to console himself in the society of his friends. His table was the resort of the fashionable, and the Court Circular teemed with the accounts of his brilliant entertainments. In the meantime the charge and the proceedings upon it in the House of Commons made a sensible impression throughout the country. Addresses of thanks were forwarded from various places to Colonel Wardle, eulogising his patriotic exertions and thanking him for the services which he had rendered to the state. Dinners in various places followed, at which Col. Wardle was invited, and his popularity appeared to be extending itself every day. He was toasted as the undaunted champion of free inquiry, and the vindicator of the abuses under which this country was groaning. A medal was struck by Mr. Bisset, of Birmingham, with a bust of Col. Wardle, and appropriate mottoes.

The restoration of his Royal Highness to the Command of the Army was a measure that gave gratification to the military generally; and we have no doubt, from the manner in which he performed the duties of that office, that it was one also very beneficial to the public service.

In the year 1820 the Duchess of York died, after having endured a lingering and painful disease.

Shortly afterwards his Royal Highness drew the attention of the public towards him by a declaration of his intention to sit and vote during the Queen's trial. Her Majesty's Advocate was induced to notice the circumstance; and, in alluding to his Royal Highness personally, taunted him with being the object of a condemnatory resolution in 1809, which was proposed by Mr. Bathurst, who, at the moment when he (Mr. Brougham) was speaking, was a Member of that Cabinet by which the Queen was prosecuted. The memorable speech which his Royal Highness delivered in Parliament on the 25th of April 1825, on the subjects of the Catholic claims. This celebrated address has been too much the subject of recent commentary to require any description in this place. Whatever were the feelings of others on the subject of it, nothing can be more certain, than that his Royal Highness spoke with the most perfect sincerity, and under a sacred consciousness that he was right. Having now brought this hasty sketch to a close, we have merely to add—what those who were acquainted with his character well knew—that in private life he was sincerely respected and beloved as an amiable, affable, kind, and warm-hearted man. He readily lent a hand to distress, whenever it was in his power to relieve it; and it was often observed of him, that he underwent frequent struggles when cases came before him in which it was impossible for him to reconcile the granting of favours which would be inconsistent with the rigid administration of his public duty. In his official capacity, his merit is attested by the state of discipline in which the army is now kept, by the fairness with which honours are granted, and by the general good conduct and sense of honour which are infused into the profession. If he had not the praise of being the originator of all those salutary regulations himself, yet he had to boast of that which Queen Elizabeth thought the highest praise—namely, placing about him able and intelligent counsellors.

The body of his Royal Highness will be removed almost immediately to Windsor.

His Royal Highness was in his sixty-fourth year.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

A REGULAR BUILT SAILOR.

John Hall, the "veteran," who has of late created so much annoyance at the Admiralty, was put to the bar, on an indictment, charging him with creating a riot, and assaulting the messengers at the Admiralty, on the 23d September last.

Mr. Horace Twiss appeared for the prosecution, and the prisoner having been placed at the bar, was asked by the clerk, in the usual form, whether he was guilty or not guilty.

Prisoner—Guilty of what?

Clerk—Are you guilty of the assault with which you are charged, or not?

Prisoner—Why, if that's what you mean, I am guilty. All I want is to be protected from starving; I want a place to poke my nut in during the cold winter.

Mr. Nutland, of the Admiralty, observed, the prisoner had been placed in Greenwich Hospital, but had made what is termed a "row" amongst the seamen. He, Mr. Nutland, had no wish to say any thing further on the occasion at present.

Prisoner—I went out on liberty, and stopped a little too long; but what of that—eh?

Mr. Nutland said the prisoner had, in consequence of his services, received the same humane attentions that all other subjects who had served their country were entitled to and received. He had been placed in the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, after having been an out-pensioner; but his conduct had been such as to cause his dismissal. He had then petitioned the Board, which petition had been referred to the Lords of the Admiralty, who had decided against him. In the month of September last the prisoner again came to the Admiralty, and committed an assault on several of the messengers, in consequence of which he was sent to Tothill-fields, where he remained for six weeks, and was then liberated, the Lords of the Admiralty considering he had been sufficiently punished. The prisoner again came to the Admiralty, and demanded a "pass" to Bury. This was granted to him, and 5s. were given to him. He then appeared very thankful, and went away, but returned again in the month of December.

Prisoner—Is a man to be starved to death in the street? Give me a hole to poke my head in.

Chairman—Do you wish to ask any question of the witness? You have heard what he has said; is it true?

Prisoner—Yes, I believe it is true. What can I say? All I want of you is, that you'll take care of me. Send me where you like, I don't care where.

The Chairman, in the most feeling manner, endeavoured to convince the prisoner of the folly of his proceeding in the obstinate course he was pursuing.

One of the junior messengers proved the assault, to the same effect as that adduced at the police office.

Chairman—Well, prisoner, have you any questions to put to his witness.

Prisoner—No, Sir, but I really did not mean any harm to any body.

Mr. Horace Twiss—Gentlemen, I feel it my duty to ask the last witness a few questions.

The witness was again called, and described the prisoner to have acted in the most riotous manner.

Prisoner—You shoved me in the mud, and I only took my coat off to clean it.

Chairman—If you are sent to a gaol, you will be placed under prison discipline, and kept on bread and water. Really let me advise you not to act so violently.

Prisoner—Well, Sir, you may do as you like, but mind me, Sir, A contented mind is a constant feast. (Loud laughter.) Why curse it, it is no use to send me down for three or four days, after being twenty-eight years in the service, send me down for life at once, and then I'll have something to trust to.

By a Juror—Prisoner, what do you say; have you been 28 years in the service?

Prisoner—I have; 25 years' service, as appears by my certificate, but three years' are not accounted for in that.

Mr. Horace Twiss here said, he felt bound to state, that the prisoner had stolen two dogs, and fearing he should be brought to punishment, he had absconded.

Prisoner—I defy God Almighty, much less man, to prove that. I here charged a very highly respected gentlemen connected with the Navy with having told him to go to Lancashire, and teach the rebels the exercise. I have, said he, fought while I was able, and now I'm getting old, I may go to hell.

Chairman—It is clear, prisoner you have acted very wrong.

Prisoner—I don't want to trouble you, Sir; do what you will with me. All I want is to be put somewhere, so that I may be sheltered.

The prisoner was then removed from the bar, and a consultation was held as to the best mode of taking care of the unfortunate man. The general impression was, that his mind was affected.

Mr. Horace Twiss said, no severity was looked for on the part of his clients.

Chairman—Can the prisoner find bail?

This was answered in the negative, and Mr. Nodder, the Governor of Tothill-fields prison, having informed the Bench that the prisoner had had no one to see him since his confinement, the Chairman said, the Court would take time to consider of the judgment that would be passed on him.

From the Monthly Review.—The author of the new novel "Almacks" has contrived to exhibit the most ample, the most animated, and we suspect the most accurate, picture of what is called "high life" in this country, which has ever yet met the public eye. There is no ambition to produce effect, no artificial mixture of the tragic with the comic—it seems to have been the single object of the writer to give a natural representation of the manners, the conversation, and in short the every-day employments of the aristocratic circles: and she has succeeded to the fullest extent. She has laid open the whole interior of fashionable and exclusive society, from the rank of the Duke down to the valet, and though her characters are all masqued under heteroneous names, yet we feel that they have all of them figured, and perhaps still figure, in the very scenes where she employs them. The value of a work of this kind is inestimable.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET. — The very interesting little drama, in which Mr. Helena Bligh has been flourishing away as Prima Donna lately, was brought up on Thursday for a second representation at this office, before Mr. Conant the Magistrate, and a crowded audience.

The dramatis personæ on this occasion were much more numerous and efficient than at the first representation, for when the piece began there were on the stage at the same time, Mrs. Helena Bligh; Mrs. Susannah Scott, of affidavit-making memory; Mr. George Scott, husband to the said Susannah; Mr. Miller, the friend of said husband; John Randal, joint coachman to Mr. Long Wellesley, residing at No. 4, Hall-place, St. John's-wood; and Mrs. Helena Bligh, lately removed from No. 10, St. John's-wood-road, to No. 35, Baker-street; Mr. Harmer, solicitor to John Randal; Mr. Hutchinson's clerk, as solicitor to George Scott; Mr. Powel, the solicitor of Mr. Long Wellesley; and several other attendants, too numerous to mention in a hand-bill.

Mr. George Scott having re-stated, as on the former day, how he went, by the desire of his wife, to the house of Mrs. Bligh, to request of that lady the surrender of certain wearing apparel and other property belonging to his said wife, and unlawfully detained by the said Mrs. Bligh—how he was accompanied in his said visit by his friend Mr. Miller—how, when he asked to be introduced by the servant when he opened the door, into the presence of Mrs. Bligh, John Randal suddenly made his appearance, and in a twinkling, hurled him, the said George Scott, into the middle of Baker-street, like a foot-ball;—having stated all this, he called his friend Mr. Miller, as a witness, who fully confirmed his account of the transaction, and said that Randal, were he even entitled to turn Mr. Scott from the house, used on that occasion about tenfold more force and violence than could be necessary to effect his purpose.

Mr. Harmer asked Scott if he did not represent Mr. Miller at Mrs. Bligh's house to be his legal adviser?

Scott said that he did no such thing; he made no representation at all about his friend then.

Mr. Harmer asked who advised him to go at all to Mrs. Bligh's house and demand those things of which he spoke?

Scott said that his wife asked him to go and request Mrs. Bligh to give him up her clothes, which she detained; that was all the advice he had upon the matter.

Mr. Harmer said that he did not believe that it was by any desire of his wife that he went to Mrs. Bligh's house, but at the instigation of some person behind the curtain, who was urging him on to annoy Mrs. Bligh.

Mr. Harmer having thrown out those and many other observations towards Scott, with a degree of zeal and warmth beyond what the latter seemed to deem necessary for the interests of his client, Scott, in his turn, following so good an example, made himself warm also, and told Mr. Harmer that he had a great deal too much blustering and bullying about him, but that he (Scott) was not to be put down, or driven from his claim to justice, by either of those potent qualities. He again repeated that it was by the desire of his wife, and nobody else, that he went to Mrs. Bligh's house, and all Mr. Harmer's insinuations to the contrary were totally unfounded. His wife was present, and could give evidence as to the fact.

Mrs. Scott here stepped forward to be sworn as to this point; but Mr. Harmer objected to her, as an incompetent witness to give evidence in her husband's case.

Mr. Conant said, that it was rather unfair in Mr. Harmer to refuse belief to what the man said on the subject, and then to shut him out from the means of proving his statement true.

Mr. Hutchinson's clerk said that it was most unjust and groundless to insinuate that any person at whom Mr. Harmer hinted had any thing to do with urging Scott on to annoy Mrs. Bligh.

Mr. Conant said that what he was at a loss to understand was, how Randal, as the servant of Mr. Wellesley, had any thing to do with turning any one out of Mrs. Bligh's house, and he wished to hear what Randal had to say in his defence.

Randal said, that being at the house of Mrs. Bligh, to attend upon that lady, by the desire of Mr. Long Wellesley, at the time Scott called, he was desired by Mrs. Bligh to order Scott to quit the house, and on his refusing to do so, she further ordered him to be turned out by force, and in obedience to this order, he (Randal) did put Scott out, but not at all with violence, as was said; he first desired Scott two or three times to quit the house; but he positively refused to do so, until he should get his wife's property, as he said.

Mr. Conant here asked Scott if he did refuse to quit the house when desired to do so?

Scott said that he did say he would no got out until he saw Mrs. Bligh, but not until he got his wife's things, as Randal said.

Mrs. Helena Bligh was now sworn as to any authority she might have given Randal to expel Scott from the house; and she stated that on hearing that Scott was in the house, knowing that he came for no other purpose than to insult and annoy her, she desired that he might be ordered to quit the house; and, on his refusing to do so, she sent to the stables for Randal, the coachman, and gave him directions to turn Scott out by force if he would not go otherwise. She stood at the top of the stairs all the time, and saw and heard all that passed on the occasion, and she distinctly heard Randal several times desire Scott to quit the house before he used any force, and then all the violence he made use of was to put Scott as gently as possible out of the door; and as to the assertion that Mrs. Bligh had kept any clothes or other property belonging to Scott's wife, it was totally untrue.

Mrs. Scott said that it was not untrue, as she (Mrs. Bligh) very well knew, for she had detained, at least, things of hers (Scott's) to the value of 30l.

Mr. Harmer said that Mrs. Scott never made any claim upon Mrs. Bligh until she was discharged.

Mr. Hutchinson's clerk said that such an observation was very unfair and equally unfounded, for the truth was, that up to this moment, Mrs. Scott has never been discharged at all by Mrs. Bligh.

Mr. Conant said, that under all the circumstances, and considering that Scott himself acknowledged that he refused to quit the house when told to do so, and that Mrs. Bligh, to whom the house belonged, ordered the defendant to turn him out by force, he, Mr. Conant, thought the justice of the case would be sufficiently answered by discharging the warrant altogether.

The warrant was accordingly discharged, and Mrs. Bligh, who was elegantly dressed in furs, feathers, and flounces, languished out of the office, dangling on the arm of Mr. Powel, the solicitor of Mr. Long Wellesley in the Chancery cause, who very gallantly handed her into her splendid carriage that stood in waiting for her at the office door. It is a curious coincidence, and of course quite accidental, that this lady's carriage is adorned with a coat of arms exactly similar to that of the Wellesley family, and that her servants wear precisely the same sort of livery as the Duke of Wellington's servants. As Mrs. Bligh was walking out of the office, Scott, the complainant, pointing towards her, said aloud, "There goes the woman that I have so often watched going into a common brothel."

This epilogue over, the performance ended.

The Romance, on the eve of appearance, under the title of "The Natchez," is reported to be the chef d'œuvre of Chateaubriand. The hero, we understand, is a North American warrior, who, after undergoing various extraordinary adventures in his native wilds, is supposed to be brought to Paris in the reign of Louis XIV., and to be introduced to the wit and beauty of that metropolis. His actions and conversations in the refined society of Fenelon, Racine, Moliere, Ninon, and others of that age, must be highly curious and interesting.—Morning Post.

EXECUTION.

On Tuesday the sentence of the law was executed upon Thomas Charles White, aged 23, for arson, and Amelia Roberts, aged 30, convicted of robbing Mr. Austin, her master, of property of the value of 400l. and upwards. There were three other culprits included in the death-warrant, but on Monday night a respite during pleasure arrived at Newgate for Riley (the paramour of Roberts), and a reprieve for a week for Bishop and Houghton.

At an early hour in the morning a crowd was collected in the front of Newgate, and a number of respectable persons were seated at the windows in view of the platform, for which accommodation a considerable sum was paid several days ago. As a great crowd was anticipated, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs properly ordered additional barriers to be put up, to prevent any catastrophe from the pressure; and extra constables were sworn in, to keep order, and prevent robbery and accidents. A little after six o'clock the Rev. Mr. Cotton and Mr. Baker arrived at Newgate, and visited the several apartments where the two malefactors were confined. The unfortunate persons received their spiritual advisers with gladness, and readily listened to the consolations they had to offer. About seven o'clock the female prisoner was taken from her own room to that occupied by Mr. White, in order to join with him in the participation of the sacrament.

When they met as companions in misfortune, the female addressed some conversation indirectly to Mr. White, and expressed a hope that they should have fortitude to bear them up under the present circumstances, and meet with a gracious reception at the bar of God. When the Reverend Ordinary proposed the administration of the sacrament, of the nature and intent of which they had been previously informed, White asked whether it would not be better to pray a short time first. He then knelt down and invoked Heaven in an extempore address, in which he acknowledged his guilt and the justice of his sentence. The female also prayed for a short time in very appropriate language: her conduct has been such during her imprisonment, and her humble fortitude such, as the hour of death approached, that she gained the admiration as well as pity of all who had access to her.

About a quarter before eight, the Sheriffs and Under Sheriffs proceeded to the lower condemned room, into which White was conducted by his Reverend attendant. After a short conversation with the Sheriffs, the officers commenced tying his wrists, during which time Mr. Cotton and Mr. Wontner the Governor exhorted him to with raw his thoughts from worldly objects, and direct them to the Throne of Grace for mercy. White replied, that he trusted in the mercy of God. Mr. Wontner asked him how he had passed the night? He said, "Bless God, I slept three hours." At the prisoner's request, his arms were bound with two silk handkerchiefs, instead of a cord. During the time this operation was performing, a bystander observed Mr. White bulge himself out as much as possible, so that after the handkerchiefs were tied his arms might have more play; and it was observed that he was not securely bound. The sequel proved the truth of this conjecture. The ill-fated man was then conducted towards the front of the prison. On his way he was joined by his female fellow-sufferer, who had previously withdrawn for the officers of the Sheriffs to pinion her arms, &c. The prison-bell then began to toll, and the Ordinary read a portion from the burial service. When they reached the debtors'-door, White ascended the scaffold with a firm step, and looked earnestly upon the dense crowd by whom he was surrounded. He stood as if listening attentively to the clergyman, while the executioners were performing their solemn duty; but no sooner had they left him, than by a violent effort, the want of tightness in the handkerchiefs caused him to regain the use of his arms, and he instantly pulled off his cap and threw it down. The bandage having fallen to his elbows, the officers were forced to bind him again, during which time the populace uttered the most discordant yells, as if directed to the executioners; but we have learned that not the least blame attached to them in this instance. During this delay the female continued in the lobby with Mr. Baker, where she engaged in constant prayer. When called to the scaffold, she rose obediently, and, considering her sex, and the dreadful death she was about to die, displayed uncommon firmness. Just as the noise intimated to White that the platform was about to fall, he made another violent effort, and leaped forward and gained foothold on the stationary plank; his arms were again at liberty, and he instantly clung with both hands to the rope above his head, and thus he remained in an oblique position, until he was pulled down by mere force. Before this was effected, Roberts appeared to have ceased to struggle. White having resolutely refused to have the cap replaced on his head, exhibited an appalling spectacle during his convulsive struggles, but fortunately the noose fixed in its proper place, so that it did not appear that his perverse obstinacy caused the culprit's agony to be protracted.

Murder of Mr. Moncrieff, the English Traveller.—This celebrated traveller has fallen a victim to robbers on the frontiers of Buchara, where he was attacked, and with all his companions murdered. The intelligence has been conveyed to Berlin from Orenburg, and from the former place to this country. The last accounts from Mr. Moncrieff left him at Cashemere. From that place he sent to ask permission of the Government of Kashgar to go to Buchara, to purchase horses. This was refused, and he was obliged to take another route, and proceed through Cabul. The caravan of the English, when it reached Buchara, consisted of 150 camels, with which there were seven Englishmen. The remainder were hired Indians and Athgans. The Khan of Buchara was then at war with some of his rebellious nobility, and the English afforded him assistance in quelling them. The Khan wished them to enter his service, but they refused, and left Buchara without permission. Soon after they had left the frontier, they were attacked and all murdered. The Indians and Afhgans hired by the English were suffered to go free. This is a further proof how the people of central Asia distrust Europeans, and of the imminent danger which attends travelling in that part of the world.

A SEASONABLE ADDRESS FOR THE YEAR 1827.

To Britain's fair daughters, supremely who grace
Of Beauty by mental endowment, the race,
And Life, when by Care deeply shrouded in gloom,
With blandishment sweet tranquillize and relume,
A Happy New Year, and in joyfulness pass'd,
May each prove with pleasure replete as the last!
So wish in sincerity Rowland and Son,
While trusting that, as the New Year has begun
With augmented patronage, so it may tend
Propitiously, years yet unborn, to the end!

Kalydor, beyond e'en the dreams of romance,
To radiance that will the complexion advance,
And Macassar Oil, that of attributes high,
Luxuriant and fine glossy tresses supply,
Prepared are by Rowland and Son, who alone
The Genuine Kalydor and Macassar own,
For base imitations of both are sent forth
For sale, not for use, but the intrinsic worth
Of Rowland's unerring specifics unfurl'd,
Confess'd is throughout the whole civilized world!

Ye then, on the opening New Year who incline
Acceptable offering to make at the shrine
Of Beauty, and female affection engage,
Chuse Rowland's Kalydor and Macassar Oil
As gifts, that presented to youth or to age,
Esteem'd are at home, and on far distant soil.
And fail not with absent acquaintance to prove
Most welcome memento of Friendship and Love.

The same calm has pervaded the Money Market during the past week as the preceding. The Foreign Market is still deserted. Yesterday, Consols for the Account commenced heavy, and after some fluctuation closed at 86¼. Among the inventions of the speculators may be noticed the report that the King of Spain had refused to accede to the demands of the French Government, and that the troops of the King of France were preparing to quit Madrid.

DEATH OF THE DUKE OF YORK.

His Royal Highness had laboured under a dropsy since the month of July last, for the relief of which his Royal Highness underwent an operation on the 3d of September.

The result of this operation, aided by the favourable effects of medicine afterwards, was the removal of the constitutional complaint; but its partial influence on the limbs, producing a mortification of a considerable portion of the skin of both legs, subsequently brought his Royal Highness's valuable life into danger; and although this was checked, and hung in suspense for a time, the powers of his frame sunk ultimately in the struggle.

His Royal Highness was informed early that his situation was not free from danger; yet he bore his protracted illness with a steadiness of heart—an evenness of temper—and a pious resignation to the will of his Creator, accompanied, nevertheless, with a solicitude about his recovery, which were very remarkable; and as his mind was not affected by his disease, he continued to perform all the duties of his high office of Commander-in-Chief, with his usual punctuality and quickness. Indeed, among the last acts of his official life, was that arrangement for the benefit of the Old Lieutenants, who cannot afford to purchase, which had for some time engaged his attention, and which was laid before the King, by his express desire, for his Majesty's approbation. the day before he took leave of worldly affairs, as it were, and received the Sacrament from the Bishop of London.

His Royal Highness expired on Friday evening at twenty minutes past nine.

From nine o'clock on Friday morning, his Royal Highness had been wholly incapable of taking any kind of sustenance. A few hours before his decease, upon one of his medical attendants asking him whether he felt any pain, his Royal Highness replied, "No, Sir," in a feeble but distinct voice. He sunk into the arms of death without the least struggle—like one falling into a calm sleep—so completely was he exhausted by the protracted continuance of his disorder.

His Royal Highness had passed a very restless night on Thursday, and towards noon on Friday, became alarmingly worse. The change which took place indicated to his medical attendants his approaching dissolution. Sir Henry Halford, in consequence, despatched Dr. Macmichael to the College of Physicians, to announce that it would be impossible for him to leave his Royal Patient, and preside at a meeting, which was to have been held there in the afternoon. Mr. M'Gregor also caused it to be intimated to his various patients, in the course of the day, that he should be unable to attend them.

About one o'clock, his Royal Highness sunk into a state of insensibility, for the first time, as we understand, during the whole of his illness. He continued thus during the afternoon, but with some short intervals of consciousness; and it was in one of these intervals that the question above-mentioned was put to him, and to which he replied as we have described.

At four o'clock, Mr. White, the King's Messenger, was despatched to Windsor, to apprise the King of the near approach of that event, for which his Majesty had been prepared in the course of the preceding day. From this hour, up to the moment when his Royal Highness expired, there was no visible change in his situation. The whole of his medical attendants remained in his chamber till he breathed his last. His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex was also present.

Another express was immediately despatched to Windsor, when the melancholy scene was closed; as well as Messengers to the different branches of the Royal Family, to Mr. Secretary Peel, to the Lord Chamberlain's office, &c.

Soon after the Duke of Sussex (who was exceedingly affected) and the medical attendants had left Rutland House, Mr. Mash, of the Lord Chamberlain's office, arrived, and, after sending for Mr. Bailey, of Mount-street, that gentleman was left in possession of the Royal body.

NEW HIGH SCHOOL OF EDINBURGH.—DONATION FROM HIS MAJESTY.—The Lord Provost has received the following letter from Lord Melville:—

"Admiralty, 26th December.

"My Lord—I have the satisfaction to acquaint your Lordship, that the sum of 500*l.* has been placed in my hands by his Majesty's commands, to be applied towards completing the building now erecting for the High School, Edinburgh. I inclose herewith an order for the amount of his Majesty's gracious donation.

"I have the honour to be, my Lord,
"Your Lordship's most obedient and faithful servant,
(Signed) "MELVILLE."

DESPERATE BATTLE WITH POACHERS.—Between two and three o'clock on Friday se'nnight, the keepers (six in number) employed to protect the woods in the manor of Sulhampstead, were alarmed by hearing several shots fired, and on proceeding towards the spot they observed a brilliant light in the middle of a high tree: on nearer approach, they discovered it to be a lamp affixed to a pole which a man was holding up, and several of his companions were anxiously looking into the tree, to discover the pheasants at roost. The keepers immediately seized the fellow who carried the lamp, and an alarm being given, a body of poachers, amounting to twenty in number, immediately surrounded the keepers, furiously attacking them with the butts of their guns and large bludgeons. The keepers being a determined, though little band, maintained the fight against these superior numbers with great bravery, for near two hours, inflicting many heavy blows on their antagonists, but as might be expected in such a long struggle, were themselves severely beaten. Nevertheless, they held their prisoner, till a cowardly fellow fired at the keeper, and wounded him dangerously in the thigh, which forced him to let go his hold. The man who fired was immediately knocked down by another of the keepers, and his gun secured, which proves to be a very old one, recently repaired in two places, in a particular manner, which it is expected will be the means of discovering the owner. The poachers now made off, leaving also a hat, and several pieces of their clothes, torn off during the battle, in the possession of the keepers. Fifty pounds is offered for a discovery of the offenders, and a free pardon, as well as the reward, to any accomplice who will give information, except to the man who actually fired at the keeper.—Reading Mercury.

SPORTING.

TATTERSALL'S, JAN. 4.

The attendance on Thursday afternoon was highly respectable, owing to the great anxiety which existed respecting the St. Leger Nominations, and which were not received till late in the afternoon. There are Sixty-three North Country, and Twenty-nine South Country Entries, so that, notwithstanding it is less numerous than last year, the field will be large. We give the odds on the three stakes.

DETECTION OF A BASE COIN MANUFACTORY.—The following are the particulars of the caption of the parties who have undergone several examinations at Hatton-garden, charged with being extensive manufacturers of base coin, in the Vauxhall-road. The officers procured admission into the adjoining house, from the yard of which they descended, and got in by the back door. On their approach, one of the officers observed the prisoners at a bench at work. The moment the prisoner observed him, he retreated; the officers broke open the door, and one of the prisoners attempted to make his escape through the hall-door, but was too closely pursued, and he was not able to effect his object. The other ran up stairs, the officers following him. He succeeded in getting into the back drawing-room, and ran towards a cupboard, and, touching a spring, a trap-door in the floor sprung up, down which he attempted to get, but the officers caught him as he was descending; had he succeeded in getting into it unseen, it would have been impossible for him to have been discovered. On examination of the house, the officers found, in a cellar underground, upwards of 1,000 sovereigns, a press of half a ton weight, besides several hundred dies, and a lathe. The floor of the cellar, as well as the walls, was all covered with matting, and the chimney was stuffed with it, so as to prevent their being heard.

TERMINATION OF THE CORK ELECTION.—Tuesday, it being decided on by the friends of Mr. Callaghan to terminate the contest, it was soon known about the avenues to the court, and in a short time the crowds that assembled to gain admission were even greater than at the commencement of the election. At four o'clock the booth was closed, and all rushed to the Guildhall, where the gross poll was usually declared. Accordingly, after some short delay in the Assessor's Court, Mr. Sheriff Wallis arrived, and, with much difficulty, the clamour being so great, announced the gross poll as follows:—For Mr. Hutchinson, 1,020; Mr. Callaghan, 969; final majority for Mr. Hutchinson, 51. As soon as the poll was declared, the friends and partisans of Mr. Hutchinson exulted in unmeasured terms at the result, and for a long time indulged in boisterous manifestations of satisfaction.

Last week a poulterer in Oxford was convicted in penalties amounting to 190*l.*, for having in his possession 28 pheasants, 7 hares, and 8 partridges.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which fire opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 209, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 1l., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

CHILBLAINS, RHEUMATISM, SPRAINS, &c.

BUTLER'S CAJEPUT OPODELDOC.—Cajeput Oil, which is the basis of this Opodeldoc, has been long esteemed on the Continent, as a remedy for Chronic Rheumatism, Spasmodic Affections, Chilblains, Palsy, Stiffness, and Enlargement of the Joints, Sprains, Bruises, and Deafness; and the experience of late years, in England, proves that it merits the high character given of it by the most eminent in the profession, in those obstinate complaints. Being combined in the form of Opodeldoc, it is rendered more penetrating, and consequently much more efficacious as an external application. Rubbed upon the skin, by means of flannel, or the warm hand, it allays morbid irritation of nerves, invigorates the absorbents, and accelerates the circulation.

Sold in Bottles, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Widmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom also may be had MARSHALL'S UNIVERSAL CERATE, an excellent Remedy for Chilblains when broken; used also in Scalds, Burns, &c.

PILES AND ABSCESS.—A Gentleman, severely afflicted for Forty-four Years, has recently experienced a perfect and almost miraculous Cure of this distressing Complaint! During this long interval he had tried the most eminent of the Faculty in vain, but was, from extreme suffering, at length induced to consult Mr. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur, No. 2, Half Moon-street, Piccadilly, who has perfectly cured him of this long standing, and, as he always considered constitutional complaint, in the short space of eight weeks.—A principle of gratitude to Mr. Van Butchell, as well as humanity to his fellow-sufferers, induces this advertisement.—Real sufferers may see the party by applying any morning before Ten o'clock to Z. BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES. Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.---JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent on them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:---Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies:" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.--JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of "MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is stongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

I've been thinking, I've been thinking
And there's naught—as I'll maintain
Crowns our drinking, crowns our drinking,
Like a sparkle of Champagne!
I've been thinking, &c.

Oh! there's nothing, no, there's nothing,
'Mid our plagues, I'll say again,
Half so soothing, half so soothing,
As a bumper of Champagne!
I've been thinking, &c.

I've been sighing, I've been dying
For a treat, and I protest
I've been trying, I've been buying
At Charles Wright's, the very best.

I've been thinking, I've been thinking,
And there's naught, as I'll maintain,
Crowns our drinking, crowns our drinking,
Like a bumper of Champagne!

Then awhile to Port and Sherry!
Join, my lads! the jovial strain,
And a merry, hey-down-derry
Sing in honour of Champagne.

Why the deuce should we complain,
Jolly hearts! I say again,
Oh, there's nothing, no, there's nothing
Like a bumper of Champagne.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK. Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhea, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence: these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

Principiis obsta; sero medicina paratur.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author. Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add, as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

DIORAMA, REGENT'S PARK will shortly Close, when the present Views, The Interior of Rosslyn Chapel, painted by Mons. Dagnere, and a View of the City of Rouen, taken from Mount St. Catherine's, painted by Mons. Bouton, with various effects of light and shade, producing the most extraordinary illusion to the spectators, will be removed, and TWO NEW VIEWS, which have lately been exhibited in Paris, with great admiration, will be put up.

N.B. Fine weather is not essential for seeing the present Views, as the appearance of sunshine is produced with equal effect on the most cloudy day. The Dimension of each picture is 70 feet by 50—Open daily from 10 till 4 o'clock.

CHINESE LADIES.—Now Exhibiting, at the Grand Saloon, 94, Pall Mall. These elegant and interesting objects of public curiosity, are the only two Female Natives of the Chinese Empire ever seen in Europe; possessing (independent of personal charms) those enviable proofs of consideration and rank in their own country, viz. diminutive Feet about three inches in length, and finger nails of nearly the same extent. The youngest of these inhabitants of the celestial Empire, performs upon various musical Instruments, and frequently accompanies them with her voice. The rich dresses of the Ladies and their Chinese interpreter, together with the splendid decorations of the saloon; including a complete Altar, and offerings to their Deity, exhibit the exact manners and costume of the fashionables of China.—Open from 11 till dusk. Admittance 2s. 6d. Children 1s.

A Letter from W. Drayton, Esq. Sion-Hill, Bath.

TO Mrs. VINCENT, SOLE PROPRIETOR of GOWLAND'S LOTION.

MADAM—I should think myself deficient in duty to society and you were I to withhold my public testimony to the great efficacy of your GOWLAND'S LOTION, which I have seen performed by the administration of it in a case under my own roof.

A young gentleman, aged about seven years, son of a Colonel in the army, was afflicted with a virulent and sore eruption, accompanied with an intolerable itching in the wrists and insteps, the only places of attack of the complaint, and that to so violent a degree as to make it necessary to confine his hands in bags, particularly at night: the complaint resisted various applications from the united consultation of three physicians of eminence, and continued to grow worse under the regimen prescribed, when a lady, who had received a cure of a very bad case of Scurvy in the face, of several years standing, by your Gowland's Lotion, recommended a trial of the same remedy. It was applied under my own inspection—the disease gave way—and three quarts of your Lotion performed a radical cure of a disorder, which had been of about nine years duration, and had baffled the skill of several physicians eminent in their profession.

From my conviction of the above cure I recommended your Gowland's Lotion to a lady whose face exhibited a very disagreeable eruption, (even large pustules, and as one died away another appeared,) so much as to prohibit her coming into company: a Quart of your Gowland's Lotion effected a cure, and she is now free from eruption. I am, Madam, &c.

TREMAINE; or the MAN OF REFINEMENT. The Third Edition, revised.

"We feel assured that no fastidious person, who is at all awake to his own defects, can read 'Tremaine' without being persuaded that it affords most useful and practical lessons of conduct. Our youth look to the poetry, and not to the reality of life; and it is the object of this book to show that the individual who adopts such an idea, mars his own happiness, as much as he fails in his duty towards the community. It is the object of this novel to show, that no fitly occupied innocent occupation which occupies the rest of the world is to be rejected with contempt; that society, if worthy in other respects, is not to be shunned because it is not supereminently refined, and that even the sweets of literature are to be sipped rather than swallowed in a draught."—QUARTERLY REVIEW.

VIVIAN GREY.—SECOND EDITION.—2 vols 18s.

SORE THROATS, HOARSENESS, &c.

BUTLER'S ACIDULATED CAYENNE LOZENGES, are particularly recommended for habitual sore Throats, relaxation of the Uvula; enlargement of the Tonsils, and that description of hoarseness which arises from relaxation of the membranes of the Throat, and the parts contiguous.

The Cayenne Lozenge has been found of great utility to such Persons as are frequently in the habit of speaking in Public; they may therefore advantageously be used in the Senate, at the Bar, and in the Pulpit, and the highest testimony in the Musical World has been advanced in their favour, especially in those cases, where, from the constant use of the voice, or the influence of a humid atmosphere, the membranes have become relaxed, and diminished their tone.

These Lozenges are also recommended as a stimulus, during Field Sports they are refreshing, and prevent sore Throats, Hoarseness, &c. to those who are unaccustomed to exposure in the morning, before the dew has passed off, and in the moist and foggy evenings.

Sold in Boxes, at 2s. and 4s. 6d. by Messrs. BUTLER, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Wilmott, 53, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom, where may be had BUTLER'S ANTIACID LOZENGES of QUININE, for relief of Heartburn, Flatulence, Indigestion, Gouty Affections, and giving tone to the Stomach. FRENCH PAPERS.

By the Paris Papers of Tuesday and Wednesday, including the Etoile dated Thursday, among the various articles relative to the affairs of Portugal and Spain which we have extracted, there is little information to be relied on as authentic. As to the course which the Cabinet of Madrid may ultimately adopt, still nothing decisive is known. The Quotidienne draws, as usual, a favourable picture of the situation of the Portuguese rebels; and Ferdinand's army of observation, to which every successful arrival has added a few thousands, is now made to amount to 24,000 men.

(From the Moniteur of Wednesday, Jan. 10.)

"MADRID, DEC. 28.—Notwithstanding the holydays, which in this country make every day from the 24th of December to the 3d of January a day of festivity, our Ministers have not quitted their cabinets, except to go to mass and to dinner. Messrs. Salmon, Zambrano, and Ballasteros, have of late passed even part of the night in transacting business.

"Two couriers were despatched yesterday by our Government: one is gone with a message to Lisbon; the other with two messages, is gone to Paris and London.

"The Ministry of his Majesty has just caused the sum of 6,000,000 of reals (1,590,000 francs) to be paid into the general Exchequer of the kingdom, out of which two months' salary has been paid to all the tribunals, and two months' arrears to the widows and military on half-pay. It seems that Don Gaspard Remisa, the Treasurer-General, in concert with the Ministers, has negociated Treasury notes in order to be able to make these urgent payments. This is the most positive and opportune measure that the Government could have adopted under present circumstances.

(From the Journal des Debats.)

"VIENNA, DEC. 29.—There is a report here of despatches, addressed by the Chancellery of State to Madrid and Lisbon, in which our Cabinet renews the assurances of its sincere wishes for the restoration of order in Portugal. It is added, that the Infant Don Miguel carries on an active correspondence with the Princess Regent, and that he condemns in the most positive manner the conduct of those who abuse his name, to excite disorders in their country.

"PARIS, JAN. 8.—The Memorial Bordelais of the 4th inst. says—'The Spanish courier which arrived here yesterday brought no news from Portugal, and the letters from Madrid, when they speak of the corps of observation which is forming on the frontiers of the new states, hold out hopes that the peace will not be disturbed.

(From the Constitutionnel of Wednesday.)

"It is said that Sir William A'Court is going to be appointed Ambassador at St. Petersburgh, and that Mr. Lamb, the Minister at Madrid, will be transferred in the same capacity to Lisbon. It is reported that Mr. Lamb has demanded of the Spanish Government, as a preliminary step to complete satisfaction, the dismissal of the Ministers and of all the authorities, civil as well as military, who have concurred in the arming of the Portuguese rebels, and the causing these functionaries to be prosecuted before the tribunals according to the law.

"One hundred thousand muskets have, they say, been just purchased in France by Spain, for 15 francs each, and are to be sent into that country by the way of Bayonne. It is not known who will pay this 1,500,000 francs. If the convents cannot subscribe that sum, M. de Villele will place it, without doubt, as he did the other expenses of the war of Spain, to the account of the budget.

PORTUGAL.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM LISBON, DATED DEC. 27.

The news received to-day from the armies continues to be satisfactory. It was expected that General Clandino would effect his junction with General Azevedo at Mortagoa about this time.

The Marquis d'Anjeja had some fighting near Salamonde, on the confines of Tras-os-Montes, with a corps of rebels, which he defeated.

The Count de Villa Flor was to arrive on the 27th at Guarda, where he would dissolve the Junta established by the rebels.

The Count de Casa Flores, Spanish Ambassador, had on the 26th resumed his diplomatic functions, and every thing would give us reason to hope for the speedy consolidation of our constitutional system, were it not for the assembling of a Spanish army on our frontiers, and for the well-founded diffidence with which the pacific protestations of the Cabinet of Madrid are received here by every body

Lisbon letters of the 27th ult. announce, that the star of the rebels was turning dim, and that the Constitutional Commanders were combining their movements with greater prospect of success than at any former period of the insurrection. At the same time, strong distrust is entertained of the sincerity of the Court of Madrid, by every man of the slightest penetration in Portugal as well as here. From the notes of M. Salmon and M. Casa Flores, no fair conclusion can be drawn, but one quite destructive of all rational confidence in the honest intentions of the writers. There is not, from beginning to end, a single sentence satisfactory to any one of the demands of the Princess Regent, or of the British government; not the slightest hope is held out of a formal recognition of the Portuguese constitution—of a resolution on the part of Ferdinand to dismiss Calomarde—or the Captains-General, who have waged this war upon the ally of Great Britain.

NOTE PRESENTED BY THE MARQUIS DE PALMELLA TO MR. CANNING.

The undersigned Ambassador Extraordinarry and Plenipotentiary from his Most Faithful Majesty, cannot, after the news which has just arrived, of the invasion of the Portuguese territory, with force of arms, by a corps of troops assembled and organized in Spain, delay a moment in addressing to his Excellency Mr. Canning, his Britannic Majesty's principal Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs, a formal demand, in the name of her Highness the Infanta Regent of Portugal, for the support and aid of British troops, in virtue of the treaties of alliance and guarantee which have existed in full force between the two Crowns, without interruption, for more than a century and a half.

It is in pursuance of the express orders of his Government, that the Undersigned claims the fulfilment of the stipulations of the said treaties; and that he has now the honour to repreat in writing, the representations he has already officially made in several conferences with Mr. Canning.

The defensive alliance between Portugal and Great Britain is so directly founded on the permanent interests, political as well as commercial, of both countries, and on their geographical position, that it might be regarded as virtually existing, though it had not been consecrated, as it in fact is, by diplomatic acts, and become, as it were, habitual to both nations. This alliance is coeval (to say nothing of more ancient relations) with the establishment of the Royal House of Braganza on the throne of Portugal, and afterwards with that of the House of Bourbon on the throne of Spain;—those two great events having concurred to induce the Portuguese, on the one hand, to regard England as their natural ally, and the English, on the other, to consider the independence of Portugal, one of the essential conditions of the political balance of Europe. In fine, those ties, formed by mutual relations of compatibility, have too often been cemented on the field of battle to render it necessary to refer to facts, of which some are not only recent but gloriously memorable.

The Undersigned, however, does not confine himself to a mere appeal to the general spirit of the numerous treaties existing between the two crowns. He annexes to this note textual copies of some of the articles of the treaties of 1661, 1703, 1810, and 1815—articles which leave no kind of doubt as to the positive obligations which have been contracted. The undersigned, in the mean time, begs that Mr. Canning will be pleased to allow him to make a rapid analysis of those articles, in doing which he is persuaded it will be easy for him to demonstrate to his Excellency that, according to the spirit and the letter of the said treaties, the casus fœderis has actually occurred.

Articles 15, 16, and 17, and the secret article of the treaty of 1661, expressly stipulates that His Britannic Majesty will always place the interests of Portugal near his heart, and will defend that kingdom and the possessions thereof, with all his power by sea and land, in the same manner as he would England. That whenever Portugal should be invaded, and the King of Portugal should demand aid from his ally, His Britannic Majesty would send, free of expense, forces for the defence of Portugal; and finally, that His Britannic Majesty would defend the conquests and the colonies of the Crown of Portugal against all enemies present and future.

In vain would it be alleged that this treaty had only a special object, and that it ceased to be in force after the peace concluded by Portugal with Spain in 1668; for, 1st, it does not stipulate for a fixed period, but in perpetuity; 2dly, by the first article of 1703 between Portugal and Great Britain, all the preceding treaties are expressly approved, confirmed, and ratified, which, without doubt, comprehend the treaty of 1661; 3dly, the guarantee and promise of assistance to Portugal is given, as is distinctly stated in the above mentioned articles, in consideration of important cessions of territory made by Portugal to England—that is to say, for value received, which England, in a great degree, still possesses.

Articles 2d and 3d of the treaty of alliance concluded in 1703, between the King of Portugal on the one part, and England and the States-General of the United Provinces on the other, specify in a very precise manner the succours which shall be afforded, if it should ever happen that the King of France or the King of Spain, present or future, together or separately, should make war on Portugal. This treaty is perpetual, and any objection which might be advanced on the ground of its comprehending the States-General conjointly with his Britannic Majesty would not be valid—

1. Because, according to the doctrines of the law of nations, the defection of one of two associated parties does not annul the obligations contracted by the other.

2. Because the relations between the United Provinces and Portugal have ceased in consequence of posterior wars, and in particular on account of their not being renewed since the latter state has undergone a change of form; but it is not the same with regard to the relations of Portugal with England, which have not for a single moment experienced any interruption.

3. Above all, because the said treaty, like every other between the Crowns of Portugal and Great Britain, has been revived and confirmed by subsequent treaties; and it will be sufficient to add, that in the treaty of alliance of 1810, one of the stipulations of the treaty of 1703 is referred to as existing. (See article 1.)

The act of guarantee of the treaty of Utrecht, between Portugal and Spain, formally declares that his Britannic Majesty engages on his Royal word, to take care that the said treaty shall be inviolably observed.

Finally, the treaty of Vienna of 1815, between his most faithful Majesty, and his Britannic Majesty, declares (article 3) that all the treaties of alliance, friendship, and guarantee, anterior to that of 1810, are renewed by the two high contracting parties, and that they recognise the existence of those treaties in full force and vigour.

It seems useless to add other stipulations and other arguments to prove the existence of the obligations of defensive alliance and guarantee contracted between the two Crowns. The undersigned, therefore, proceeds to fulfil the second task which he has imposed on himself—namely, to submit to the consideration of the Cabinet of his Britannic Majesty the present state of things in Portugal.

The British Government has adopted the principle (and his Excellency Mr. Canning publicly announced it on a recent occasion) never to interfere in the civil discords of other countries. This principle might be found to be in contradiction with some stipulations of the ancient treaties cited above; but, avoiding for the present any discussion of this question, the Undersigned is confident he can clearly demonstrate, that Spain is now committing hostile acts against Portugal, and that those acts are sufficiently flagrant to constitute a real aggression. He will besides assert, that even if it should be wished to overlook those provocations, and to carry, as the Portuguese Government does (from the desire of peace, and from respect to the wishes of all the others Powers), forbearance as far as it can be carried, there would still be no reasonable ground why his Britannic Majesty should not send by way of precaution, and for the sake of preventing war, a body of auxiliary troops to Portugal; for, in fact, if war does not now exist, it cannot be dissembled that the chances of its breaking out are at least but too probable. But his Britannic Majesty will doubtless recognize that there are just bounds to the tolerance of aggressions and insults, and that the existence of the State, and national honour, require that those limits should not be overstepped. Now by what right could any other Power of Europe blame, still less oppose, the temporary stationing of a corps of British troops in Portugal for the avowed purpose of maintaining peace? Moreover, it is evident that such aid being stipulated by anterior treaties, does not (according to the principles of international law) place England in a state of war with the enemies of Portugal, even though her troops should be compelled to cooperate in the defence of the latter kingdom. More than one proof of this assertion will be found in the modern history of Europe, and more particularly in what respects the states which formerly constituted the Germanic empire, which were regarded as individually at peace, notwithstanding that they furnished their contigents to the army of the empire.

There are innumerable proofs of the animosity entertained by the Spanish Government towards that of Portugal, and of hostile acts committed by Spanish authorities, either with the sanction of their Government, or of their own accord. The Undersigned will confine himself to the recapitulation of the following:—

1. The Court of Spain at this moment still refuses to recognise explicitly his Majesty the King of Portugal as the successor of his august father, and her Royal Highness the Infanta Donna Isabella Maria, as Regent of the kingdom.

2. The Portuguese refugees and deserters are cordially received in Spain, where they have been permitted to remain imbodied, to retain their arms, and publicly to swear fidelity to another prince, and, at last, consent has been given to their returning sword in hand into Portugal.

3. None of the promises made by the Cabinet of Madrid to redress the above grievances have yet been performed.

4. The Governor and the other authorities of the town of Ayamonte have maintained an official correspondence with the Portuguese rebels of Algarve.

5. Spanish soldiers have entered the Portuguese territory, and have committed acts of aggression within it; and among others, the spoliation of the property of an English subject.

6. Portuguese vessels peaceably navigating the river Minho, which divides the two countries, have been fired on from the Spanish side.

All these facts are proved by authentic documents, which have been communicated to the Ambassador of his Britannic Majesty at Lisbon; and the Undersigned confines himself to annexing to the present note, extracts of two despatches which he has received from his Excellency the Minister for Foreign Affairs to his most faithful Majesty, which, in a few words, give an idea of the present state of our relations with Spain.

Such are the provocations which Portugal has received from the Spanish Government: and what are the reproaches which that Government can on its part make against the Portuguese nation? Can it be the having recognized as its legitimate sovereign, in accordance with the wishes of all Europe, the eldest son of its late King? Can it be the having received with gratitude the character freely granted by that sovereign, and which, in fact, only contains the restorations of the ancient rights and privileges of the nation? Is it, in fine, the peacefully endeavouring to reform its internal administration, and observing with scrupulous good faith all the attentions which are due to the Government of a neighbouring state, abstaining from employing against its arms similar to those which it employs?

The reality of this contrast is unquestionable, and the facts speak for themselves. All Europe cannot fail to recognise its truth, and the British Government owes it to the good faith of treaties, to the love of peace, to its own honour, and to the interests which the fate of Portugal cannot fail to excite in England, to take prompt and decisive measures for placing her ally beyond the danger of external attacks, and for terminating a state of things which would, if not prevented by interposition, necessarily lead to a violent crisis.

The undersigned will now only add a few reflections on the principle adopted by England of non-interference in the domestic dissensions of other States. This principle (if it is to be observed literally, and war is not to be considered as existing with Spain until a Spanish army shall have actually entered the Portuguese territory) would guide the enemies of Portugal in the course which they would desire to follow; for, from it they would learn that they might with impunity invite our soldiers to desert, sow corruption amongst them, maintain them embodied in military cerps on the frontiers, and, in fine, commit all kinds of hostilities, provided such hostilities were not avowed; and Portugal would thus be placed between an enemy who permits himself to resort to the most perfidious means to injure her, and an ally who interdicts himself from assisting her.

Besides, in the case in question, it cannot even be admitted that there exists in Portugal a real division of interests and opinions.

The Portuguese nation, represented by the two Chambers, in which are assembled the clergy and nobility, acts in accordance with the sovercign, and pursues with moderation the path traced out for it by the free and spontaneous will of the king. The parties which agitate the country, directed by certain men who may be regarded as the disgrace of the nation, have dared to proclaim the name of a young Prince, who, being himself called one day to the legitimate participation of the throne, has, in the meanwhile, by oaths and solemn acts, given the most satisfactory guarantee of his fidelity and devoted obedience to the orders of his august brother, and thus contradicts the unworthy abuse which is made of his name.

However, whatever may be the opinion and wish manifested by the majority of the Portugues nation, it is not impossible to imagine a case in which foreign intrigue, by employing the terrible means of seduction, might succeed, through the defection of the army, in bringing about a total revolution in Portugal.

The undersigned will conclude this note as he commenced it, by claiming, in the name of her Royal Highness the Infanta Regent, the support and aid of his Britannic Majesty, conformably to the existing treaties.

He avails himself of this occasion to repeat to his Excellency Mr. Canning, the assurance of his highest consideration.

Foreign-Office, December 11, 1826.

The undersigned, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in reply to the official note of the Marquis de Palmella, Ambassador Extraordinary from his most faithful Majesty, has the honour to enclose to his Excellency, the copy of a message from his Majesty to both Houses of Parliament delivered, this day, which he at the same offers to the Marquis de Palmella an opportunity of transmitting to his Government by a British ship of war which is under orders for Lisbon.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to his Excellency the Marquis de Palmella the assurance of his most distinguised consideration.

GENERAL MOURNING.

HERALD'S COLLEGE, JAN. 8.

In pursuance of his Majesty's commands, these are to give notice, that upon the present melancholy occasion of the death of his late Royal Highness Frederick Duke of York and Albany, next brother to his Majesty, it is expected that all persons do put themselves into deep mourning; the said mourning to begin on Thursday, the 11th instant. NORFOLK, E. M.

GENERAL ORDER.

Horse Guards, Jan. 8.

Orders for mourning for the Army for Field Marshal his late Royal Highness the Duke of York and Albany, Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's Forces.

The King does not require that the officers of the Army should wear any other mouring with their uniforms, on the present melancholy occasion, than black crape over the ornamental part of the cap or hat, the sword-knot, and on the left arm; with the following exceptions, viz.:—

Officers on duty are to wear black gloves, black crape over the ornamental part of the cap or hat, the sword-knot, and on the left arm; the sash covered with black crape; black gorget riband; and a black crape scarf over the right shoulder.

When officers appear at Court in their uniforms, they are to wear black crape over the ornamental part of the cap or hat, the sword-knot, and on the left arm; a black crape scarf over the right shoulder; black waistcoat, breeches, stockings, and buckles.

The drums of regiments are to be covered with black; and black crape is to be hung from the pike of the colour-staff of infantry, and from the standard-staff and trumpets of cavalry.

By his Majesty's command.

HENRY TORRENS, Adj.-Gen.

ADMIRALTY-OFFICE, JAN. 8.

His Majesty does not require that the officers of the Fleet should wear any other mourning on the present melancholy occasion, with their undress uniforms, than black crapes on their left arms, hats, and sword-knots: nor with their dress uniforms, than black gloves, and black crapes on their left arms, hats, and sword-knots; except at Court, when they are to wear also black waistcoats, breeches, stockings, and buckles: nor that the officers of the Royal Marines should wear any other mourning with their uniforms, than black crapes on their left arms, hats, and sword-knots; except on duty, when they are to wear also black gloves, and the sash covered with black, black gorget ribands, and black crape scarfs over their right shoulders; and except at Court, when they are to wear black crapes on their left arms, hats, and sword-knots, black crape scarfs over their right shoulders, and black waistcoats, breeches, stockings, and buckles.

The drums of the Royal Marines are to be covered with black, and a black crape is to be hung from the pikes of the divisional colour-staffs. J. W. CROKER.

DEATH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

The sympathies of the whole nation seem to be awakened by the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of York. In our last we gave a succinct account of the last moments of the Royal Sufferer, and a correct biographical sketch of his life. The following particulars have since transpired :—

The late Duke, till within the last three years, was a remarkably healthy and strong man, being scarcely ever indisposed. His Royal Highness up to that period rode on horseback and walked with all the activity and uprightness of a man half his age. The Duke generally rose at six or seven o'clock, and always took a deal of exercise. Probably no man of his exalted rank was so attentive to business, which appeared to be his main object and delight, seldom missing a day when in London, which was his favourite place of residence, without transacting business at his office ; and when in the country, a box, containing official papers for his sanction and signature, was forwarded to him.

His Royal Highness took but little rest, and has been known not to have gone to bed for three nights together, and when parties he was in company with in the country were retiring to rest, his Royal Highness would step into his carriage and travel all night on his return to London. About three years since, his Royal Highness, for the first time, was seriously indisposed (this illness nearly terminated fatally) by inflammation, which confined the Duke near four weeks ; since this illness his constitution never resumed its former vigour, and instead of the hearty robust man riding and walking with activity, his Royal Highness has been gradually drooping, seldom riding on horseback, at least in London, but riding in an easy cabriolet. Instead of going daily to his office as heretofore, he seldom went there except on his levee days.

The Royal Duke transacted his official business at his own residence, where Sir Herbert Taylor, his military secretary, was constantly in attendance by nine o'clock, as were the Adjutant and Quarter-Master-Generals. The military business transacted has (strange to say) increased in these departments since the peace so much, that there have been frequently as many as 300 letters in a day, to each of which an answer was returned, it being his Royal Highness's commands that the humblest individual who wrote to him should receive an answer. So laborious is this department, that Sir Herbert has been engaged sometimes till near seven in the evening, and then has taken a box of papers home with him.

The Royal Duke, during the winter and spring of last year, was slightly indisposed, by being deprived of rest at night, loss of appetite, &c., and was frequently attended by his medical adviser, being considered an invalid, as it will be recollected apologies were sent to several festivals, at which he had kindly promised to preside, particularly the two Theatrical Fund dinners, when letters were read from his physician, pointing out that it would very much endanger the health of the Royal Duke if he was in a room where there was a large assembly of persons.

The Royal Duke was closely confined, we regret to say, till the termination of his valuable life, from the month of June last. His confinement commenced at his residence in South Audley-street, which was found to be very inconvenient from the noise in the streets and other unpleasantness. From this house his Royal Highness removed to Mr. Greenwood's villa at Brompton, for quiet and change of air: from this place the Duke went to the King's Pavilion, Brighton, where he only remained about a fortnight, as he could not have the constant attendance of his eminent medical gentlemen. During his stay at the Pavilion, he rode out frequently in his carriage ; the last time his Royal Highness took an airing was about three months since, soon after his arrival at Rutland House, when, we are concerned to say, he was so feeble, he was obliged to have a stool to step on to get into his carriage ; notwithstanding which, his health generally had so far rallied since, that he took his meals with an excellent appetite, and enjoyed natural repose; and about seven weeks since, one of his medical gentlemen stated, if the Duke's health was inquired after, it might be said his Royal Highness was well ; and actually about this time, the Royal Duke saw his gamekeeper, to examine some guns, in contemplation of shortly being able to enjoy the sport of shooting.

In the year 1803, the military spirit of the country had risen to the highest pitch of enthusiasm ; voluntary associations were every where formed ; the highest and the lowest met together in equal rank ; the Duke of Clarence did not disdain to enrol himself as a private in the Teddington volunteers ; and his Majesty declared that in case of invasion it would be his duty to set an example in defence of every thing that was dear to him. It was under these circumstances that the Prince of Wales, who was merely Colonel of the 10th Light Dragoons, solicited from his Majesty and from Ministers a military appointment that would enable him, by engaging in active service, to set an example to the country. "I ask to be allowed," said he, "to display the best energies of my character : to shed the last drop of my blood in support of your Majesty's person, crown, and dignity ; for this is not a war for empire, glory, or dominion, but for existence. In this contest the lowest and humblest of your Majesty's subjects have been called on : it would therefore little become me, who am the first, and who stand at the very footstool of the throne, to remain a tame, idle, and lifeless spectator of the mischiefs which threaten us, unconscious of the dangers which surround us, and indifferent to the consequences which may follow."

The applications to the King and Ministers were followed up by his Royal Highness by a letter to the Duke of York, in which his Royal Highness takes occasion to remonstrate against the omission of his name in the extensive list of military promotions which had just then be made. This letter is dated from Brighton, 2d October, 1803. The Prince then proceeds to remind his brother of his standing in the army ; after which he says—"I hope you know me too well to imagine that idle inactive rank is in my view; much less is the direction and patronage of the military departments an object which suits my place in the state, or my inclinations ; but, in a moment when the danger of the country is thought by Government so urgent as to call forth the energy of every man in its defence, I cannot but feel myself degraded, both as a Prince and as a soldier, if I am not allowed to take a forward and distinguished part in the defence of the empire and crown—of the glory and prosperity, and even existence of that people, in all which mine is the greatest stake." "It is for sake of tendering," he afterwards adds, "my service in a way more formal and official than I have before pursued, that I address this to you, my dear brother, as the Commander-in-Chief, by whose councils the Constitution presumes that the military department is administered." The Duke of York immediately replied to this letter, addressing his Royal Highness as "Dearest Brother." The Royal Duke then pleads his Majesty's solemn injunctions to him not to mention the subject to him, as a reason for not complying with the Prince of Wales's request. "I trust," he says, "that you are too well acquainted with my affection for you, which has existed since our most tender years, not to be assured of the satisfaction I have felt, and ever must feel, in forwarding, when in my power, every desire or object of yours." After several explanatory letters had passed between these parties, the Duke of York says, that now finding out his brother's object to be the allotment of some post suitable in the present emergency to his situation in the state, he is still precluded from complying with his wishes. "This," he says, "I conceive to be purely a political consideration, and, as such, totally out of my department ; and as I have most carefully avoided, at all times, and under all circumstances, ever interfering in any political points, I must hope that you will not call upon me to deviate from the principles by which I have been invariably governed." He subscribes himself in these terms :—"Believe me, my dear brother, your most affectionate brother, "FREDERICK."

THE LAYING IN STATE.

This part of the ceremony will take place in a new State-room, which was finished under the direction of his present Majesty, about three years back, in St. James's Palace, and will commence on Thursday, the 18th instant, and continue to the close of the ensuing day. The public will be admitted through the New Gallery ; and entering at one end, and pass completely through the state-room, and retire by the private chamber and guard-room, at the other. These rooms will be completely hung with black, and the banner style of drapery will be adopted as the most appropriate to the military rank of the deceased.

A splendid canopy will be prepared for the occasion—under which the coffin will be placed. From this canopy, luxuriant drapery of black velvet will be suspended; at the back, over the head of the deceased, will appear the Royal arms, richly emblazoned. The room will also be hung with escutcheons and silver branches—while the coffin itself will be surrounded with wax torches in massive silver candlesticks. Every facility will be afforded to the admission of the public, and no pains will be spared to add to the mournful magnificence of the scene.

Tuesday morning, the workmen in the employ of the Board of Works, commenced their operations in the King's Palace, St. James's, for the lying in state of the remains of the Duke of York.

The state coffin is preparing with all due speed. The ornaments are to be gilt; and are to be emblematical of his dignity, as a Prince of the Blood. They will consist of the coronets of the Royal Duke, massive tablets, and handles ; D. Y., and palm leaves at the corners, in all, amounting to forty-four plates, all of them highly finished.

A silver plate is to be fastened on the leaden coffin of the Royal Duke, having the same inscription as that of the plate which is to be fixed on the sate coffin.

THE FUNERAL.

The Funeral will take place on Saturday next, and the cavalcade will move in procession from St. James's Palace to the Castle at Windsor, without stopping. On this occasion, all the military which can be spared from actual duty will be called into requisition, as it is intended to embrace every military honour which can be suggested. All the yeomanry corps in the vicinity of the Metropolis will also, no doubt, volunteer their services on the occasion, and minute guns will probably be fired throughout the movements of the cavalcade.

The body will be placed in an elegant hearse, bearing the arms of the deceased, and will be drawn by eight of his Majesty's black horses, which will be relivered at stated places. All the church bells of the metropolis, and in the country, will continue to toll throughout the the day, and no doubt the public will vie with each other in manifesting their respect and affection for the memory of a Prince, whose conduct through life had rendered him so deservedly popular. The ceremony of Lying in State would have taken place at the Castle of Windsor ; but the fact is, that from the state of that noble edifice at the present moment, arising from the alterations in progress, there is not a suite of rooms capable of being devoted to such a purpose, with any thing like convenience.

The funeral of the lamented Duke, it is expected, will be conducted as Heir Presumptive to the Throne, and Commander-in-Chief, but not as a Field Marshal.

THE INTERMENT.

It is expected that the cavalcade will reach Windsor by eleven o'clock at night ; and the road, for the latter part of the journey, will be illuminated by torches.

On the body reaching the Castle, it will be immediately carried to St. George's chapel—where it will be placed on trestles, in the centre aisle, till the mourners, and other persons to be appointed to follow it to the vault, shall have been duly marshalled. The procession will then move on to the interior of the Chapel ; and the coffin will be placed under a canopy which will be prepared for the purpose, and, at the closing scene, after the Funeral Service shall be read, will be gradually lowered into the passage which leads to the Royal Mausoleum. Garter King at Arms will then proclaim the styles and titles of the deceased in the customary form.

The dimensions of the tomb are 70 feet in length, 28 in width, and 14 depth. The receptacles for bodies on the sides of the tomb are formed by massive Gothic columns, of an octagon shape, supporting a range of four shelves, each of which, in the space between the columns, will contain two bodies, the whole range of each side admitting 32 bodies. At the east end are five niches for the reception of as many coffins. In the middle 12 low tombs are erected for sovereigns. The sepulchre will thus contain 81 bodies. The columns are of fine Bath stone, and the shelves of Yorkshire stone. A subterraneous passage is formed from the vault under the choir of St. Georges's chapel, in which an aperture is made, near the ascent to the altar, for the bodies to descend. From the columns spring a vaulted roof over the tomb.

It is anticipated, that their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Clarence, Sussex, and Cambridge (if he should arrive in time), will follow as Chief Mourners. All his Majesty's Ministers and great Officers of State will also be present.

The King's eight black horses are training daily, by drawing a carriage-caravan through the streets of London, to accustom them to noise, &c., previous to their drawing the hearse, containiug the remains of the much-lamented Duke of York, from London to Windsor. They are also being trained in the King's-mews, Pimlico, with the black plumes on their heads, to prevent their startling on the mournful day when they are to wear him.

The Princess Augusta, we are happy to say, is so much recovered from her late fall as to be able to ride out on Friday, for the first time for these three weeks past. Her Royal Highness left Frogmore about 11 o'clock, and proceeded in her carriage and four as far as the King's Palace, Kensington, where her Royal Highness arrived about one o'clock, on a visit of condolence to the Princess Sophia and the Duchess of Kent, on the demise of their beloved brother. The meeting was extremely distressing, in narrating the latter part of the Royal Duke's illness and afflictions, which the Princess Augusta was deprived of witnessing, by being confined to the house in consequence of her fall. The meeting of the Royal Relatives continued about an hour, when the Princess Augusta returned to Frogmore.

The lamented Royal Duke occupied the drawing-room in Rutland-house, which looks into the Green Park ; and in the room adjoining, his Royal Highness had a sofa-bed, which he but seldom used. The Duke had one easy chair, during the day, and another for the night, both of which were made by Bailey, the King's cabinet-maker and upholsterer. They were both made suitable for ease in any position his Royal Highness might recline in. The Royal Duke expired in one of them.

THE FUNERAL OF A FIELD-MARSHAL. — The funeral of a Field-marshal (according to the prescribed orders of the army) is saluted with three rounds of 15 pieces of cannon, attended by six battalions of infantry, and eight squadrons of cavalry.

At a Common Council of the City of London, held on Thursday, the following just, and creditable Resolution to that body, was unanimously voted :—

"That in the recent death of his Royal Highness the Duke of York and Albany, his Majesty's next Brother, this Court are deeply sensible that his Majesty and the Royal Family have been deprived of an affectionate relative, to whom they were justly attached by the nearest ties ; that the nation have to mourn the loss of one who, by his condescension and urbanity to all classes, and by his unremitting endeavours to promote those objects of benevolence and public utility which are the pride and glory of England, has merited and secured the praise of his country ; and especially that the army have lost a Commander-in-Chief, who, by his constant attention to the discipline of the service, and the comforts of the soldier, has, in an unparalleled degree, raised the character of the British arms.

"That this Court most sincerely condole with his Majesty, and the Members of his illustrious House, together with his Majesty's faithful subjects, in their affliction under this bereavement.

As the Crown of Hanover does not descend in the female line, should the daughter of the Duke of Kent succeed to the Crown of England, that of Hanover would devolve upon the eldest then surviving son of his late Majesty.

(From the Provincial Papers.)

CANTERBURY.—Upon the receipt of the intelligence of the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, in this city, on Saturday, the great bell of the cathedral was tolled for an hour.

YORK.—In consequence of the lamented death of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, the evening service on Sunday last was performed without the usual musical accompaniments, and the choristers officiated in their black gowns. The great bell of the Minster, and the bells of our parish churches, were tolled in the afternoon.

BOSTON.—The intelligence of the demise of his Royal Highness the Duke of York was received here on Sunday, and imparted a general feeling of regret throughout the town. The dead bell of this parish tolled every half minute in the evening for an hour.

EXETER.—On receipt of the melancholy news of the demise of the Duke of York, the great Grandison of the cathedral church of St. Peter, and the other bells of the different parish churches in this city, tolled last evening from eight to nine o'clock, and this day several shops are partly shut.

BATH.—Upon the arrival, on Saturday evening, of the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Duke of York, the bells of our Abbey and parish churches tolled knells upon the solemn occasion ; and since Monday morning all the shops have remained partially shut.

LIVERPOOL.—The melancholy intelligence of the death of the Duke of York was received in Liverpool on Monday morning, by the Birmingham mail. In the afternoon the royal standard was hoisted half-staff on the Town-hall, as were the flags on the different churches. The bells of the parish churches were muffled, and tolled a solemn peal throughout the afternoon, and until midnight. The event has thrown a gloom over all classes of the inhabitants.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—The bells of this town and Gateshead were yesterday tolled on the arrival of the news of the Duke of York's death : the flag on the Castle waved half-staff high, and the colours of the ships in the harbour were half-mast. The theatre was closed, the Guild Assembly was postponed, and every demonstration of respect was observed on the occasion.

NORWICH.—Intelligence of the decease of the Duke of York has reached this city, and though a proper feeling was no doubt entertained as to the event, it was accompanied by the anticipation of a brisk demand for the black bombasin, which, in addition to the arrival of the East India order, has made this city more lively than it has been for some time. The East India order of camlets, received by the manufacturers of this city, is for 12,000 pieces. This, in addition to a revival which the bombasin and crape trade has within these few days experienced, will employ a considerable number of hands.

Miss Hargrave makes her debut at Covent-garden to-morrow evening. We have heard her highly spoken of, as possessing all the requisites as regards voice and figure. Should report not err, she will be an acquisition to the stage.

THE REVENUE.—In comparing the produce of the Revenue for the quarter just ended, with that of the corresponding quarter of last year, we find the most decisive indications that the tide is turned, that the impediments which checked her course are overpowered, and that England is once more proceeding in her onward course of prosperity. In the produce of the Excise and Customs, taken conjointly, there is an excess in the last quarter over the corresponding quarter of 1825, of above a quarter of a million. In the stamp duties, as might have been expected, there is a decrease. There is also an inconsiderable decrease under the heads of post-office and assexed taxes. But the general result of the account is to present us with a balance in favour of the quarter just expired of above 140,000l.

As Mr. R. Havilland, the King's messenger, (son of Mr. Havilland, of Cheltenham), was on his return from Madrid with dispatches from our Ambassador at that Court, he was met within a few miles of that capital by a banditti, ten in number, who fired three shots through the windows, cut the traces of his four horses, and then dragged him out of his carriage, and robbed him of all the money he had about his person. They also took away his coat and travelling cap, and severely ill-treated him. Their object is supposed to have been not so much to plunder him as to intercept the dispatches of which he was the bearer, and which were of great moment, as they were conjectured to be the last that would be sent by our Minister previous to his departure from Madrid. Mr. Havilland, aware of the importance of the official documents intrusted to him, had taken the precaution to conceal them in the lining of his carriage, by which means the object of his assailants was defeated. He was left destitute of a single shilling, and without clothes, at midnight, in an enemy's country. Much praise has been conferred on Mr. Havilland for his conduct in this emergency, and for the zeal and caution with which he preserved the despatches. Mr. Havilland was, soon after his arrival at the Foreign-office, despatched to Naples, with an official communication to Prince Leopold.—Cheltenham Chronicle.

ADDRESS TO THE JUVENILE COMMUNITY.

Ye Juvenile Friends, who in blithesome array
Fair presage of manhood and beauty display,
A Happy New Year, and your roseate bloom
May joy still continue through life to illume !
And you, ye fond Parents and Guardians, who feel
For promising youth a commensurate zeal,
Improving the mind by Morality's lore,
And teaching how Science's maze to explore ;
Inculcate this truth—that exterior address
And person will love or aversion impress ;—
Thence let not the child of solicitude slight
The means which attraction create and delight.
Of these whereon uniform success attends,
The far-fam'd Specifics a Friend recommends
Of Rowland and Son, Hatton Garden, who spoil,
Avert, and discomfit by Macassar Oil,
A Remedy that, when by Sickness or Care,
Withdrawn from the Head is the full flow of Hair,
Restorative proves, and renews the display,
Of tresses, impervious to Time and Decay !
Not less in esteem, though more recently found
With creative virtues to amply abound,
Is Rowland's Kalydor, cosmetic sublime,
The genuine production of Persia's pure clime,
That Loveliness prone is through life to sustain,
All other resources essayed when in vain !
By Royalty, Fashion, and Taste patroniz'd
Are Rowland's Kalydor and Macassar Oil,
The tests of experience, by all classes priz'd,
At home and abroad, in each civiliz'd soil,
That juvenile beauty securely engage
From youth to the periods remotest of age ?

THE AGE.

LONDON, JANUARY 14.

It has been stated in one of those irreverent mobs, which disgrace the Sister Kingdom, that the Duke of YORK will be forgotten in a fortnight. We invite the attention of our readers to the style and feeling of that ill-advised, indecent, and invidious prediction. We disclaim in limine all purpose of discussing the Roman Catholic pretensions, which incendiary trumpeters of trash are everlastingly inflicting on the ignorant enthusiasm of their auditors. These insidious conspirators against the public peace have passionately wrought so grave a weight of testimony against the innocence of their Italian creed, that further argument can only serve to show what superfluities of reason yet remain to be produced, in refutation of their subtle pleas and monkish sophistry. We hardly can remember, in the imbittered conflicts of priestly bigotry and rational resistance, a more perfect type of an immoral and proscribing faith, than such a prophecy as that, by which a Christian Prince, deplored to the very corners of the realm, is insolently doomed to the precipitate oblivion of a people, touched with the sense of their irreparable loss, and glowing with the mingled warmth of gratitude and lamentation. Such transcendant outrages on charity and patience enforce a more convincing inference, than all the tawdry wreathings of luxuriant nonsense, by which the advocates of Roman superstition would perpetuate the base obscurities of its unhallowed and demoralizing influence. Such indisputable signs relieve all scrupulous dissenters from Italian insolence, from the unprofitable, though easy task of exposition, by which the spirit of Roman Catholic assumption, impiety, and intolerance, may be nakedly exposed to execration or contempt.---That single prophecy, at once seditious, and unmanly, supplies as potent confirmation of the wickedness and folly of pretending monachism, as could be possibly desired or effected, at the hands of any strenuous champion of the Protestant profession.

When the voice of impartiality records the character of FREDERIC Duke of YORK, will it not pronounce it one, in which the virtues of the human heart predominated over its obliquities?—in which the transitory errors of a quick and yielding disposition were atoned by the redeeming qualities of generosity and candour? Will it not affirm that his elevated soul was above the contagion of the meaner passions; that his friendships were numerous, cordial, rational, and lasting; that though a receiver of injuries, he conceived neither malice nor resentment?---for his enmities, if they existed, were utterly unknown. How will it estimate his conduct as the head of an extensive army, which he not only chastened in its general economy, to which he not only gave superlative efficiency, but in which he promoted such humane and intelligent inquiry, that, eventually, every humble member of the soldiery was hourly solaced by some benefaction, equally distinguished for its paternal care and brotherly solicitude? What will be said of that demeanour, by which he managed the multifarious importunities of interest and merit?---of the temper, with which he dispensed the measure of necessary castigation, and met the recurring exigencies of martial discipline, by applications of mitigated penalty, which his merciful nature invariably confined within the apportioned compass of infliction? How will it appreciate the sagacious means, the exemplary institutions, by which he laboured to confirm a moral feeling in the soldier, to embue his thoughtless character, exposed to the allurements of depravity and to the fatal habits of profane indifference, with principles of humane forbearance and palpable incentives to religion? How will it pronounce on the explicit declaration of his sentiments on the admissibility of Roman Catholic pretension — on that subject which it has suited the casuistry of others to discuss with affectation of liberal solicitude, with the pernicious influence of mystery and indecision, and to envelope in ten thousand complications of constructive fear and qualified concession? If to the components of such a nature, impartial posterity should add that his discrimination of merit was manifested by its compensation, that he had the singular felicity to postpone the interest of the great to the claims of the deserving, yet the happy suavity to reconcile disappointment to the proud—if he had the benevolent condescension to inspire the humble with hope---if he dispensed the penal visitation of his office with a feeling more lenient than austere—if the operation of his instructive and parental system imbued the British soldier with practical and manly sentiments of piety, and gave his individual condition all the comfort, with which it was compatible—if these recited merits be conjoined, we think the character of the illustrious Duke will be recognized by posterity with veneration and national pride, when the asperities and adulation of party are no more.

If so much may be affirmed of that Royal patriot, whose ashes are about to be consigned to their cold tenement, is there any Englishman whose heart—whose understanding, can resist the public claims of country—the appeals of individual sympathy! We consider this occasion, which has drawn forth the unfeigned regret of every honest bosom in the kingdom, by far too sacred—too essentially consecrated to the truth of undissembled sorrow which pervades the nation, to assume it as the theme of pompous dissertation or ingenious praise. There is a verity in the general regret, which is not to be assimilated with the language of ostentatious phraseology: it is emphatically whispered in simplicity and soberness. And, while all good hearts are devoutly occupied with hopes that rest in heaven—while the orisons of affection are breathed over the Royal Corpse, it is needless to commingle with our solemn prayers a deprecation of that expatriating inhumanity, by which the memorable virtues of the Duke of YORK are irreligiously devoted to the forgetfulness of ANTI-CATHOLIC GREAT BRITAIN.

SOPS FOR CERBERUS.

We submit the following extract from a periodical work, entitled the Literary Magnet, because we think it will convey both gratification and consolation to our old friend TOM RAIKES:—

"It is curious to observe, that AN UGLY FACE is generally the indication of a witty and humorous mind; it suggests innumerable exhilirating witticisms to the wearer himself, and is the cause of wit in others. There is scarcely a merry, shrewd, witty fellow,, even in fictitious history, but has the honour of UGLINESS attributed to him. ÆSOP was a very ugly little crookback; uglier still was SOCRATES, no less a wit, and a man of humour, than a philosopher. The heroes of RABELAIS were famous for personal deformity. SANCHO PANZA, his master, and ROSINANTE, were, in their several conditions, absolutely patterns of this interesting qualification. HUDIBRAS and RALPHO were still more conspicuously ugly. FALSTAFF, BARDOLPH, ancient PISTOL, and almost every character of wit and humour, in the drama of SHAKSPEARE, were eminently ugly. SCARRON, the favourite wit of France, was the most deformed little creature that ever a lovely woman allowed herself to be coupled to."

ATROCIOUS OUTRAGE
ON HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

At a ROMAN CATHOLIC MEETING, in the Corn Exchange, Dublin, on the 3d instant, Mr. SHIEL delivered the following speech. We earnestly petition our readers to weigh every syllable contained in it with the utmost deliberation, because it is a combination of language and spirit, which has no parallel in political annals:—

"The Duke of York—he, to whom Providence appeared to have assigned the performance of so important a part in the concerns of mankind, who had gathered so much expectation around him, upon whom the eyes of three nations were turned, and who was at once the source of so much hope and of so much despair; but why should I expend all the feelings associated with his name into amplification, when that name itself carries its own commentary, and it is enough to say, that at the moment I am speaking, the Duke of York is dying; perhaps he is already dead. The last struggle of human agony may be over—the last gasp may have been heaved—the tongue by which God was evoked, may be silent—and ere this, the arm that was raised to Heaven against our country may lie stiff and cold forever. It will be asked, wherefore thus abruptly, and in the midst of a debate upon subjects wholly distinct, I enter upon so solemn and momentous a theme? For two reasons:—first, because the event itself is one of surpassing importance; and, secondly, because I have myself a sort of peculiar, and some will, perhaps, consider it an unhappy right to deliver my sentiments in anticipation of an incident which, when it shall take place, will make England turn round and inquire, with what emotions the announcement will have been received in Ireland? You will observe that I speak of this incident as if it had already taken place, or had begun to be. No doubt can any longer be entertained that the illustrious person to whom I refer, is, for all political purposes, dead; and in Court, in the estimate of statesmen and expectants, BETWEEN THE DYING AND THE DEAD, there is little difference! There is little difference between the death-bed of royalty and its grave!!! The lamp that lights the chamber of an expiring Prince, diffuses a gleam as dismal as the glare of those torches with which the vaults of Windsor Castle shortly will be illuminated. Of the Duke of York, therefore, I may speak as if his dust were already mingled with the remains of the Sovereign, whose faults and good qualities he seems to have inherited. What then shall I now say of him! This:—

'Thou art dead, Alonzo;
So is my enmity.'—(Loud cheers.)

"Many a man who hears me will be disposed to inquire whether I have entered this assembly for the purpose of making a recantation of what, some months before his death, and when there was much controversy respecting his health, I uttered in his regard. I answer—a recantation may consist of sentiments of assertions. The facts which I stated constitute a portion of the history of England, and however they might admit of extenuation, they cannot be denied with truth. This is not the time to indulge in any allusion to infelicities of conduct connected more with a weakness of the affections than with any rooted depravity of heart. But if I am asked, whether the death of an imprudent, a rash, a precipitate and headlong, but not a base, dishonest, false, and dissimulating antagonist, will afford me matter for savage exultation, and for inglorious triumph, I answer, certainly not; nor should the people of this country follow the example set them by the English, who, at the burial of Castlereagh, shouted at the gates of Westminster Abbey, and commended him with execrations to the grave. While the death of the Duke of York was problematical — while it was asserted upon one hand that he was in no danger, and his danger was only matter of surmise on the other—while the balance which contained the destinies of the country was trembling, it was not very unnatural, however it might be regarded as indiscreet, to give vent to a desire, when its expression was actually provoked under very peculiar and very exciting circumstances, that the chief impediment to the liberties of Ireland should not last for ever, I might have said, in the language of the Correntoliers, 'My soul was filled with bitterness, and I was drunk with wormwood.' But now that doubt has been converted into certainty—now that we hear that a Prince is dying, and expect every instant that a cry will come upon us which shall tell us that 'that Prince is dead'—now that Death, who, while he levels the great, subdues the animosities of the humble, and while he resolves the hearts of Princes into dust, softens the hearts of the lowly into commiseration—now that the bell of that lofty temple that towers over the great city has begun to toll—now————it is not with affectation that I speak, when I declare, that so far from experiencing any feeling of fierce and truculent hitarity, every emotion of anger, every vindictive and acrimonious sentiment passes away, and the passions by which I confess I was recently actuated, expire and die within me. Let it not be supposed that I am so poor-minded, that I am sufficiently mean and paltry and disingenuous to state, that I look upon the death of the Duke of York with regret!! I DO NOT!!! —(Loud cheers.) No Roman Catholic in this country does—and if sorrow were affected, IT SHOULD BE REGARDED with derision and contempt! I am also sufficiently secure of the good opinion of that body to which I belong, and of which I have received many attestations, to be convinced that no pusillanimous or unworthy motive will be attributed to me in doing what I consider an act of justice to one, who having no longer the power to injure, should excite hate no more. If I thrust thorns into his pillow, I WILL NOT SOW THISTLES UPON HIS GRAVE!!! I am willing, if it be possible, to forget the anathemas pronounced against my country—I am willing, if it can be made matter for oblivion, to forget, that wantonly and unnecessarily, and in the spirit of a gratuitous folly, he declared himself the unalterable opponent of our claims, and not only checked expectation, but extinguished hope; all this, and more than this, I am disposed to forget, or if I am forced to remember that to which it is impossible not in some degree to revert, I am disposed to make allowance for early prejudices, imbibed from a Hanoverian parentage, and sucked in with Lutheran milk!! I remember the catechism of the Royal nursery, and the perpetual inculcation, that it was to their religion that this family were indebted for their throne. I further recollect how difficult it is for philosophy to find its way into a palace; and how flattery and subserviency block up the minds of princes; and, above all, I recollect how much that man is to be forgiven, who has the misfortune to be surrounded by bad counsellors, who is converted into the utensil of a faction, and who has Liverpool ejaculating at one ear, and Eldon weeping at the other. It would be unfair and unmanly not to take these extenuating circumstances into account; and, at all events, nothing ought to be 'set down in malice.' Let me be permitted to add, that in private life the Duke of York exhibited many generous and even noble qualifications. If he had not been a born prince, he would, in all likelihood, have been a truly good and moral man, and even the imperfection, almost inseparable from his education, could not entirely vitiate an originally fine and kindly nature. He was admitted upon all hands to have been a man of strict fidelity to his engagements, and of high personal honour, a gentleman in the most enlarged and moral sense of the word, frank open, honest, and unaffected, who never destroyed with a false hope, and ruined with a smile. Nor was it to his private life that his good qualities were confined. As Commander-in-Chief, he obtained a kind of renown for his impartiality, and secured the affections of the whole army by his amiable care of the interests of the humbler classes engaged in the service. It is no small praise, that the complaint of the meanest soldier would not have been dismissed without investigation, and, if he deserved it, without redress. To the comforts of the soldiers he dedicated the most persevering and anxious attention, and many of our poor countrymen, on the summits of the Pyrenees, in wrapping himself from the sleet and from the blast, in ample vesture, had reason to remember the humane anxieties of the Duke of York. Will any of you blame me for speaking thus? Will any of you consider me a deserter of any party, or think that I have ran from my colours? Will any of you—of you who have Irish hearts and natures, and in whom resentment and bad passion cannot keep an everlasting hold—will any of you condemn me for speaking thus? You know me too well to suspect—you know too well, that when it was required, either by what I owed to the country or to myself, that I should not recede, that I not only stood my ground but bade defiance to all results. What I did speak I spoke boldly and deliberately!!! (hear, hear)—but the gentlemen connected with the press will do me the justice to admit, that I told them, I should take the whole responsibility upon my own head—I therefore can now afford to do what I consider an act of justice, without imputation of either inconsistency or fear, and, I believe, it will be confessed upon all hands, that I should be absurd indeed, if I thought there was any thing to gain. I am decidedly of opinion, that while we should avoid expressing any false and dishonourable regret, we should on the other hand give way to no burst of exultation. But there is no danger that feelings will be expressed, which have no deep existence amongst us. Let us, instead of taking vindictive and angry retrospects, turn to futurity, and lifting our eyes from the grave, look forward to the new prospects which are opening before us. It is better that the faults of the Duke of York should be speedily commended to forgiveness. In a month hence the Duke of York will be forgotten. The pomp of death will for a few nights fill the gilded apartments in which his body will lie in state. The bell of St. Paul's will toll; London, rich, luxurious, Babylonic London, will start at the recollection that even Kings must die. His Royal brother may shed a tear over his memory, and wipe his eyes with the kerchief which is yet wet with his parental sorrows. The day of his solemn obsequies will arrive—the gorgeous procession will go forth in its funeral glory—the ancient chapel of Windsor Castle will be thrown open, and its Gothic aisles will be thronged with the array of royalty—the emblazoned windows will be illuminated—the notes of holy melody will arise—the beautiful service of the dead will be repeated by the pontiffs of the church, of which he will be the cold and senseless champion—the vaults of the dead will be unclosed—the nobles, and the ladies, and the high priests of the land, will look down into those deep depositories of the pride, and the vanity, and the ambition of the world. They will behold the heir to the greatest empire in the world taking possession, NOT OF THE PALACE, which was raised at such an enormous and unavailing cost, but of that 'house which lasts till doomsday.' The coffin will go sadly and slowly down; they will hear it as its ponderous mass strikes on the remains of its regal kindred; the chaunt will be resumed, a moment's awful pause will take place—the marble vault, will be closed—the songs of death will cease—the procession will wind through aisles again, and restore them to their loneliness. The torch will fade again in the open daylight—the multitude of the great, who will have attended the ceremony, will gradually disperse; they will roll again in their gilded chariots into the din and tumult of the great metropolis; the business, and the pursuits, and all the frivolities of life will be resumed, and the heir to the three kingdoms will be in a week forgotten!!! We too, shall forget him and pardon him. But while we are thus willing to drink of the draughts of Lethe, while we are thus resolved upon acting the part which becomes our country and its religion, let us not be insensible to the great and most important change which has taken place in our political prospects; and let us recollect, that there is ground for expecting that the heir presumptive to the throne is not unfavourable to our just claims. Let us not disguise our feeling that he is a man upon whom we may fix our hopes. What questions will he, whose hand has almost grasped the sceptre, and whose foot is nearly upon the throne, ask of himself? Will he not say, is it wiser or better to secure the adulation of the parson, or the devotion of Ireland? Which is it better to conciliate Peel, Liverpool, and Eldon, or at a moment, when the eyes of Europe are fixed upon this country—when the debates of the French Parliament are teeming with matter respecting this country—when the speech of M. Chateaubriand dwells upon the internal weakness of England, arising from domestic discord, to feed the feelings of sacerdotal multitudes, or at a period like the present, render England impregnable by granting Ireland her liberties, and laying a chain upon the hearts of the people."

Our feelings were too much occupied, last week, with placing upon record the mournful recital of any interesting circumstances connected with THE ROYAL DISSOLUTION, to comment upon this production as we could desire; but now we should be foregoing a paramount duty, if we did not take up the subject, and anatomize its bearings to their fullest extent. It will be remembered that some time since, Mr. SHIEL, on hearing of the Duke of YORK's health being given at a public dinner in Mullingar (for we have understood on indisputable authority, that SHIEL was not present!) published in the Irish papers a speech on the occasion, and after perusing the comments of the English journals thereon, he subsequently promulgated his defence and explanation of that speech. We need hardly remind any one, that both productions excited an execration, throughout the empire, of the most universal and memorable character, and have gone further to injure the cause of that religious and political party, over which this rebel possesses such influence, than any preceding act of even that wild and monstrous faction. Mr. SHIEL imagined, therefore, that it was absolutely necessary to conciliate the somewhat alienated feelings of his own gang, as well as to offer up a partial atonement to persons of an opposite persuasion, for such glaring misdemeanours—and accordingly he delivered the above harangue.

If the preceding addresses of Mr. SHIEL were so naturally deemed offensive, unfeeling, and ill-timed, what language can convey the opinions which must be entertained, on a perusal of the present declamation? If it had been essential to Mr. SHIEL's political purposes to make this appeal at all, even his followers will admit, that common decency should have prompted him to abstain from such an inhuman collection of ribaldry, over the bed of sickness, until at least apprehension for the SUFFERER was one way or the other turned into certainty—until death was no longer a matter of doubt, and until the feelings which such afflictions naturally arouse, had assumed comparative calmness. A Protestant, a gentleman—pooh! A MAN would have done this—he would, with all his ambition for the indulgence of party, have at least maintained its honour unblemished, and would have expired with his cause, rather than have dreamt, for an instant, of adding injury to insult. This demagogue of the Catholics has done the very reverse of this, and trampled upon all the connections of feeling, respectability, and common manhood.

But the sensations with which this oration has impressed us, will not suffer us to dismiss its framer without conveying to him a more signal assurance of that climacteric of public contempt, which it has enabled him to reach. When Mr. SHIEL considers that "he has thrust thorns into the pillow" of A DYING PRINCE, and condescends not "to throw thistles on his grave," he lays open the blackened heart of the CATHOLIC, the TRAITOR, and the MAN! in a way which must, we should imagine, astonish even his own countrymen. Mr. SHIEL thinks he rendered uneasy the sleep of the sick, and he gluts himself upon the thought—the crime, in him, is the same as if he had done it, and admits therefore of no extenuation—the curse attendant upon such enormity will cling to his pigmy, bilious soul, as long as he is suffered to infest the empire with his presence. Let not this man's party, however, believe the words of their Machiavel have had any such influence, as he imagines, in the quarter they were intended to reach—THEY HAD NOT—and the only importance they obtained, was from the natural indignation entertained and expressed at them by all classes, through the medium of the public press. Mr. SHIEL says that he 'does not look upon the death of the Duke of YORK with regret," and that "if he affected sorrow, it ought to be treated with derision and contempt." He adds thereto, that "in a month hence the DUKE OF YORK will be forgotten." Mr. SHIEL should not have drawn on himself the title of fool, as well as knave. The DUKE will be FORGOTTEN, when the British army degenerate into a horde of rebels, and despoliate the land which feeds them—when respect is no longer entertained by man for all those noble attributes which render character illustrious—when private feelings are indulged at the expense of public duty, and when the present organized body of IRISH ROMAN CATHOLICS manifest either modesty, forbearance, intelligence, respect, or even civilization, in the course of their various proceedings; but—never till then—the immortality of the DUKE's memory.

There is, after all, something extremely laughable in the fulminations of this little Irish blackguard; and in the present speech, may be traced another explanation, which is certainly of infinite necessity to be clearly understood, amongst his party. SHIEL says, that at the time he delivered the two addresses we have before referred to, "his soul was filled with bitterness," (which few people will attempt to deny) and that he "was drunk with wormwood"—whereas until this explanation appeared, every one (even those who believed he was at the Mullingar dinner) understood, and freely asserted, that he was DRUNK with WHISKEY PUNCH.

The Duke of WELLINGTON will be appointed Commander in Chief, and it is understood that His Grace will retain his situations of Master of the Ordnance and Cabinet Minister, and, in addition to these distinguished offices, will further receive the appointment of Ranger to the New Forest.

The tomb having closed over the mortal remains of Mr. GIFFORD, we gratify ourselves by paying a passing tribute to the memory of one of the most accomplished scholars, and extraordinary men, the fertility of the last century has produced. As a poet, essayist, and moralist, his name will be chronicled "amongst the high tides in the calendar" to every succeeding generation, who will also have to subscribe their admiration of his private virtues, in addition to the testimony they will bear to his public abilities. There cannot be an abler estimation of either, than that contained in the following lines by Lord BYRON:—

"when some bard in virtue strong,
GIFFORD, perchance, shall raise the chastening song,
Then sleep my pen for ever! and my voice
Be only heard to hail him, and rejoice;
Rejoice, and yield my feeble praise, though I
May feel the lash which virtue must apply."

To Mr. GIFFORD's matchless satires of the Baviad and the Mæviad, and his noble translation of Juvenal, he is indebted for this splendid eulogium from the pen of England's most illustrious poet—but we should decide, that his literary character may be more fully known and better appreciated, by examining his conduct of the Quarterly Review, justly estimated, up to the moment of his resignation of its Editorship, as the first periodical in the empire. Mr. GIFFORD's writings therein are marked with a perspicuity of thought, a profundity of general knowledge, and an acuteness, strength, and correctness of expression, to be found in very few—perhaps none—of his contemporaries. It was this high order of attainment which collected around him the upright and the learned, the wealthy and the great, the good and wise of all societies—and, as few men have lived more universally regarded, few have died more generally regretted.

The Quarterly Review, which Mr. GIFFORD's genius had first established, and then elevated to such importance in the world of letters, has, comparatively speaking, died with him. There are evident traces, of course, of several of the eminent hands who so ably seconded the efforts of their departed master—but the conducting spirit, the presiding power---what Lord BYRON calls the is extinct. The reins of this periodical government have been transferred from established wisdom to ephemeral acquirement, and its councils are presided over by one of those mixtures of coxcombry and presumption which, from its associations, is occasionally permitted to appear in those circles of literature, nature never intended it to approach; and under the lash of such a puppy's pen have, we perceive, some of the wittiest, most amusing, and most talented works of modern authors, repeatedly come, within these few months. But our business was rather to cry up the dead, than to cry down the living; and it was only the recollection of such an illustrious name, as that of GIFFORD, which induced us for a moment to allude to his puerile and self-important successor.

* On the night of the King's visit to Drury-lane.

During the past week we have received a multitude of statements, touching the affair of the Marquis of CLANRICARDE and Mr. M'GILLIVRAY. We believe we shall best consult the taste of our readers, in decidedly uttering the fiat of our mature opinion on this subject,---we confine ourselves to very narrow limits on the point in question. It is quite unnecessary to redeem the merits or demerits of the case, which already has exhausted the patience of the public, and thoroughly sufficed the appetite inordinately generated in the world of fashion, to observe by what peculiarity of obligation the Noble Marquis has deemed it an incumbent duty to refute aspersions, which, in our estimation, would have been more wisely met by silence. The Marquis of CLANRICARDE should remember, that accusations uttered against members of certain calibre, confer a temporary grandeur on the source of imputation; and that the ephemeral celebrity of Mr. SIMON M'GILLIVRAY is an era in the life of that great unknown, which unexpectedly redeems him from the sombre dullness of his mediocre being. Mr. SIMON M'GILLIVRAY has apparently sufficient tact to feel that ignorance and vulgarity will hail his trespass on invulnerable reputation as a quintessential proof of independent metal and incorruptible impartiality; two qualities which we would fain inform that bold inhabitant of Suffolk-lane he never was designed to practise. He has brought a lump of Scotch integrity to market, of the passable quality of which, we entertain the very strongest doubt; but Mr. SIMON seems disposed to recommend his ventures by the classic pliancy of Caledonian letters, and the old inseparable leaven of Presbyterian inuendo. The eminent disinterestedness of SIMON is known to the professors of Auld Reekie; "he's a brae chiel," and places on the upshot of the contest his dingy reputation, as a fair equivalent against the fame of Lord CLANRICARDE; a proof that SIMON has not foregone the Scotch advantage of arithmetic, and blinked the law of equiponderance. Lord CLANRICARDE has too many obligations to society to yield attention to such worthless efforts: the onus probandi was at least with Mr. SIMON, and as we are seriously---sincerely, interested in every thing respecting so young and amiable a nobleman, we may venture to express our hope, that he will henceforth disregard the impudence by which he has been seduced into a needless explanation, and consign all future efforts of Mr. SIMON to the fate which his previous offences have received---the amusement and derision of the public.

THEATRICALS.

Matters of much more important public interest than the labours of the Thespian world have so divided our attention this last week, that we are unable to notice any thing appertaining thereto, not even excepting the return to England of "the proud representative of SHAKSPEARE's heroes," as KEAN called himself to the Yankees.

The lamented national affliction which is yet so "green in our souls," has only had the effect, thus far of closing the theatres on the day of dissolution, a circumstance of the utmost consequence to the interests and well-doing of all managers and performers. The public are not perhaps aware, that this alteration of an established custom, in cases of ROYAL DEATHS, was effected by the late Duke of YORK, who, on the demise of his father, went in person to his present MAJESTY and, representing the distress into which any lengthened close of the theatres would involve the many dependents on their treasuries, obtained the ROYAL CONSENT to the present arrangement. It is not a little remarkable, that the next member of the royal family on whose account the request, so strenuously urged by the late DUKE, is complied with, should be himself. But this is only one of the numerous instances, in which his ROYAL HIGHNESS interested himself in behalf of the stage, and its professors—at their Fund dinners he condescended, twice a year, to take the chair, and to aid them by his personal subscription—every benefit for a charitable purpose immediately obtained his patronage—authors, actors, managers, musicians, and every other order of the profession, are under innumerable obligations to his noble heart---and were they to rise up en masse and raise a trophy to his memory, it would only be acknowledging, in a faint degree, the measureless favours he heaped upon them all.

REFORMATION IN IRELAND.

With this momentous measure the mind naturally associates a portion of the political career of the late illustrious and distinguished Commander-in-Chief—for we never can forget the memorable struggle in which he so signally manifested his zeal, his virtue, and his attachment to our glorious constitution—when such was the effect of the political storm upon the nation in general, that even loyalty doubted the truth of its own principles, and for a moment oscillated between the influence of party and its allegiance to the Monarch—good men commenced by distrusting themselves, and ended naturally in suspecting others—whilst the Legislature was charged with being illiberal and iniquitous, because it resisted an attempt to undermine the foundation of the Constitution—in this awful hour of national danger and trial, the great and illustrious individual, now no more, nobly and successfully addressed the British House of Lords, and with one hand upon the throne, and the other upon the heads of the British nation, and in such memorable language, declared his unshaken attachment, and supported the Protestant religion as established at the Reformation. Much as this speech been criticized, much personal obloquy and scurrilous invective has it brought down upon the distinguished personage who had the manliness to pronounce it; scarcely a public print in the United Kingdom who had even bankrupt pretensions to democratic favour, that did not pour out the phial of reprobation and calumny on the head of the illustrious and upright speaker—nay, the political appetite for vituperation became, at this period, so keen, that even portions of the aristocracy of the country partook of the iniquitous banquet, and some were found in the orgies of political drunkenness, wantonly flinging their calumnious slander at the intrepid champion of their dearest rights; but he swerved not a jot from his course—he recollected the glorious and triumphant efforts which were made to establish his ancestors on the throne of England, and he combated, with unabated zeal, every attempt made to pluck even one solitary gem from the diadem of that Constitution—well convinced that if a single ray be interrupted in its legitimate passage to the political horizon, it may become eventually changed from a partial obscuration to a total eclipse—leaving a benighted nation to mope along in all the horrifying darkness of anarchy and revolution.

To every man whose eyes are not blinded by the modern doctrine of universal toleration, and the dangerous one of unqualified concession to the Popish claims, and the equally fatal one of political equality amongst all classes of the State. To such we say, let the principles which guided the political conduct of the late illustrious Heir Presumptive to the Crown of these Realms be deeply engraven on your hearts—to let your children follow in mournful silence the corse of him who in life was the champion of your invaluable liberties, and ere the tomb has closed on the remains of departed worth for ever, pour out the gratitude of your hearts in all the fulness of sympathising sorrow; and if at any time you should entertain a doubt upon the principles alone calculated to maintain the harmony of the British Constitution in all that perfection for which it has become the theme of universal admiration, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest every word of the speech of his late Royal Highness the Duke of YORK, delivered by him in the House of Lords on the 25th of April, 1825—let it sink deeply into your souls, and when you pray to Heaven for a blessing to befal your offspring, let it be that they should make the speech of this illustrious individual the creed of their political catechism.

Let us now examine the effects produced on the state of Ireland by this all-important speech. Previous to the period in question a notion had generally prevailed that the claims for unqualified concessions to the Catholic hierarchy had been strongly countenanced, nay, the justice of the measure admitted, in a very high quarter: and, though a contrariety of opinion existed in the Cabinet upon the policy and expediency of thus yielding to those claims, still the preponderating influence of Royalty would ultimately draw within its overwhelming vortex a majority in favour of the measure: and rumour, at this season, became so inventive as even to proclaim it to be the intention of the Legislature spontaneously to originate the question of unrestricted concession to the petition of the Roman Catholics, with all the important consequences necessarily incidental to such an act of the Legislature. At this sound the nation awoke; good men became alarmed, whilst the rumour gained considerable strength from the evil-minded advocates of revolution; the high-minded and well-affected aristocracy of both countries naturally began to inquire what the state of the pulse was amongst the several individuals composing the Royal brotherhood. Some thought it indicated at one time a throbbing, upon the whole, rather favourable to the question, whilst others, whose enquiry partook, in some degree, of the influence of their principles, pronounced it quite hostile—a collision of opinions ensued—suspicion followed—distrust augmented—and it became a matter of some nicety to ascertain the true state of the patient's political health in the Cabinet. At last the doubt was removed, and his ROYAL HIGHNESS, with all that strenuousness and zeal which has marked every act of his political fidelity to the Constitution, nobly and conclusively declared his sentiments to be decidedly hostile to the measures; that to the latest moment of his life he would resist it; and that the principles which formed the basis of the British Constitution, demanded his decided hostility — the effect upon the nation was like the rising sun, whose first rays become visible on the loftiest parts of the horizon, till gradually the whole political surface becomes a sharer in its influence—good men rallied that confidence with which they were inspired, and relying on the wisdom of the Legislature, and the virtue of the Monarch, the rejection of the measure followed, and was hailed as the best Constitutional bulwark against anarchy and revolution.

In Ireland correspondent effects followed almost simultaneously—and those who suspended their exertions for the amelioration, both religious and civil, of the people of that country, now renewed their labours, and thus the great work of religious and moral education went on at an accelerated pace, enlisting in its march hundreds of the long-deluded, but now enlightened natives, rescuing them from the degrading thraldom of the priesthood: emancipating them from the hands of the agitators, and rendering them true followers of the church of Christians, and loyal subjects of our most virtuous and gracious SOVEREIGN. We hail the universality of this work as the great means of indissolubly uniting the hearts of the people of both countries into one solid nation; we anticipate from it the total extinguishment of party feeling: the entire abolition of religious distinction, and the full and complete amalgamation of all classes of HIS MAJESTY'S subjects, for one united purpose, obedience to the law and attachment to the Constitution—these are the political blessings that will ensure the success of the great work of Reformation—this is the light that will diffuse its influence over the minds of the people of Ireland; dispelling that gloomy superstition and prejudice that for ages has darkened the country; it is by this illumination the ignorant will become enlightened and the disaffected reclaimed: by this the machinations of the ill-disposed will be defeated—and all the secret workings of disloyalty, prejudice, and religious controversy, openly exposed: the advocates of disorder punished, and universal peace and good will restored throughout the land.

The people of Ireland are proud, warm hearted, high minded, and sensitively awake to either insult or injury. Not less open to conviction—they possess perhaps the finest materials in the moral order of beings for the improvement and culture of the philosopher and the moralist: but they have retrograded in the scale of nations — and whilst England advanced to the zenith of political superiority, Ireland could not even be dragged along to follow in her footsteps—her cause was darkened by the prejudices indigenous to the soil of an intolerant and superstitious religion; her march was impeded, and in every step taken by England (to pull her after her) her feet became so fettered with local prejudices and exaggerated sufferings, that she fell back almost in the rear, and left her sister to complete the course unattended.

We have said, the Reformation has received a blow on its outset by the death of him, whose memory will long be cherished in the hearts of the people: we trust it will be but of momentary duration—and that his illustrious Successor will pursue the same course of enlightened policy and unshaken loyalty—We know his motives are sincere, and are satisfied of the rectitude of his purposes, and when once his Royal mind is fully persuaded of the inestimable value of this great work, we are convinced he will give it every support in his power, and thereby furnish another illustrious instance of the attachment of the HOUSE OF HANOVER to the fundamental principles of the BRITISH CONSTITUTION.

The following are the number of persons who conformed to the established religion on Sunday in the churches named:—Cavan church, men, 11; women, 10. In Ballyhaise church, persons, 6; total, 27. Several anonymous communications have reached us, announcing similar proceedings elsewhere. We do not mean to question the truth of the circumstances detailed, but we never publish any account upon such a subject without the most authentic and unquestionable authority.

Letters from St. Domingo, received through the United States, to the 22d of November, and direct to a later period, state, that Port-au-Prince continues violently agitated. The President has given official notice to the agent of France that he cannot pay the subsidy agreed upon; he had summoned all the heads of departments, and all the military commandants, to assemble on the 20th of November. The result of this meeting was anxiously looked for.

It is reported there is a private letter in town from Lord Beresford, dated Lisbon, 27th December, in which it is stated he considers all the matters between Portugal and Spain settled, and that the interview between the Princess Regent and the Spanish Ambassador was highly satisfactory. We cannot ascertain the correctness of the report.

The announcement by the Government at Bogota of the arrival of Bolivar in Colombia, is given in the American papers. He has re-established the authority of the Constitution in the provinces through which he passed. It does not appear that he has assumed any other authority than the Constitution gives him. He was to enter Bogota on the 14th November.

Dispatches were received at the Foreign Office on Wednesday from the British Minister to the United States.

Jamaica Papers to the 24th November, received yesterday, state that the Harlequin has been ordered off, to protect British property in St. Domingo, and that several other vessels of war will follow her immediately. A Jamaica Paper says it declines (for the present) to mention the causes of this important movement.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer came to town on Wednesday, from the seat of Lady Buckinghamshire, at Charlton, and transacted official business at his residence in Downing-street.

The Earl and Countess of Liverpool left their residence at Coombe Wood on Monday, for Bath.

Monday, an Order from the Secretary of State was received at Newgate, respiting, during his Majesty's pleasure, George Houghton and James Bishop, who were appointed to suffer on the 2d inst., but who had been reprieved until Tuesday.

Letters from Lisbon, dated the 27th ult. say, it is impossible that the English troops can act in the interior of that country, on account of the rainy season, which will continue for at least two months.

His Majesty, notwithstanding his acute and wounded feelings upon the late melancholy event of the death of his much-revered and lamented Royal Brother, is as well as can be expected. His Majesty is in good health, but is, as must be expected, much dejected. He receives no visitors, except the branches of the Royal Family, or that of his Ministers of State. The surrounding Nobility and Gentry have left their cards of condolence at the Royal Lodge.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex has quite secluded himself in Kensington Palace, since the death of his late Royal Brother, and suffers under deep affliction. The Duke of York, for several days previous to his death, felt great consolation from the unceasing assiduities and brotherly attention of his Royal Highness.

On the 4th instant, an inquest was taken at West Wratting, Cambridgeshire, on view of the body of Mary Ann Mean, about ten years of age, who died in consequence of wounds and bruises inflicted by her father and mother. From the evidence, it appeared, that the inhuman parents had frequently chastised the unfortunate child with the greatest severity and barbarity. The jury returned a verdict of Manslaughter against William Mean, and Mary Ann, his wife, who were committed for trial at the ensuing assizes.

THE ARTS.—Mr. Sams (of Pall Mall) has been very industrious in this department lately, in addition to his admirable and faithful likeness of the Duke of York. The admirers of literary talent will be gratified to learn that he has just published a spirited resemblance of Mr. Campbell, author of the Pleasures of Hope, drawn by Lonsdale, and engraved by Reynolds. The picture is altogether very fine. Mr. Sams has also published two pleasing portraits of Prince George and Princess Augusta of Cambridge.

The Gazette of Friday night makes no allusion to the intended ceremonials to be observed at the funeral of the Duke of York.

On Tuesday the remains of Mr. Sergeant Lens were interred in Bishopsgate Church. The funeral was conducted on a splendid scale.

Among one of the most novel and interesting exhibitions of the metropolis may be classed that of the Chinese Ladies, who exhibit, for the first time in this country, their very pretty persons and curious little feet, which quite realise, in their petite quality, all the encomiums which have been passed upon them by travellers to the land of Souchong and Bohea.

By the commercial advices from Cadiz, we learn that a very strong sensation had been created there by the warlike attitude of Ferdinand. Trade, which has been at a low ebb, not only for months, but for years at Cadiz, as likewise throughout the whole of Spain, was entirely suspended.

DOVER, JAN. 12.—Friday a messenger went over in an open boat (just after the packet sailed) in two hours and a half; she returned to Broadstairs in the night with two messengers, then came into our harbour this morning in time to take the mail (the wind preventing the packets from coming back), with which she sailed again about ten this morning; by these trips they will probably realize 30l. to 40l. A packet just arrived, and landing her passengers in the roads. The Dutch man of war of 80 guns, the Zealander, has just gone by; she got ashore on the Knock Sand; but was afterwards got into the Downs, from which place she is just come.

The curve of Captain Savage's new work at Lyme Cobb, Dorset, conveys a whisper in the same manner to that of St. Paul's, and to a remarkable distance; but, of course, being in the open air, with unequal power. On a still day, persons placed more than one hundred and fifty feet distant from each other can maintain a conversation in a whisper.

RICHMOND PARTY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE AGE.

Sir,—However satisfactory it must be to five of the six persons composing the above-named party to perceive, by a perusal of your Paper, that their statements have favourably impressed you, there is one of those five who presumes to offer a comment on an observation of yours. Perhaps he has taken as general what you intended in a limited sense; if so, he has to apologise for this intrusion. You state your "regret that noblemen should, even at the request of a friend, permit a paltry citizen to say he had the honour to dine with them."—Surely these are not the days, nor is this the land, suited to revive or nurture the prejudices that fettered society in the age of Louis le Grand. The person who introduced the son of a British merchant to a British Peer did not feel that any apology for doing so was necessary, nor does he conceive that a Peer of the Realm is entitled to more minute explanations relative to a person casually introduced, than would, under similar circumstances, be offered to any private gentleman. The person so presented was supposed to possess the character, the habits, and the manners of a gentleman; and no man, knowing the individual by whom he was introduced, would have insulted him by demanding the pedigree of any person he asked to join a party, and no man sat at that table who has not, with pleasure, entertained a merchant's son at his own.

In England it is impossible to draw a line—the offspring of the merchant must have the entrée of society—a passe par tout—were it otherwise there would be no small confusion in both Houses of Parliament—nay, in the Cabinet itself. The annals of Great Britain to the present period prove her as much indebted to the Citizen as to the Patrician. A coronet is a very honourable badge, and entitles the wearer to many very pleasant privileges—but would he step beyond them, he must follow Fame through paths more dangerous than those travelled by the lowly-born—and, as a counterpoise to unearned distinction, a speck on his brow is rendered more conspicuous by the lustrous circle that surmounts it. A coronet descends by inheritance—so does the gout—and one daily sees as whimsical distributions of hereditary honours as unmerited inflictions of hereditary pain. Juvenal (who by the way is very severe against gaming) was of this opinion, when he says—

Stemmata quid faciunt? Quid prodest, Ponlice, longo
Sanguine censeri ————————

But do not, Sir, mistake the writer for a Leveller.—He acknowledges the truth of Sir John Bevil's words, "that those who affect to despise ancient descent, are always conscious of a deficiency themselves." He feels no such consciousness—and is one of the last persons who would wish to depreciate the value of ancestorial dignity—he merely offers an opinion that the elevation of the merchant does not involve the degradation of the noble.

DISTRESSING OCCURRENCE AT THE TUNNEL UNDER THE THAMES.

For some time past it has been considered that the portable gas was by far the best light which could be adopted for the assistance of the labourers, and the work has been constantly so lighted. At the summit of that part of the shaft where the bricks and other materials are lowered, there happened on this day to be placed, for the purpose of descent, some bottles of portable gas; the spot being immediately under the engine, is, of course, perpetually shaking from its working, and owing to some inattention on the part of the men employed at this portion of the works, who have, however, been previously remarkable for their care and caution, one of the bottles was not carefully secured, and the rumbling of the engine gradually displacing it from a level, it at length fell down the shaft.

On meeting the earth, the distance being 70 feet, it burst with a tremendous crash, and there being a lighted candle near the spot, when it fell, it immediately ignited, and filled the whole body of the shaft, even to its summit, in one entire flame, which partially proceeded into the arches themselves, but fortunately not so far as to reach the spot where the majority of workpeople are engaged. The men, however, employed on the immediate spot where the bottle fell have suffered most dreadfully, although there has been no present loss of life.

The extreme distance of the spot where the shield is now placed rendering the passage of the excavated earth to the summit of the shaft by means of wooden planks and barrows too tardy for the desired expedition of the work, it has been determined to complete a rail-road for the purpose of accelerating this part of the undertaking, and the work-people engaged in this object were immediately engaged at the base of the shaft. A man named Robert Greenshields, a millwright employed in laying down the rail-road, has been so frightfully burnt, that it is impossible to distinguish a single feature: his eye-lids are shockingly scorched, and the pupil of his eye so materially affected, that it is very questionable whether he will regain his sight. John Nelson, who has the direction of the shield, has suffered in a similar way, though not to so great an extent; as also Robert Osborn, William Bowling, and Philip Davies. The foreman of the bricklayers, named Lane, observing the bottle falling, and being at the time immediately at the shaft, with a singular presence of mind, threw himself on the ground, with his face downwards, and although the bottle fell nearer to him than some others, he escaped unhurt.

Cobbett, in his yesterday's Register, speaking of the death of the Duke of York, says, "The Royal Brothers must all die, from first to last, and, if it were God's good pleasure, I should like they might go out of the world in the same order in which they came into it: and in saying this, I wish to be understood, as not meaning any thing in levity, but being as serious in my wishes as the subject itself is serious."

DEATH OF THE FRANKFORT BANKER, M. MORITZ.—(Extract of a letter from Frankfort, dated Dec. 28.)—This morning, at nine o'clock, departed this life, M. Moritz von Bethmann, the head of the most extensive banking-house in this city, and we may say in Germany. He was attacked by a fit of appoplexy, at the theatre, on the 25th of December, and on the 28th he was a corpse. His death has caused general lamentation and mourning. Frankfort has lost in him the richest, the most active, and the most benevolent citizen, and the public schools their greatest friend, protector, and benefactor.

The surveyors from the Bank of England were in Leeds last week, in search of a suitable building, in which to open the projected branch establishment.

It is rumoured that preliminaries are entered into for the commencement of a branch Bank of England in Lincoln,—a measure which is considered of importance to the expenditure and receipts of this agricultural and commercial county.—Stamford News.

The report of Velluti's death in Le Furet is unfounded. A letter in his own handwriting, dated from Venice, Dec. 20, announcing his perfect recovery, is now in London.

The young wheats in Sussex generally exhibit a healthy and promising appearance.

The deplorable condition to which the Countess de Lavalette was reduced, in consequence of that sublime act of conjugal love which has bestowed immortality on her name, is well known. We are most happy in being able to announce to our readers, and to the whole of France, the complete re-establishment of the health of this victim of the most noble devotedness. She has just been restored to her family, after a long and painful malady. The praise of this remarkable cure, which was for a long time despaired of, is due to Dr. Blanche, proprietor of the magnificent Maison de Sante, at Montmartre, where the cares bestowed upon Madame Lavalette, during five long years and a half, have at last been crowned with the happiest success.—Constitutionnel of Wednesday.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, Jan. 11.

WELLESLEY V. DUKE OF BEAUFORT.

Mr. Hart rose, and begged that his Lordship would name a day for the decision of this cause.

The Lord Chancellor said that he was quite ready to hear Counsel immediately after the seal, if they thought proper to make any further observations in the case: if they did not wish to be heard again, the matter would then be entirely left to him (the Lord Chancellor), and it should receive his immediate attention. His Lordship observed that the papers in this cause had accumulated to such a mass, that he could not carry it across the hall.

Mr. Hart—And that mass will be twice as great if your Lordship suffers the cause to go on in the manner in which it has been hitherto conducted.

The Lord Chancellor said that he was not disposed to do any thing that ought not to be done. If, however, the parties saw occasion to file other affidavits, nothing should prevent him from taking them into consideration. A Judge was not properly treated, when he was constantly fed with evidence, and desired, and pressed, to give his judgment before he had had an opportunity of reading that evidence. Let Counsel tell him on Monday, if they intended to make any observations upon the affidavits: they must communicate with each other, and let him have their determination on Monday. His Lordship said that this had been the most painful part of his judicial duties. He had read the papers in this cause and forgotten them, and read them over again: no one ought to be more anxious than himself to get through the business. His Lordship thanked God that this was a case which might be carried to the House of Lords, and he hoped it would be carried there.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, Guildhall, Jan. 9.

LIABILITY TO SERVE ON JURIES.

On the name of Mr. James Kemp being called in the first special jury list this morning, that gentleman having answered, and taken his place in the jury-box, submitted to the Lord Chief Justice that he was not eligible to serve:—1st, because he was not engaged in any trade, but merely employed in a public office; and, 2dly, because he was not a housekeeper, but only occupied a part of a house in the city.

The Lord Chief Justice having inquired of Mr. Kemp whether his family were domiciled in the city, and having received an answer in the affirmative, expressed his opinion that Mr. Kemp had been rightly summoned, and was qualified to serve.

Mr. Kemp was then accordingly sworn.

WEDNESDAY, Jan. 9.

THE KING V. DANIEL PRINCE.

This was an indictment against the defendant, a general merchant in the City of London, framed upon the 52d of the late King, and it charged him with having fraudulently disposed of and put away for his own use and benefit a certain bill of exchange for the sum of 1,681*l.* 5*s.*, the property of Messrs. Camp and Jacobs, wool-merchants, who had placed it in his hands solely for the purpose of his getting it discounted, in order that he might hand the proceeds to them. The important part of the act of Parliament in question, provides that if any banker, broker, attorney, or other agent whatsoever, shall pledge or otherwise dispose of any bill or other security for his own use, which has been placed in his hands specifically and solely for the use and benefit of his principal, such banker, &c. shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour, and upon conviction be subject to certain punishments in the act mentioned.

The intrinsic point proved, on which the present case turned, was, that the prosecutors and the defendant had been in the habit of accommodating each other with acceptances, lending each other money, getting bills for each other discounted without commission, and always settling their money transactions as soon as possible, without keeping any account current. The bill in question had been placed in the defendant's hands for the purpose of being discounted, but he, being in embarrassed circumstances, pledged it with his bankers, to whom he was indebted, and when it was due they presented it to the prosecutors, who were obliged to pay it. In the interim the Defendant became bankrupt.

The Chief Justice suggested, as his opinion, that the Defendant was not a person within the present Act of Parliament.

The Common Sergeant and Mr. Platt were heard in support of the indictment, and contended that the words "any other agent whatsoever," were sufficiently large to comprehend the case of the present defendant.

The Lord Chief Justice delivered his opinion at length, and said, that the Act being a penal one, must receive a strict construction; and looking at the preamble as well as the enacting clauses, it was clear that it was intended to remedy the frauds which might be practised by brokers or other persons entrusted in the way of their business, with securities, in order to get them discounted, and was not intended to reach the case of a person receiving a bill from a friend to get it discounted, without commission or other consideration.

The Jury accordingly acquitted the defendant.

THE PANIC.—WIGNEY V. THWAITES.

This action was brought by Messrs. Wigney and Co. bankers at Brighton, against the Proprietors of the Morning Herald, for publishing on the 24th of February, 1826, a paragraph containing a statement that the plaintiffs' bank had stopped payment.—The defendants pleaded the general issue.

Mr. Gurney detailed the circumstances of the case, and proved the publication of the objectionable article by producing the Morning Herald from the Stamp Office. It was also proved that the Plaintiffs' banking house did not stop payment.

Mr. Scarlett addressed the Jury for the defendants. He admitted that, as there was no justification, the verdict must be for the plaintiff. At the same time he thought the Jury would consider it a case which called for trivial damages. When rumours of public distress prevailed, he did not see how bankers could avoid the natural consequence of such rumours. He remembered once that the mere accident of an old woman falling in Birchin-lane, occasioned a report that a celebrated banking house had experienced a run, and had stopped. In the present case, much was to be said in behalf of the publisher. It would be seen that the same newspaper which communicated one statement from its Brighton correspondent, communicated a second, and that the first was corrected by the second. A Brighton correspondent wrote on the 23d of February, that this bank had stopped, and the next day a contradiction was published. Any person who read the second report, under the head Brighton, must have seen that it referred to the paragraph of another day. He could not say the first report was justified by law, but it was neither malicious nor criminal. Mr. Thwaites, the moment he had reason to suspect the paragraph was not correct, felt most anxious to make all the reparation possible. Even then he wished to stand well before the Jury and the Public, and express contrition for having made the publication. The day after the article was published another from Brighton appeared contradicting it, besides which, a written apology was made. The newspaper which went down on the Saturday, published to all the world the real state of the case, and was serviceable to the plaintiffs. I do not justify this (said Mr. Scarlett); but I submit to you, Gentlemen, that when the public expect all the information that can be procured on such a subject as the failure of banks, and the editor of a newspaper takes all the care he can, as we find he did in this case, there can be no foundation for a charge of malice, or intention to do injury.

The Morning Herald, containing the correction and apology of the Editor on the subject of the objectionable paragraph, was put in and read.

Mr. Gurney having been heard in reply,

The Lord Chief Justice said, it had been properly admitted by by the Learned Gentleman who conducted the defence, that the plaintiff was entitled to their verdict. The question was, what damages the Jury would give. His Lordship did not think it necessary to make observations to the Jury on the immense consequences false reports produced among mercantile men, and especially bankers. He should only say that, if there was a season when such reports were most injurious, it was in February 1826. His Lordship recommended the Jury to give temperate damages.

The Jury retired, and on their return, found a verdict for the Plaintiff—Damages 100*l.*

GRIFFITHS V. WILKS, JUN.

This was an action on a bond. It appeared that Mr. Griffiths is an attorney. The defendant is of the same profession, and M.P. for Sudbury. The parties being desirous of dissolving partnership, Mr. Griffiths gave up the business to Mr. Wilks, in consideration of a sum of money which Mr. Wilks undertook to pay by entering into a bond. Some arrears being due upon the bond, the present action was brought.

Mr. F. Pollock said, a guarantee had been given when the bond was signed, that certain book debts were good debts.—The debts had, however, proved to be bad, and an instalment due upon the bond had been withheld to cover the loss.

The Lord Chief Justice asked, whether the guarantee was in Court?

Mr. Pollock said it was not.

The Lord Chief Justice then said, there was no question for the consideration of the Court.

The Jury, under the direction of his Lordship, found a verdict, establishing the validity of the bond, and also for the sum of 181*l.*

SURREY SESSIONS, Wednesday, Jan. 10.

THE TREAD-MILL.

In the course of the morning Mr. Briscoe, who had previously given notice of his intention to bring forward a motion to exempt females from working at the tread-mill, rose and addressed the Court. The Hon. Gentleman in his address to the Court said, that he felt assured that every magistrate in that Court, and the public in general, would concur with him in the opinion, that the labour of the tread-wheel was not suitable to the delicate constitution of females, and he was happy to say that there were remedies adopted in many prisons which were less degrading, and equally effective as to the prevention of crime in that part of society to which he alluded. He trusted that he took a proper view of his motion in a physical and moral sense, and that he would be supported by the Court. It would be superfluous for him to enter into an explanation of the wide difference between the male and female part of society; but he could with confidence assert the evils arising from this species of labour towards females; and one circumstance was sufficient to excite the disgust of every well-regulated mind. It was found necessary to erect a screen behind the females while they were at work, and to provide them with a strong pair of flannel—(Here the cries of "order, order," ensued)—trousers at the cost of the county; together with this, it reduced the women to a most wretched state; mothers who had just recovered from their delivery were obliged to accede to this mode of prison discipline, and many sufferers were now placed in the Refuge for the Destitute at Hoxton, in consequence of the effects that this mode of exertion had upon their minds. The Hon. Gentleman contended that something ought to be introduced from which habits of industry would accrue, but the tread-mill had no such effect upon females. It was not reasonable either to inflict the same sort of punishment upon the aged as the youthful offender. The Hon. Gentleman concluded his address by showing to the Court the necessity of adopting some other mode of employment for the female prisoners.

Sir T. Turton concurred with Mr. Briscoe, that the tread-wheel was more beneficial to the male than the female.

Mr. Palmer, M.P., rose and expressed himself in favour of the motion. In his opinion it was degrading to make females work at the tread-mill, and he advocated reasoning and religious instruction towards females, rather than a system that would plunge them farther into degradation than they really were. Although strong medical opinions had been given as to the tendency of the tread-mill to improve the health, he was satisfied that it had a contrary effect, as it risked health. The Hon. Gentleman, after other observations in support of the motion, concluded his address.

Mr. Randle Jackson contended that it was a notorious fact that great benefits arose from the use of the tread-mill, and he felt himself called upon to oppose the motion.

Mr. Denison concurred with the last speaker, that the effects of the tread-mill were beneficial to that class of persons committed to it.

Mr. Holme Sumner and other magistrates expressed themselves to similar effect.

Mr. Briscoe delivered an animated speech in opposition to their opinions, and said, that irons and handcuffs were used with females (cries of "No, no"): in one instance a woman had fallen from the "mill," and was injured materially.

Mr. Denison replied that the woman wilfully precipitated herself from the machine. Several magistrates confirmed this statement.

Mr. Briscoe was of opinion that abuses still existed, and he would persist in his motion.

After considerable discussion, an amendment of Mr. Randle Jackson was carried, and the Court proceeded to other business of little importance.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS, Tuesday, Jan. 9.

Henry Fuller was indicted for assaulting Wm. John Taylor, a Sheriff's officer, while in the discharge of his duty, by presenting a loaded pistol at him.

Mr. Phillips, on the part of the prosecution, stated, that the defendant was a gentleman whose name had become familiar to the public in consequence of his having, unfortunately, been the object of recent depredations in Bethnal-green. The learned counsel then detailed the facts of the case, of which, as proved by the witnesses, the following is a short outline:—The defendant had been sued in the Palace Court for a debt of 11*l.*; but throughout the pleadings he was described by the name of Joseph, instead of Henry, and he, therefore, took no notice of the proceedings. The plaintiff having obtained judgment against him, placed the writ in the hands of the prosecutor, who together with two other officers, or assistants, proceeded to the house of the defendant, for the purpose of executing it. The defendant declared he did not owe the money, and would not be arrested: the prosecutor then, to complete the caption, touched the person of the defendant, who thereupon drew a pistol from his trousers' pocket, and, levelling it at the prosecutor's head, declared that he would shoot him, if he attempted to arrest him; upon which the officers seized him, and took him out of the house by force. He also objected that the writ was against Joseph Fuller, and not against him. When they had got a little way, the defendant asked permission to send back for his hat, which was accordingly done, and the officers at the same time released their hold of him. He was then told to walk on, but he refused to do so, and having his right hand in his trousers' pocket, he was heard, as it was then supposed, to cock a pistol, upon which he was immediately searched, and a pistol, with a stop-lock, taken from his pocket. It was not, however, cocked, but the bolt had been drawn back to admit of its being cocked; and upon its being subsequently examined, it was found to be loaded with powder and ball, (which loading, together with the pistol, was produced in Court.) The officers immediately preferred a bill of indictment against him, and went before the Grand Jury, which was sitting at the time. It further appeared that the defendant had said to a person in the house, a fortnight before this transaction took place, that he would shoot any person who would attempt to arrest him for the debt in question.

Mr. Alley, for the defendant, called witnesses to show, that his client had merely kept the pistols in his possession to protect himself against the attacks of the Bethnal-green gang, to whom he had become obnoxious, and that when he presented the pistol at the prosecutor, he mistook him and his two companions for some of those fellows, the writ not having been shown to him until afterwards. It was, moreover, contended by the learned counsel, that the writ being against a person of the name of Joseph Fuller, it did not empower the prosecutor to arrest the defendant, whose name was Henry.

This point, however, was overruled by the Chairman.

Mr. Phillips replied at considerable length, and pointed out the inconsistency of the defence, as to the defendant's mistaking the officers, with the facts proved in evidence, and particularly with the circumstance of his having previously declared his intention of shooting any person who should attempt to arrest him.

The learned Chairman having summed up the case,

The Jury returned a verdict of Guilty.

OLD BAILEY, Thursday, Jan. 11.

These Sessions commenced this morning before the Lord Mayor, Recorder, Common Sergeant, the Sheriffs, and a number of Aldermen. They all appeared in black cloth robes, in consequence of the death of the Duke of York.

The Judges in attendance were the Chief Baron Alexander, Mr. Justice Burrough, and Mr. Baron Hullock; all of whom wore black robes and black scarfs. The following is the number and nature of the offences with which the prisoners are charged:—Cutting and maiming, 1; burglary, 14; highway robbery, 6; sheep-stealing, 1; horse-stealing, 2; cattle-stealing, 1; embezzling, 5; stealing from the person, 13; stealing in the dwelling-house, 15; receiving stolen goods, 5; selling counterfeit coin, 2; fraud 1; larcenies, 150; total, 216.

Of this number 44 are females: 36 of the total number are charged with offences in the city, and 180 stand committed for offences in the county of Middlesex.

Thomas Williams, aged 24, was capitally indicted for a burglary in the house of Moses Desse, and stealing therein a tea-chest, and other articles, his property, on the 10th of December last, about the hour of seven o'clock in the evening, in the parish of St. George-in-the-East.

On the evening named, the prosecutor left his house about six o'clock, and the articles mentioned in the indictment were then there. On his return, about half past seven o'clock, they were, with other articles, gone. Three police-officers met the prisoner in Bell-lane, Spitalfields, with the property in question in his possession, and from the account he gave of his coming by it, they took him into custody.

The prisoner in his defence said, that he met a gentleman near Whitechapel church, who asked him if he wanted a job, and gave him the property to carry to a house near Shoreditch church, for which he was to pay him 1*s.* If he arrived at the house before the gentleman, he was to go to a public-house opposite, and wait for him.

The Chief Baron recapitulated the evidence, and charged the jury, that if the prisoner had got possession of the property in the manner he had stated, it was for him to prove the fact.

The Jury found the prisoner Guilty—Death.

FRIDAY, Jan. 12.

Charles Pearce, aged 22, and Henry Hitchman, aged 23, were indicted for stealing a trunk and other articles, the property of Henry Sampson, Esq., on the 20th of December.

This was one of the numerous robberies effected by descending the areas of gentlemen's houses. The trunk in question, containing articles of considerable value, was in a passage on the basement story of the prosecutor's house, in Bryanston-square. The prisoner Pearce was seen carrying the trunk in Oxford-street on the morning that it was stolen; Hitchman was following him; and passing an Officer named Webster, said, "How do you do, Webster?" This awakened his suspicions, having known Hitchman before, and they were taken into custody.

The prisoner Pearce made a very long defence, asserting his innocence, that the trunk was given him by a gentleman that he had lived with, to carry for him, and had it not so happened that Hitchman was passing near him at the time, he should not have been taken into custody.

Three persons with whom Pearce had lived gave him a good character, but they had known nothing of him for the last twelve months.

The Jury found Pearce guilty, but recommended him to mercy on account of his former good character; and Hitchman not guilty.

ATTEMPT OF PEARCE TO KILL HIMSELF IN THE COURT.

On the verdict being pronounced, Pearce said, "My Lord, I have a few words to say."

The Recorder—You cannot be heard now: if you have any thing to say in arrest of judgment, you will have the opportunity when the sentence of the Court is about to be passed.

Pearce, in a state of great agitation, said, "Two months ago I was happy and comfortable, but—" and then turning round to walk out of the dock, just as he had got to the door, he uttered some other words, the last of which was "this." Then raising his right arm, grasping a knife in his hand, he instantly stabbed himself, and fell. He was immediately conveyed to the Interior of Newgate.

Mr. Box, the surgeon, and his assistant attended, and in a few minutes it was ascertained that the wound was inflicted on the right side, and although severe, it was not expected to prove mortal.

The wound was inflicted by a sharp-pointed knife, such as is used by shoemakers, the blade of which is about six inches long, and about an inch and a quarter in width, and which he had concealed in his coat-sleeve. The defence which Pearce made, or rather the speech, was of more than twenty minutes' duration: he went into the history of his family and connexions, which were respectable, but by a speculation that he stated his father (since dead) entered into, they were greatly reduced in circumstances, and he had, in consequence, left his father's home, to seek to maintain himself, and had lived in several situations with the greatest credit to himself. For the last twelve or fifteen months he appears to have been unsettled, or, as a youth he called to his character said, "he got his living by jobbing about—by portering, and things of that sort." He is a married man, but without a family: his great concern he stated was, to save his sisters and family from the disgrace of a protracted imprisonment, or perhaps an ignominious death. During the time he was addressing the Court and Jury, he frequently burst into a flood of tears.

The whole Court were much affected by the rash attempt.

Pearce was afterwards considered to be in danger, a coldness of the extremities having taken place.

A most shocking accident occurred in Gracechurch-street. A decently dressed man, who appeared to be looking in at the window of a print-shop, slipped off the curb-stone and fell backwards, at the moment a brewer's dray was passing, the wheels of which passed over his head, and he was crushed so severely as to occasion instant death. The body, which was much disfigured, was carried into a neighbouring chymist's. He was dressed in drab gaiters, and was reported to reside near Bethnal-green.

The British Securities during the week have experienced some fluctuation, especially on Friday, when the Consol Market was visited by a panic, which produced a decline in the price for the account to 79⅞, at which some extensive business was effected, but the cause of the alarm was by no means fully explained during the day, even by any plausible rumours. This day, however, Consols commenced steady, but in the afternoon they experienced a fall, and few buyers, in consequence of Government having ordered a considerable tonnage of transports to be taken up for their service in conveying artillery to Portugal, and also the departure of Prince ESTERHAZY for Austria, it is supposed to ascertain the views of his Government relative to Spain. Consols closed at 79⅞.

HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

HORSE GUARDS, JAN. 12, 1827.

General Orders, in aid of the Ceremonial to be observed at the Funeral of Field Marshal his late Royal Highness the Duke of York and Albany, Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's Forces.

A Captain's Full Dress Guard from the Grenadier Guards, with a colour, will mount at St. James's Palace, at eight o'clock in the Forenoon of Thursday, the 18th January, as a Guard of Honour over the remains of his late Royal Highness, which will, during that, and the following day, lie in State, from ten o,clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon of each day.

A Captain's Guard from the 17th Lancers will mount at the same hour and place, on the 18th and 19th instant, in order to secure ready access to the Palace, and to preserve order.

On Saturday, the 20th January, the Royal Body will be removed from St. James's Palace to Windsor, under the Escort of a Field Officer's Guard, with a standard, consisting of One Hundred and Twenty men, to be furnished by the Second Regiment of Life Guards. This escort will assemble at the Palace, at Seven o'clock in the morning of that day, and be relieved at Cranford Bridge by a similar Guard, to be furnished by the First Regiment of Life Guards, which will proceed with the Royal Body to the door of St. George's Chapel: the first escort to fall in the rear, and form the Rear Guard.

The Royal Horse-Guards (Blues) to take the Duty in Windsor, and a Detachment of that Regiment, dismounted to attend within the Chapel, every Fourth Man bearing a Torch. The Commanding Officer of the Royal Horse-Guards (Blues) will communicate with the Sperintendent of the Lord Chamberlain's Department, as to the number of Men that will be required for this Service.

A Battalion of the Grenadier Guards will line the Approach from the Castle-Gate to tha Entrance of St. George's Chapel.

A select Detachment, consisting of the oldest Soldiers of His late Royal Highness's Regiment, will line the immediate Approach to the Entrance, and the Space in the Chapel where the Body comes into the line of the Procession.

A Subaltern's Guard from the Foot Guards is to mount at the Porch Gate, and be responsible to keep all that space clear from interruption.

A Double Line of Guards and Infantry of the Line will form from the Porch down the Street, as far as their numbers will admit, when the Cavalry must line the remainder of the road as far as Frogmore.

From Frogmore to Datchet Bridge the Communication must be kept up by Patroles, in which the Rear Guard will take a part as soon as the Procession arrives at Frogmore.

A small Picquet of the Household Brigade of Cavalry must be placed at the Junction of the Roads on the London side of Frogmore, and at Eton Bridge.

These Patroles and Picquets must remain on duty until day-break of the morning of the 21st January.

The Troops for the above service will be as follow :—

Two Regiments of Life Guards.
Royal Horse Guards.
17th Lancers.
Grenadier Guards,	2d Battalion.
Ditto	3d Ditto.
Coldstream	1st Ditto.
Third	1st Ditto.
67th Regiment of Foot.

The Royal Horse-Guards (Blue) and the 67th Regiment of Foot being already stationed at Windsor, will take their Duties from their present quarters.

But the two Regiments of Life-Gnards, and the Foot-Guards, will receive Orders to assemble at, or in the vicinity of Windsor, on the 19th instant.

A Captain's Guard of the 17th Lancers will relieve the Life Guards on Duty at the Horse-Guards at Four o'Clock, on Thursday, the 18th instant, and the whole of the 17th Lancers will move into Lonlon to furnish the duties in the absence of the Life-Guards, until the 22d instant, when the whole of the troops will return to their former quarters.

Major-General Sir Hussey Vivian will take the Command of whole troops.

Colonel the Hon. H. B. Lygon will commond the Househeld Brigade.

The Foot Guards will be commanded by Colonel Macdonell, of the Coldstream.

All the Troops employed on this duty, are to be in Full Dress.

The Master General of the Ordnance will be pleased to make arrangements for providing a Detachment of Artillery, to fire Minute guns in Windsor Park, as on former similar occasions.

By His Majesty's Command,

HENRY TORRENS, Adjutant-General.

The Philadelphia papers to the 20th, received yesterday, contain dates from Mexico to the 9th of November, which is much more recent than the intelligence received in London. A letter from an American, which is introduced into the paper in large letters, " Commercial—important !" says, " Send no more cotton goods to Mexico; a new duty of 250 per cent. on the cost prices is to be levied." We give the latter under the head—North and South American Coffee-house. This is at variance with the accounts previously received in London (though the dates are certainly not so recent), which anticipated that all the duties on import would be in effect, as well as in name, lowered. We doubt the American statement. There is a description of news known in the Havanna, and other places in the West Indies, by the name of " Yankee news," which is fabricated by the ingenious traders of the United States for the purpose of deterring all rivals from sending goods to those markets of which they are already in possession. This end is answered by exaggerating the dullness of the demand, political agitations, or expected tariffs. Whether this mercantile stratagem is played off in the present instance, we cannot undertake to say, but the amount of the duty is extremely improbable.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.---JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:---Some are in appearance at first sight " Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, " Burgis's," and many more without address.--JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

Warehouse, 107, Strand, corner of the Savoy Steps.—The Original Fish-Sauce Warehouse.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of

" MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, " C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, " HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is stongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 209, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for £1., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMAS, &c.

WILMOTT'S COUGH PILLS.—These Pills have been found, by long experience, to be a most effectual Remedy: their operation is by promoting expectoration, and gently relieving the bowels, by which means they will speedily remove the most obstinate Cough. In Asthmas, Hoarseness, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, the efficacy of these Pills is well known in a very large and extensive connection, they have stood the test of time, and the inventor can with confidence introduce them into very general use.

Sold in Boxes at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Wilmott, 83, High-street, Borough; Butler's, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom may be had Dr. FOTHERGILL's TONIC FEMALE PILLS, recommended in general Debility of the Constitution, also as a safe and excellent remedy in those periodical irregularities which Females, of delicate and languid circulation, more especially the younger part, are liable to. In Boxes, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Also Dr. FOTHERGILL's DROPS, so much celebrated for their efficacy in Nervous Disorders. In Bottles at 4s. 6d.; 11s.; and 22s.

IMPOSTURE UNMASKED.—The progress of Merit, although frequently assailed, is not impeded by Envy and Detraction. The aggression of ambuscade terminates in defeat; and conscious rectitude ultimately triumphs in the attainment of the grand object—public approbation. The test of experience is the guarantee of favour, and has established WARREN's BLACKING in general estimation; of which there exists not a stronger proof than the tacit acknowledgment of a host of servile imitators who surreptitiously obtrude on the unwary a spurious preparation as the genuine article, to the great disappointment of the unguarded purchaser, and manifest injury of WARREN, whose character and interest by this iniquitous system are equally subject to detriment. It becomes therefore an indispensable duty to CAUTION THE PUBLIC against the manœuvres of Unprincipled Venders, who having no character to lose, and stimulated by avarice in their nefarious pursuits, aim at the acquisition of money through any medium than that of honour! The original and matchless BLACKING bears on each bottle a short direction, with the signature

All others are counterfeits; and in many instances the imposition labels are artfully interlined with a different address, in very small characters, between the more conspicuous ones of " No. 30," and " STRAND." It is earnestly recommended to Shopkeepers and others who are deceived by base fabrications of WARREN's BLACKING, to return the detected trash to the source whence it came, and expose the machinations of rascality to merited obloquy.

WARREN's BLACKING is surpassingly brilliant;—it excludes damp; gives pliancy to the leather; retains its pristine virtue in all climates; and combining elegance with comfort, is an article equally of indispensable fashion and utility. Sold by every respectable Vender in Town and Country, in bottles at 6d. 10 12d. and 18d. each.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhea, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

Principiis obsta; sero medicina paratur.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author: Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

" Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

TO FAMILIES TRAVELLING, PROMENADING, and ENJOYING AQUATIC EXCURSIONS, &c. &c. are respectfully recommended the following Genuine Articles, which at this season of the Year are indispensable for the preservation of personal attraction;—

PIANOFORTES, PATENT SELF-ADJUSTING UNA-CORDA.

R. WALES, 33, Charles-street, Hampstead-road, near the end of Tottenham Court-road, Inventor and Manufacturer of the above unique instrument, solicits the attention of the musical profession, and the public in general. The Una-Corda Pianoforte is strung throughout, with steel wire, by which an equal temperament is preserved; and having only one string to each note, the insufferable discordance occasioned by bad unisons is entirely removed. It possesses a quality of tone superior in strength and sweetness to Pianofortes manufactured on the old principle; it is found to stand years in tune. The strings are not liable to break on account of their thickness and strength, added to which, the tuning pins being perforated strings may be put on by the most delicate hand. R. W. manufactures also on the lowest terms, Cabinet, Grand, and Square Pianofortes on the most approved principles.

N.B. A Grand Pianoforte by Stoddart, ditto, by Balls, in good repair, to be sold reasonable.

TO JACK FROST.

Jack! thou'rt the keenest blade I know,
Thy nose is ev'ry where, I trow;
Paul Pry's a fool to thee;
Not e'en the cellar 'scapes thy track,
But have some grace, I pray thee, Jack,
You keep no terms with me.

All's right enough, if you confine
Your gambols to the serpentine,
There cut and come again:
But, 'faith, you crack no bottle here,
Our friends, who try, have nought to fear.
The well-cork'd sunbeam, proudly clear,
Still lights our bright Champagne.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 228, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 1l., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRENCH PAPERS.

An express from Paris confirms the statement of the withdrawal of the Swiss troops from Madrid, and exhibits symptoms of a pacific disposition on the part of Spain which late accounts had led us to distrust; but this intelligence must come in a more authentic form before implicit credence can be given to it. At the same time, if it were a mere question of rational probability, there would be no grounds for a moment's doubt. The funds have risen more than half per cent.

(From the Quotidienne of Wednesday, Jan. 17.)

Lisbon, Jan. 3.—The Queen Mother, is strictly guarded (gardée a vue) by the English; and the Royalists of Lisbon, closely watched by the Constitutionalists, are treated with great rigour. The English have also a police, and this, as you may believe, is insupportable to all parties. On the 1st of January, several persons were arrested; the distrust of the Constitutionalists and of the English is so much the greater, as they are certain that the major part of the troops of the garrison are only waiting for a favourable opportunity to declare in favour of the King, Don Miguel. The discontent is general; and already several Liberals, out of hatred of the English, have joined the Royalists.

The only partisans that England still retains here are in the middling class, among the ardent Liberals, whose number is very limited; and in the higher nobility, among those who fear the Queen Mother. Among the latter are reckoned the Souzas: besides, there are among these nobles, persons who affect to appear Constitutionalists only because they have large estates in Brazil. There are few families in this situation.

Every body is convinced here, that M. de Palmella exerts all his efforts at London to oppress his country; but those members of his family who are here, are hastening to send to England their most valuable effects, which proves that they do not expect a favourable result of their projects.

The ladies of Lisbon are remarked for an implacable hatred of the English, especially since the severity shown towards the Queen Mother. In spite of the efforts of the police to conceal it, it is known that five English have already been attacked by assassins. Two are dead, and three dangerously wounded.

In general it is not known at Lisbon, where the Royal army is; but to judge by the measures of the Anglo-Portuguese police, it cannot be very far from the capital.

Paris, Jan. 16.—We hasten to lay before our readers further details which have been sent us from Madrid, respecting the extraordinary movement of troops which is taking place in Spain, and on the composition and force of the army which is assembling in the provinces adjacent to Portugal.

(From the Etoile dated Thursday, Jan. 18.)

Paris, Jan. 17.—Yesterday, before mass, his Excellency Viscount Granville, Ambassador Extraordinary from his Majesty the King of Great Britain, presented to the King, in a private audience, the letter of his Sovereign, announcing the death of his Royal Highness Frederick Duke of York, brother to his Britannic Majesty.

The French Academy in its sitting yesterday, decided that a respectful petition should be presented to the King, according to the proposal made in a previous sitting by M. Lacretelle.

This proposal was carried by a majority of 18.

It was opposed by Messrs. Auger, Cuvier, de Lally, Campeon, de Levis, de Laplace, Laine, &c., and supported by Messrs. de Chateaubriand, de Segur, de Tracy, Villemain, Lemercier, Andrieux, Raynouard, Michaud, and several of their colleagues.

(From the Courrier Francais of Wednesday, Jan. 16.)

Paris, Jan. 17.—The funds have continued to fall to-day: it was said that the news from Spain was of an unfavourable nature. What most struck the speculators was the refusal said to have been made by the English Legation to be present at the diplomatic dinner given by M. de Damas.

In general a great discouragement is observed, which results from the uncertain course that our Cabinet follows, and the fear that is excited by the intrigues of our apostolical party, intrigues which cannot fail to drag France into a war, from which commerce has every thing to fear.

The Paris journals have been ordered by the Prefect of Police, to copy from the Moniteur a second reply to their arguments against the proposed law for the press.

PARIS GOSSIP.

On Monday Marshal Soult had an audience of the King. There were several persons in his Majesty's Cabinet. The King was greatly agitated. He walked up and down with his hands in his pockets, and spoke to himself, but loud enough to be heard—"What misfortunes would have been avoided, if at the beginning of the revolution, my unfortunate brother had determined on taking part in the war between Prussia and Holland. A war occupies the public mind, and prevents people from thinking on other things, and troubling their heads about their rights, new institutions, &c. Spain has from 30,000 to 40,000 good troops, and that is enough for the present moment. War is sometimes a necessary evil. Mr. Canning will find that he has not such a simpleton to deal with as he would seem to expect. Spain does not choose to put up with insults, and Spain is in the right."

A few days ago the Dauphin said to one of his confidants, "Ah, mon Dieu! Spain is in a sad state: there is no certainty of any thing with such a weak and wavering character as Ferdinand: he changes his policy every day. The influence of the Monks is all-powerful with him. It is much to be feared that they will hurry him into a war."

The Committee of the Chamber of Peers has unanimously resolved that the petition of M. de Montlosier against the Jesuits should be taken into consideration.

A Madrid letter of January 4, which has been published in the Courrier Francais, says:—"After the taking of Almeida, Mr. Lamb transmitted three notes to our Government. In the first, his Excellency said, he knew positively that it was from Ciudad Rodrigo that they had furnished artillery; in the second, he added, that the prisoners made by the rebels had been sent into Spain; and, in the third, he designated even the place to which they had been ordered. M. Salmon replied to these notes, that he had communicated to the contents of them to the Minister of War, and that the latter knew nothing of the injuries which had been complained of by his Excellency, and that no instructions on that subject had issued from his department. Mr. Lamb affected to be satisfied with the answers of M. Salmon, but nobody is duped by his prevarication, and though the foreign journals talk of peace, union, and a good understanding between the Great Powers, every one now is of opinion that immediately that the English have concentrated their forces in Portugal, and taken, in consequence, their measures, the veil will be withdrawn, and they will declare themselves with energy."

We extract from the German papers of Friday the following:—

Constantinople, Dec. 15.—Among the most remarkable ordinances that have appeared since the reforms undertaken in the internal administration, is the firman issued some time ago relative to the inheritances of the Mahometan and other subjects of the Porte, and the abolition of confiscation. This firman is to the following effect:—

"The Janissaries, by their audacity and insubordination, had been led to the commission of all kinds of excesses, and, by their exorbitant demands, exhausted the treasury; they had by this means prevented affairs from being regulated in a proper manner. Among the evils arising from this was that of confiscation and inventories of inheritance, as a necessary consequence to make up for the deficiency caused in the treasury by the sums expended on the Janissaries; but now that by the dissolution of the Janissaries, and the entire abolition of their name, it was become possible to purify the Government of the Sultan from this stain, he had been able to give the following order:—That since, thanks to Heaven, the Sublime Porte and all Mussulmen are henceforth sincere against the excesses of the said corps (of Janissaries), the profuse waste of the public money shall cease; that from this time forward people are especially to attend, with the aid of God in all things, to the observance of the pure law, that they do not depart in any point from the book of God, and the usages observed by his Prophet; and that above all things, from this day forward, the ruinous system of confiscation shall be abolished, so that on the death of a Vizier, a Pacha of two tails, a Minister, or any other officer of the Sublime Porte, or any other considerable person at Constantinople; or, on the other hand, of an Ayan, a Waiwode, a Mutselim, a Merchant, in short, of any Mussulman or Raya, whoever he may be, the whole of his property, be it great or small, all his effects and property, shall be divided among his widow and orphans, as God has made it our duty, and neither the Exchequer, nor any other whatever shall interfere; that the officers of justice shall not make any inventory of the property inherited by persons not minors, for whose benefit the law orders inventories to be made; no higher duty shall be charged than one paraper piastre. God forbid, that an asper more should be exacted under the denomination of Kiatibie or any other. Inventories ordered by the law shall be made by the local authorities and no others. The Vizirs, Pachas of two tails, Mutselims, &c. &c. are not to demand an asper, or to interfere in any manner in such affairs. In consequence, persons have been dispatched to each of the three military divisions of Romelia and Anatolia, to acquaint them with this irrevocable decision of the Sultan, which is to be strictly observed; Bujuruldas (Vizir's orders) to the same effect have been sent to the Kadiaskiers of Romelia and Analatolia, to the Cadi of Constantinople and Scutari, to the inspectors of charitable institutions in the two holy cities, and of the gardens of the Sultan. All those to whom they are addressed are to conform strictly to the resolutions of the Sultan, founded on justice, to take care that it is strictly executed, and to prevent any violation of it."

The Mehmander who is to receive M. de Ribeaupierre, set out for Rudschuk the day before yesterday.

The following is a letter from Capt. A. Hastings, who sailed for Greece in the Perseverance steam vessel:—

"Karteria Syra, Nov. 8.—My friends, the Idriotes, particularly the Conduriottis, have been busily at work against me, and I think I cannot revenge myself better than by giving publicity to their own reports. Perhaps you would announce in a paper, that letters received from Greece contain a statement from Idra, wherein Captain A. Hastings is accused of endeavouring to carry off the steam-vessel under his command, and sell her to the Turks.

"I have much on hand, and shall sail in a few days for the fleet, therefore excuse haste."

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

MR. WELLESLEY AND HIS CHILDREN.

The arguments in this case being fixed for Tuesday, at Lincoln's Inn Hall, the Court was crowded at an early hour. Mr. Wellesley was present, and sat with his Counsel.

The Attorney General commenced by saying, the facts of the case had been so often detailed, it was unnecessary to go farther into them now. The first and principal ground upon which he was compelled to ask that Mr. Wellesley should not have the care of his children was, that Mr. Wellesley had deliberately sworn in his affidavit what was not true.

Mr. Wellesley, who was sitting immediately behind the Attorney-General, half rose from his seat, and in a loud tone asked—What is that?

The Attorney-General: I will not be interrupted.

Mr. Wellesley: Then you shall not say that.

The Attorney-General appealed to the Court to prevent such interruption.

The Lord Chancellor said, that no such interruption could be allowed in this Court.

The Attorney-General: Having been once interrupted, he would repeat what he had before asserted, that one ground upon which he was compelled to ask that Mr. Wellesley should not have the care of his children was, that Mr. Wellesley had deliberately sworn, in his affidavit, that which was not true, that he had suborned in a case which had been fabricated in absolute falsehood.—[Here Mr. Wellesley again rose from his seat, and attempted a second interruption. He sat down, muttering two or three inaudible words.]—And this was the man against whom it now stood proved, that an adulterous intercourse was actually carried on between him and Mrs. Bligh. This was the man who had ventured, at Naples, to make an affidavit before the Consul there, that he never had committed adultery. This was what he (the Attorney-General) should term moral perjury; and he called it so, because no indictment could be maintained, and because it could not receive a lighter appellation, when a man had sacrificed his word and his honour in the satement of such a fact [a sneer from Mr. Wellesley]. It was this man who was carrying on, at that very time, a constant connection with the woman who had been introduced into the very house in which his virtuous wife resided. This was the man who had carried on a scandalous, constant, and unremitting intercourse with a woman whose adulterous conduct had been proved at a trial which had lately taken place, and which had formed the basis of the very large damages which had been given on that occasion. [Mr. Wellesley appeared peculiarly uneasy, and, in a low tone, denied the assertion.] Innumerable affidavits had been since made to shew that a subsequent adulterous intercourse had subsisted between the parties; by which it would be seen that when Mrs. Bligh lived in York-street, she was in the constant habit of coming home between two, three, and four o'clock in the morning, sometimes in company with Mr. Wellesley, and sometimes without him. [Oh! from Mr. Wellesley.]

The Attorney-General was here about to read the affidavits, when Mr. Hart objected, inasmuch as they would introduce a new case.

The Lord Chancellor said, if the affidavits had not been filed, he certainly should have called for them; and as to the imputation of perjury against Mr. Wellesley, he (the Lord Chancellor) had no right to prevent Counsel from pursuing that course. Although the jurisdiction of this Court in these matters was unquestionable, yet it was one of a most delicate and painful nature, and ought never to be exercised but in cases of the clearest kind, and of the greatest emergency. It was impossible but that imputations must rest upon those whose affairs were subjected to such an interference.

Mr. Wellesley here rose, and with a loud voice, and most vehement action, said, "My Lord, I have been now suffering under these imputations for more than twelve months, and here is the Attorney-General (pointing to the Learned Gentleman, who sat just below him,) who dares to declare that I, a man of honour, have been guilty of perjury. I call upon your Lordship with a voice of an Englishman and a parent, to take the affidavits, read them, digest them, and decide upon them, in God's name. My Lord, what must be my feelings when I know that my children are at this moment in the keeping of a man—of Dr. Bulkeley, who dares to declare that he is a reader of the Novelle di Casti, a work I have never read, but which I understand treats of blasphemy, and every species of obscenity and villany which the human mind can contemplate; and this, my Lord, is the man who has been the director of the education of my children for twelve months. In God's name, my Lord, relieve me from this injustice! If I am infamous, declare me to be so, and take away my children. If I am an honest man, administer to me what I have a right to ask, and what I now demand as an English gentleman—my rights. I cannot speak calmly on this subject, my feelings overcome me. Consider my situation—it is death to me! For God Almighty's sake, give your judgment one way or the other.

The Lord Chancellor (who had listened to Mr. Wellesley with the greatest attention) then said, I shall give my judgment, Mr. Wellesley, as soon as I have heard Counsel. Give me leave to say, that while I cannot disapprove of your feelings as an English gentleman, I am bound to do my duty as an English Judge—that duty I will perform, and will do no more.

Mr. Wellesley—In God's name, let it be speedily.

The Lord Chancellor—Give me leave to add, that decency, both in countenance and in speech, is most fitted for this place.

The Attorney-General proceeded, and remarked upon the affidavits affirming a continuance of the adulterous intercourse, as well as on the affidavits on the other side, on which latter he was prepared to repeat the expressions with which he commenced, that a case had been suborned through the testimony of witnesses, who, he would again say, had grossly perjured themselves. Indeed, it was proved to demonstration, by evidence which could not be contradicted. The whole case, then, amounted to this—whether an individual who had so conducted himself, was or was not a fit person to have the custody of children. He humbly contended that such a person was wholly unfit for such an office. His Lordship was an English Judge, vested with most extensive powers: and it was incumbent upon his Lordship, however painful the task might be, to put in force those powers with which he had been wisely entrusted.

Mr. Shadwell said, he also appeared as Counsel with the Attorney-General, for these infant children. He was perfectly willing to accept the pledge which Mr. Wellesley, in person, had tendered; and, after hearing the whole case, if his Lordship possessed that mental courage which would enable him to state, that he implicitly believed what Mr. Wellesley had sworn, he (Mr. Shadwell) would at once abandon his case.

Mr. Wellesley—You may do as you please.

The Learned Counsel then proceeded to remark on the affidavits filed by Mr. Wellesley, in which he stated that he had received a letter from his wife recalling him home, when, as the Learned Counsel affirmed, on the affidavits of the Misses Long, Mrs. Wellesley had not written to him at all; but on the contrary had written to Lord Maryborough (his father), a letter full of grief, which shewed, more than all the affidavits which had been or could be produced, the manner in which her feelings had been insulted by her husband. "The moment," Mrs. Wellesley said to his Lordship, "is now come, when seeing Mr. Wellesley lost to all sense of tenderness or justice, and hardened to every vice, all hope is at an end, and the union between him and me is impossible." In a subsequent part she adds, "Can I forget that he has repeatedly made me the victim of infamous women?" This was the representation which the unhappy and injured wife made of the conduct of her husband, who had now ventured to swear that his conduct towards his wife had always been that of tenderness, affection, and respect—that he never treated her "with the most trifling degree of disrespect." Either words had no meaning, or Mr. Wellesley had totally different feelings and notions from the rest of mankind. Was it, he would again ask, consistent with all that ardent affection, to be living in open adultery with another woman? And Mrs. Wellesley declared, that she had been made the victim of infamous women.

Mr. Wellesley jumped up upon hearing these words, and with the greatest vehemence, exclaimed, "Good God! I hope your Lordship will not allow this. Upon my soul—Good God!—It is to much—Good God!"

Mr. Shadwell then proceeded to read the affidavit of Dr. Southcot, to explain the nature of the disease under which Mr. Wellesley laboured; and that, in consequence of his advice, Mr. Wellesley went to Paris to consult Dr. M'Lachlan, an eminent French surgeon, who confirmed Dr. Southcot's opinion as to the complaint. [Mr. Wellesley here laughed aloud, and appeared with difficulty to repress his feelings, and the Lord Chancellor said if he did not behave with decency, he should not sit in Court.] Mr. Shadwell, after commenting on other affidavits, concluded by asking if it was fit that an infamous adultress should be the companion and instructress of these virtuous infant children? and begged to impress upon the Court, that if the female infant was to live in the house of her father, it would be impossible that she should move in those high and dignified circles to which her rank justly entitled her.

The Court then rose, and on Wednesday the arguments were renewed.

Mr. Pepys, on the same side, commented on the several affidavits, and maintained the unfitness of Mr. Wellesley to have the guardianship of his children. He who, in his letters to his boys, had used expressions disgraceful even to the Lazzaroni of an Italian city—he who, a victim to the worst of vices, and so regardless of his means, as to have been compelled to fly his country because he had squandered an immense property in a disgraceful manner—was he the fit protecter of these infants? No. His conduct was the same now, as his past had been: he was still the same character he was when his persecuted wife recorded his unfitness to govern his children. The sufferings of this much-injured lady in her last moments were intense, increased, he would say, by the forcible intrusion of her husband in the asylum she had chosen for her residence. And what was the object of that intrusion? Was it for the purpose of a reconciliation? No. He knew that proceedings would be commenced for a separation on the grounds of his adultery, and he endeavoured to obtain a communication with his wife by stratagem, with a view to make it appear afterwards, that it was with her own consent. At the very time that he so pursued Mrs. Wellesley he was still engaged in his connection with the adulteress. The effect of his visit to Mrs. Wellesley's house on that occasion had had a most injurious effect upon her mind and body, already in some degree overpowered by the ill treatment she had sustained, and that intrusion had reduced her to the necessity of applying to her servants to protect her from his violence. This visit had destroyed her mind; so much so, indeed, that the very sight of a letter addressed in his hand-writing brought on a paroxysm of her disorder which almost proved fatal. She earnestly implored her sisters to remove her children, in the event of her death, from their father's care. That event shortly after took place; the spasms returned, which first produced delirium, and ultimately terminated in death. It was the dying injunction of a tender and affectionate mother to protect her children from the influence of their father's example. He (Mr. Pepys) did not ask that the Misses Long should have the care of those children—no; all he asked was, that the Court would be pleased to appoint some person to look after their education, who had not so disgraced himself as a husband and a father as Mr. Wellesley had done. Habitual drunkenness had been held a sufficient ground for the interference of that Court; and surely habitual adultery would not be regarded as too weak; and he conjured his Lordship to exercise that right which he held, as the representative of his Sovereign, to interpose his protection, and to snatch the unfortunate children from the abyss which threatened them, before it was too late.

Mr. Treslove followed on the same side, and maintained that Mr. Wellesley's affidavits were not entitled to the least consideration. They were not supported by any of his numerous and highly-respectable connexions—his own father indeed had expressed an opinion of his conduct in the strongest terms of reprobation—no one could be found to give testimony in his behalf, and all his power was destroyed by his own misconduct. The Learned Gentleman concluded by expressing his firm conviction that the Court would shield the children by the arm of justice, and protect them from the baleful influence of him who sought to have the direction of their lives.

Mr. Hart, on behalf of Mr. Wellesley, then rose, and expressed himself satisfied that he should be able to shew his Lordship that no just ground had been made out upon which the Court would take from Mr. Wellesley the natural protection of his children. The Learned Gentleman then proceeded to argue on the different affidavits which had been filed against his client, commenting severely on several of them, and contrasting them with those sworn to by the opposite party. He was not there to justify the connection which Mr. W. had, unhappily, formed at one time with Mrs. Bligh; but because that connection had once existed, that was no reason why it should last for ever. The fact was, it was most abundantly proved, that Mr. W. had been for months struggling to put a complete termination to that connection. All intercourse had ceased, except such as could not by possibility be avoided.

The Learned Counsel was proceeding, when the Lord Chancellor rose, and said he would go on with the hearing to-morrow (Thursday.)

Mr. Hart, on Thursday morning, resumed his argument on behalf of Mr. Wellesley, and again commented with great severity on the affidavit of Dr. Bulkeley, contrasting it in its material points with that given by Mr. Wellesley, and drawing conclusions favourable to his client. He considered the Doctor's evidence but as a rope of sand; it was, he said, rotten at the heart, and totally destroyed by investigation. He (Dr. B.) had been ready enough to make affidavits in that Court, but he did not come forward at the trial for crim. con., where he would have to submit to a cross-examination, and it was well known his evidence could not be relied on. The Learned Counsel then proceeded to defend his client from the vile aspersions which had been thrown on his character, and to comment upon other affidavits. With respect to the allusions so strongly urged by the opposite Counsel, "that none of Mr. Wellesley's near connexions had come forward on the present occasion," he (Mr. Hart) could give the most satisfactory explanation—they were satisfied of his general conduct, and therefore held back, lest it might be supposed the weight of their influence might influence the proceedings. The Learned Counsel concluded, by expressing his conviction that the Court would decide that there was nothing in the conduct of his client towards his wife which would militate against his children being placed under their father's protection.

Mr. Horne followed on the same side, rebutting many of the accusations against Mr. Wellesley, and commenting on the affidavits of Dr. Bulkeley and O'Meara. He maintained that Mrs. Wellesley, as she herself had written, had expressed her firm conviction of Mrs. Bligh's innocence when she withdrew her protection from that lady at Naples; and this evidence alone would produce a fatal effect on the character of the Doctor's testimony.

Here the Court rose, and as Friday was a Seal day, and the Court was closed yesterday, the further arguments were adjourned till Monday.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, Guildhall, Jan. 16.

Conspiracy.—Richard Dixon, James Marshall, James Millwood, John Henry Nairn, Richard Oddy, Benjamin Seley, John Cox, Samuel Pullen, Samuel Davis, Thomas Peacock, William Gray, attorney-at-law, and John Haselden, were indicted for a conspiracy, to sue out a Commission of Bankrupt against John Haselden, and to prove, under the same, certain fraudulent and fictitious Bills of Exchange, and cause the defendants Dixon and Marshall to be chosen assignees of the bankrupt, and by means thereof to procure the bankrupt a certificate, for the purpose of preventing the due administration of the bankrupt's estate and effects amongst his bona fide creditors. Since the indictment was preferred, the defendant Peacock had died.

To prove the case it was necessary to release some of these and other parties concerned in the conspiracy: viz. a Captain Bayley, the late Master of the Ceremonies at Bath (Guinette), Whittenhall, Oddy, Cox, Pullen, Davies. These witnesses proved the facts against all the prisoners (except Millwood), acknowledging that they had proved debts under the estate upon fictitious or purposely-concocted bills.

The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up, was of opinion there was not sufficient evidence to justify a conviction against Millwood; and with respect to the proof against Gray and Dixon, his Lordship thought it but of a dubious character, especially as it depended chiefly, if not entirely, on the credibility of those who acknowledged themselves to have been guilty of performing a part in this conspiracy. The testimony, however, against Haselden, Nairn, and Marshall was less suspicious, and was supported by the indubitable proof of written documents, and confirmed in some points by the evidence of persons whose credibility was unimpeached. They would use their own discretion in their verdict.

The Jury retired at 20 minutes after 11 o'clock, and at a little more than ten minutes after one o'clock returned with a verdict of Guilty against Haselden, Gray, Marshall, and Nairn; and acquitted Millwood and Dixon.

THURSDAY, Jan. 18.

LANAUSE V. PALMER.

This was an action brought for the recovery of a sum of 1,600l. the amount of nine bills, bearing fictitious names, as drawers and acceptors, and purporting to have been indorsed by the defendant. The plaintiff is a bill-broker, residing in Dublin—the defendant a salesman, in Liverpool. It appeared from what the witness stated, that the latter had employed a person named M'Manus to purchase cattle for him in Ireland; and that person had negociated several bills, purporting to have been indorsed by Palmer, but which were not really so, yet Palmer had ultimately paid them. The nine bills, which formed the subject of the present action, had been discounted by Lanause for M'Manus. They were dishonoured. The witnesses deposed, that after the most minute inquiries at the Banking-houses, Post-offices, and in the Directories of the towns (Liverpool and Manchester) where the drawers and acceptors were stated to reside, no trace of them could be discovered. When Palmer was applied to for payment, he answered, that it was clear M'Manus had been forging his name, and he refused to pay the 1,600l. Evidence was given to show, that notice had been served upon the defendant, to produce certain bills, the amount of which he had paid, and which had been negociated by M'Manus, they purporting to bear Palmer's endorsement. Upon this, some discussion arose between the Counsel on both sides, Mr. Scarlett, for the defendant, contending that his client was not bound to produce those bills, nor was he called on to admit their existence; nothing was more improbable than to suppose that Palmer would be accessary to the forging of his own name, or that he would pay the amount of dishonoured bills which he had never endorsed.

Mr. Pollock, for the plaintiff, replied, that the defendant must have known the fictitious character of the bills which he had formerly paid, and could not have been ignorant of the course M'Manus was pursuing, with the advantage of his name and credit, and that he must be considered as having assumed the whole debt, by having lent himself to the schemes of M'Manus.

Mr. Scarlet said, that the question was, whether there had been laid before the Court legal evidence to show that Palmer knew of his name having been put on those nine bills.

The Lord Chief Justice said, that those considerations were not sufficient to justify his withdrawing the case from the Jury—he would leave it in their hands. Though the defendant had declined the payment of those nine bills, yet there were twenty-five bills which it appeared he had paid, all of them of dates to fall due after the period at which he had refused the demand of the present plaintiff. For the payment of twenty-five bills he gave directions and found funds, and that, too, after he had refused payment of the plaintiff's demand, and after M'Manus had absconded. Under such a view of the case, the defendant allowing those bills to go into the world with the advantage of his credit and name, he could not withdraw the question from the consideration of the Jury.

Mr. Scarlett addressed the Jury for the defendant. The principal ground relied upon by the Learned Counsel for the plaintiff was, the words alleged to have been spoken by the defendant to a Mr. Kelly in the Cattle Market; but there could not be a doubt that Mr. Kelly, who admitted that he was at the time in a great passion, had mistaken the precise words spoken by Mr. Palmer. When his respectable character was taken into consideration, there could be no doubt that he would not have risked that character by doing business with M'Manus, after he had reason to believe that he had committed forgery. The Learned Counsel, having stated the facts which he should be able to establish in evidence, concluded by expressing his conviction that when the Jury should have heard the evidence they would find a verdict for the defendant.

From the evidence for the defence, it appeared that his signature upon the bills was a forgery—that the defendant had never taken up a bill for M'Manus except with funds furnished by M'Manus—that M'Manus went from Dublin to Liverpool, and from thence to New York, in December, 1825; and that, during his stay of about a week in the former town, he never went out of doors except by night.

His Lordship, in summing up, said, the only question for the consideration of the Jury was, did the defendant know that M'Manus was in the habit of negociating bills endorsed with the defendant's name? If the Jury should be of opinion that the defendant was aware of that circumstance, then their verdict must be for the plaintiff; but if the Jury should not be of a contrary opinion, then their verdict would be for the defendant.

The Jury immediately found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 1,612l. 4s. 5d.

LIBEL.—Friday.

HAYTHORNE AND ANOTHER V. WRIGHTSON.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, Messrs. Haythorne and Wright, bankers, at Bristol, against the defendant, who is the proprietor of the Birmingham Chronicle, to recover from him a compensation in damages, for having inserted the names of the plaintiffs in a list of bankers who had stopped payment, in a number of his journal published on Thursday, the 29th of December, 1825. No special damage was averred, and the defendant pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Scarlett (with whom was Mr. F. Pollock) shortly stated the case on the part of the plaintiffs. The Jury were well aware, that in the month of December, 1825, the greatest despondency and distress pervaded the commercial classes of society, and at that period, under the head of bankers who had failed, the defendant had inserted the names of the plaintiffs. It was unnecessary to enlarge upon the mischievous tendency of such a statement, at such a time, to bankers, above all others; but it appeared that the defendant felt himself perfectly at liberty to state what he pleased, for in the motto of his Paper he announced

"I must have liberty with all,
As wide a charter as the wind,
To blow on what I please."

If, however, he thought fit to make a statement respecting a respectable banking-house, calculated to ruin and destroy them, though happily the paragraph in question had not produced such an effect, he must be answerable to the party aggrieved. The defendant's Paper, which was a weekly one, was published on a Thursday, and though the defendant was written to as soon as ever the publication was known to the plaintiffs, he took no pains to contradict the report he had been the channel for circulating, in the interval between that and his next publication. It was rather an aggravation, that the plaintiffs' was the banking-house appointed to receive the collections of excise in the neighbourhood of Bristol, and if this libel had come under the eye of those in power here, an extent in aid might have instantly gone down, swept away the plaintiffs' effects, and produced the calamitous result which the defendant had avouched as having already taken place.

Joseph May, a clerk to the plaintiffs, proved that they were bankers at Bristol, and issued promissory notes, which were not payable in London.

The proprietorship and the publication of the Paper in question were admitted.

The paragraph in question was then read, which was to this effect:—

"Bank Failures.—We subjoin a list, which we believe to be a correct one, of the failures of banks, not a few of whom we have reason to believe will be able to resume payments."

Mr. Brougham (with whom was Mr. D. F. Jones) addressed the Jury at considerable length for the defendants, and undertook to demonstrate to the jury that the insertion of this paragraph was purely accidental. The Learned Counsel did not pretend to deny that the printers and publishers of newspapers were responsible for whatever they published, and it would be very easy for the jury to place themselves in the situation of the plaintiffs; but he called upon them also to consider the position in which the defendant was placed. If he did not, through the medium of his journal, afford every information in his power on subjects important to the public, he might as well at once shut up shop. He took not the list in question from the idle rumours of the day, or from the conversation of merchants at the usual place of business in Birmingham, but he went to Messrs. Attwood, Spooner, and Co.'s banking-house, in that great commercial town, where he was shown the list circulated by bankers themselves; and that list he had published. It was conceded that he could have no malice; and in his very next publication, he inserted the following article:—"We regret to state that, in our last week's journal, we inserted the name of the very respectable house of Haythorne and Company, of Bristol, as having stopped payment. We understand, so far from this being the case, during the whole of the severe run, this was one of the three banking-houses that discounted freely for their customers, and paid all their notes in gold." This apology, therefore, which was not dealt out in a niggardly or stingy manner, made every amends possible within the defendant's power, and it was clear that the plaintiffs had not sustained any loss or injury by the inadvertent mistake, or they would have proved it.

The learned Counsel then called witnesses, who proved that the list published was given to the defendant by the house of Attwood, Spooner, and Co., bankers in Birmingham, and they had received it from their correspondents, Messrs. Attwood, Spooner, and Co., bankers in London.

Mr. Scarlett, in reply, put in a letter from the defendant to the plaintiffs' attornies, in which he stated that he could not find the newspaper from which he had taken the list; but not saying that he had received it from Messrs. Attwoods and Co.

Mr. Brougham addressed the jury upon this additional evidence. He observed that other newspapers had been misled by the bankers' lists, as well as his (the defendant's), to which he alluded when he said he could not find the paper from which he had taken the list in question; and the circumstance of his not giving up Messrs. Attwoods as the persons who furnished the lists, proceeded from a feeling of honour at the moment, which was more to his credit than his disadvantage.

Mr. Scarlett, in reply, contended that the defendant had lent himself to the malice of others, and now acknowledged that he chose to place himself in their situation. He acknowledged by his defence, "Adsum qui feci! In me convestile ferrum."

The Chief Justice summed up the evidence, and the jury retired. After being out some time, they returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 250l.

DUCHY COURT OF LANCASTER, Dec. 17.

WAKEFIELD'S CASE.

IN THE MATTER OF THE SURETIES OF WM. WAKEFIELD.

It will be recollected that at the last Assizes, the above-named defendant was to have been tried, with his brother, for the abduction of Miss Turner; but in consequence of his having absconded after the Grand Jury were discharged, the recognizances of his sureties, Dr. Davies and Mr. Cuthbert, were estreated into this Court.

Mr. Parke now appeared for the sureties, and took a preliminary objection that this case was not within the jurisdiction of the Duchy Court of Lancaster.

The Court overruled that objection, and said that its validity might be tried by bringing an action of trespass against the Sheriff.

Mr. Parke then submitted that there was a fatal objection to the estreat, on the ground of informality. The recognizances had been entered into by the defendant in the Court of King's Bench, and consequently the estreat ought to have been returned into that Court, in order that it might be handed over to his Majesty's Exchequer, where it would be applied to the general service of the Crown. Instead of this, however, it had been returned into the Duchy Court of Lancaster, where it could only be applied to the King's private personal service in his capacity as Duke of Lancaster. The Learned Counsel submitted, in the second place, that the recognizances of the sureties ought not to be estreated at all, because the defendant, Mr. W. Wakefield, had literally complied with the terms imposed on him. At the last Lancaster Assizes he had attended in Court de die in diem, until the Grand Jury had been discharged, and consequently he was there to meet any charge, or answer any matters that might be alleged against him. Moreover he had been actually placed in the dock, and the circumstances of his not having remained there, but having removed into the body of the Court behind his Counsel, did not originate with him, and therefore ought not to be alleged against him as an objection in a criminal matter.

Mr. Justice Park observed, upon this objection, that if it were insisted upon it would utterly destroy any inclination on the part of a Judge to indulge a prisoner, or afford convenience to his Counsel.

Mr. Parke proceeded at some length to argue the above points, and referred to the 33d Henry VIII; 30th Charles II., and the case of the Queen v. Ridpath, in Hawkins's Pleas of the Crown.

The Court, after mature deliberation, decided, that there was no foundation in law for any of the objections taken; and therefore judgment must be pronounced, for the Duke of Lancaster.

Mr. Parke then applied for the indulgence of the Court, and prayed that proceedings might be stayed, and that the amount of the recognizances, which was now paid into Court, might not be handed over to the Crown, until after the next Spring Assizes, when, he had reason to believe, that the defendant, William Wakefield, would appear, and take his trial. If that turned out to be the case, the sureties would have an opportunity of applying to the Crown for its lenient indulgence, and praying for the return of the money now paid into Court. This application was founded upon the affidavit of Mr. Cuthbert and Dr. Davies, the two sureties, who swore positively that William Wakefield absented himself from Lancaster, at the last Assizes, without their privity, knowledge, or consent, and that they had no expectation whatever of being indemnified.

Mr. Grant, on the part of the Crown, expressed his willingness to accede to whatever the Court might think reasonable.

The Court then granted the indulgence prayed.

OLD BAILEY, Jan. 16.

The business of the Sessions being concluded, the Recorder proceeded to pass sentence on the prisoners.

Death—J. Adams, J. Finch, Eliza Davies, T. Williams, C. Lewis, J. Cranley, E. Webster, J. Willson, W. Howard, F. Langley, R. Young, for burglary; and Honour Baldwin, S. Willson, W. Davis, D. Burns, W. Jones, aged eight years, R. Hill, and T. Vandereer, for stealing in a dwelling-house; Mary Ann Sullivan and Martha Bellamy, for stealing from the person; J. Whitehead, for highway robbery; D. Davis, for post-office robbery.

The unfortunate Pierce, who stabbed himself, was not well enough to receive sentence. He is considered by the surgeon to be in a more favourable state, although not out of danger.

Transportation for Life—Susannah Hammond and T. Cordwell.

A great number were ordered for transportation and to be imprisoned for various periods, and kept to hard labour, others were fined, and a more than ordinary number of juvenile thieves were ordered to be whipped and discharged.

MR. WELLESLEY.

During the whole of Wednesday the Court of Chancery was crowded in every part by persons—some of them watching with apparent interest the progress of the cause—and all evidently anxious to catch even a momentary glimpse of Mr. Wellesley's person. That gentleman occupied a seat in the second row of benches, allotted to Counsel, and almost immediately behind Mr. Hart. His demeanour, during the speeches of the defendant's Counsel, was more composed than it was the previous day, and his interruptions less frequent. Occasionally, while Mr. Hart was engaged in dissecting the affidavits of the adverse party, his client found it difficult to repress all symptoms of satisfaction, and he frequently communicated his suggestions to the learned leader and the junior counsel by whom he was surrounded. When the Court rose, there was a simultaneous rush of people from those parts of the Hall which did not command a view of the position occupied by Mr. Wellesley during the proceedings. This circumstance, added to the anxiety of all present to obtain a closer view of the hero of the day, caused such a pressure about the space usually occupied by counsel, as for a short time to obstruct the egress of these learned gentlemen. This difficulty removed, Mr. Wellesley proceeded down the centre of the Court alone, the spectators forming a lane for him to pass. As he reached the door, he was assailed with hisses, cries of "Shame," and other unequivocal tokens of disapprobation. The persecution gained additional vigour in the open air, and accompanied Mr. Wellesley across the whole of the large square, till at length he took refuge in the Chambers of No. 9. Twice he stopped and faced his assailants; once opposite the Vice-Chancellor's Court, where he turned, and placing his hands upon his lips, smiled a gay and somewhat good humoured defiance; and again, at the entrance of the chambers to which he retreated, as he gained the entrance door some of the spectators cried out, "You have murdered your wife,"—while others, less charitable, exclaimed, "You ought to be hanged?"

Delays in Chancery.—On Monday the Lord Chancellor gave his decision in the cause 'Lucena v. Crawford,' which was an application for an order of the Court, declaring that 2000l. had become forfeited in consequence of the defendant having entered into another business, namely, the business of Consul. His Lordship did not think the forfeiture had taken place, and therefore that the money could not be paid to the account of the plaintiff, Mr. Horne and Mr. Hart, as Counsel for the parties, said the matter had occurred so long ago, that though they had both been employed, they had entirely forgotten all the circumstances of the case—they had indeed forgotten on which side each was engaged, and consequently to whose side the judgment was favorable!

The King's Letter to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, on behalf of the distressed manufacturing districts, was read on Sunday last in the several churches in and round the Metropolis, and in many of them appropriate sermons were preached, enforcing the claims of the sufferers upon public charity. Mr. S. Wesley, the celebrated organist, has suggested that a Selection of Sacred Music in the Metropolitan Churches and Chapels, to be performed by the principal vocal and instrumental performers, "who would all willingly give their assistance," might, on moderate terms of admission, be exceedingly productive, and urgently proffers his powerful assistance in furtherance of so desirable an object.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"PARLIAMENT GINGERBREAD, No. 2," has been received, and shall be inserted in due time—"dulce est decipere in loco."

N. B.—OUR OTHER NUMEROUS CORRESPONDENTS, AND VARIOUS IMPORTANT ARTICLES, MUST STAND OVER UNTIL NEXT WEEK, FOR THE CALAMITOUS EVENT OF YESTERDAY ABSORBS EVERY OTHER CONSIDERATION.

THE AGE.

LONDON, JANUARY 21.

Before the distribution of our present number, the remains of his Royal Highness the Duke of YORK will have been committed to the vault of his illustrious family. Designing to satisfy the extensive and minute curiosity of the public, we have devoted our columns, to the exclusion of all other matter, to the most ample details respecting the preliminary forms and attendant circumstances of the mournful ceremony of his ROYAL HIGHNESS's interment. To preclude the possibility of any error in our account of these sad solemnities, we have cautiously abstained from the insertion of ought on the foundation of hearsay and conjecture; indeed, that we might afford our numerous readers an authentic document, for present information as well as future reference, we have placed unlimited means, at the disposal of accredited and discriminating persons, for the acquirement of such particulars, as will conspire to render our relation original, interesting, accurate, and comprehensive. Having made these provisions, at considerable expence, we unhesitatingly refer our readers to details of the purest authenticity. We are desirous of observing that, on this momentous and sorrowful occasion, we have felt ourselves bounden, by the serious character of the event, to withhold from our columns such factitious incidents, as have sprung from an indecent indifference to the means employed to impose on the general anxiety, by a circulation of imaginary statements. Our columns may therefore be consulted as a record of rigid precision; and, we are confident that our readers will concur with us in thinking, that our unadorned account of the funeral solemnity, unassisted by extraneous matter, is sufficient to extend and impress that lesson of admonitory sorrow, which all pious and meditative beholders will already have derived from the obsequies of departed greatness—greatness it may indeed be called—for it was formed of Christian virtues, and devoted to the furtherance of human welfare.

At this awful moment of a nation's calamity, which has whelmed in its depth—not only every smaller enmity or petty discontent, but even the very voice of lamentation—how sensibly developed is the undissembled feeling of a moral and religious people! All sentiments of anger have elapsed, and yielded to the impulse of generous regret; every tumultuary feeling has subsided into the tranquillity of fond, though sorrowful, remembrance. The stronger poignancy of individual affliction has been subdued by the consolatory suggestions of future blessedness, which shed on the spirits of the confiding that exquisite harmony of hope and resignation, which animates us to ask, Where is the sting of Death—where is the victory of the grave?

We cannot but commend the judicious views, by which the splendid dignities, attendant on his ROYAL HIGHNESS's interment, have been dictated: our hearts and our conviction join in approbation of that external stateliness, however inadequate an attestation of the nation's grief: we admire the wisdom that would deepen or perpetuate the impression of our recent loss, or commend to souls, exalted by the love of glory, the example of those princely, patriotic qualities, which have been thus magnificently, but imperfectly, commemorated by funereal honours.

While we unite our humble voice with that of our countrymen, uplifted in benediction and in prayer, we know we should but intimate a due association of solicitude, in the expression of our hopes of consolation to that afflicted Family, on whose Royal bosoms, it has seemed meet to Providence to shed this solemn visitation of its will. The extent of our losses, which enhance the value of all remaining earthly gifts, must render us proportionately concerned for the surviving members of that Illustrious House, by which our freedom and religion were indissolubly confirmed, and by which they have been protected, and continue to be upheld. That Providence may vouchsafe its blessing to them, is our cordial orison; and, over the departed Prince, we know no epitaph more justly due than that affectionate and pure ploration of the elegiac muse—

> Oh! gone for ever, take this last adieu!
> Ne'er to those chambers where the mighty rest,
> Since their foundation came a nobler guest;
> Nor e'er were to the bowers of bliss conveyed
> A meeker spirit or more gentle shade!

FUNERAL OBSEQUIES OF HIS R. H. THE DUKE OF YORK.

The following is an accurate account of all those obsequies which have been observed towards the remains of his Royal Highness the Duke of York previous to their being deposited in the Royal Mausoleum, at Windsor: and it cannot but afford the highest satisfaction to the Illustrious Family of this lamented Prince, that the sincere sympathies of the whole nation have been awakened, and that all ranks have vied with each other in giving testimony to his public and private virtues, and in manifesting their heart felt sorrow for his loss, by every testimony of respect which they could pay to his memory.

THE REMOVAL OF THE BODY TO ST. JAMES'S PALACE.

On Wednesday night between 10 and 11 o'clock, the State-Coffin for the remains of the Royal Duke, which was made by Mr. Warren, the King's Joiner, and covered and decorated by Mr. Bailey, the King's Undertaker, was removed in a very private manner from Mr. Bailey's Ware-room, in Mount-street Grosvenor-square, to Rutland House, in Arlington-street, where the Gentlemen of the Faculty who attended the Royal Duke were assembled, together with the Duke's Executors, and Mr. Mash, as the representative of the Lord Chamberlain. The Royal Remains, in the leaden coffin were enclosed in the state coffin and at ten minutes after 12, Mr. Bailey and his assistants placed it in a hearse, which proceeded to the King's Palace, St. James's, followed by a mourning coach, in which were Sir Herbert Taylor, Colonel Stevenson, and the King's Serjeant Surgeon. The King's Guard, under the command of Colonel Macdonald, were drawn out to receive the Royal Corpse, which was afterwards conveyed into the State-room, assigned for the Lying in State, and placed on a platform previously prepared for it, under a State Canopy. Proper persons were then appointed to set up with the body, and the suite of rooms were closed for the night.

THE LYING IN STATE.

The external arrangements for the public entrance to St James's Palace, on Thursday morning, to see the remains of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York laid in state, were, as we feared would be the case, very inadequate for either the protection or the accommodation of the dense crowd whose presence ought to have been reckoned upon to witness the ceremony. At eight o'clock the company began to assemble, and the space within the barrier (as it was called) was soon filled, and contained, even at that early hour, a far greater number of persons than could hope, without much delay and consequent confusion, to obtain ingress through the narrower passage within, as soon as the gate was thrown open; but when, at ten o'clock, the crowd began to accumulate, and extended along the whole front of the Palace, and fill parts of St. James's-street and Pall-mall, it became evident that accidents must occur, from the struggles of the idle and thoughtless to press forward, and the efforts of others to extricate themselves from a situation which, though nearer the Palace, afforded them no chance of obtaining access without considerable risk. To add to the confusion, at ten o'clock a number of carriages, and, indeed, vehicles of all descriptions, were permitted to draw up at the ends of Pall-mall and St. James's-street, and to mingle among the ranks of people then forming across the pathways.

Immediately off the pavement, with their horses heads towards the Palace, a strong detachment of the 17th Lancers were formed; they were in attendance, dismounted, soon after eight o'clock in the morning, but at ten o'clock they were regularly drawn up in two lines, fully mounted and accoutred. At eight o'clock likewise the Captain's Guard of Honour, formed by Grenadier Guards, proceeded to the interior of the Palace, and in different avenues leading to the State Apartments. By the same hour, the civil authorities were in attendance in considerable numbers. There were large parties of the Bow-street or dismounted patrol, together with numerous bands of constables, headed by Mr. Lee, the high constable, whose services were extremely prompt and useful during the whole of the day. The Yeomen of the Guard assembled at their apartments within the Palace, and proceeded, at nine o'clock, to the staircases, long gallery, state-rooms, &c., where they were to perform duty. At the entrances set apart for the admission of those having tickets, and for the public, there were stationed small parties of Foot Guards, together with officers and others connected with the Palace or the Lord Chamberlain's department, to examine the tickets, or to see that proper or decently attired persons only gained admission.

By nine o'clock carriages in line by the Marquis of Stafford's house, leading to the entrance set apart for those having the Lord Chamberlain's tickets, began to assemble; as well as those who walked and had a like extra accommodation. Here the most perfect regularity was preserved, numerous as were the ladies and gentlemen who attended, together with the younger branches of their families. Mr. Mash, of the Lord Chamberlain's office, appeared here; and when the entrances were cleared to permit admission, which took place before ten o'clock, the utmost bustle ensued to pass on with all possible rapidity, consistent with regularity. There were four chief barriers, at all of which the pressure of the company was checked, and requisite examinations of the tickets were made; and Mr. Mash and his attendants were most active in preventing any unnecessary delays. The admissions at this entrance continued for full an hour, the tickets having expressed that they were only available from ten till eleven o'clock.

Soon after eleven o'clock the dense crowd in front of the public entrance to the Palace became really alarming. Those who had early entered within the barrier were hemmed in, and pressed in an intolerable degree; while those without were still pressed forward recklessly, so as to present a scene of confusion and collision which is rarely witnessed on public occasions. The movements of a crowd are, in general, very blind and monotonous, but the appearance of this assemblage had this singular peculiarity—you were not hustled by a dirty and promiscuous throng, for in the dense mass which filled the area, not a single person was to be seen who had not complied with the Earl Marshall's order, of being dressed in "decent mourning." Unfortunately, too, it seemed to be a congregation of whole families, and every second person was accompanied by the females of his family. It was painful, therefore, to see elegantly dressed ladies and children exposed to such a tumultuous confusion. It is, perhaps, imprudent for the weaker sex to encounter such risks; but when they hear of a Court pageant for many days in preparation, and of ample arrangements being made for the general accommodation of that public who are invited to attend, it is not inexcusable for them to be persuaded that the gratification of their becoming curiosity is practicable, without having their clothes torn off their backs or their limbs dislocated.

The struggle upon the public entrance being thrown open, was very great. There was unfortunately, but naturally enough, perhaps, a terrific rush towards the archway, instead of a judicious leaning back, so as not to impede the easy passing of those who were at the porch-bars. It continued in spite of the very great efforts of the Lancers, patrols, and constables; and during this struggle, one of the breast-high barriers, which passed off across Cleveland-row, and was intended to break the pressure of the crowd, fell. Thirty or 40 persons fell with it, when the consternation became of the most alarming kind; but luckily the alarm of those who were behind the barriers, induced them to recede from the apprehended danger, and thus afforded space and opportunity for the most active exertions of the Lancers, &c. They kept the crowd back, and happily rescued many individuals from the most imminent peril; although at a later part of the day the employment of cavalry in a crowd was felt to be injurious, for the horses could not move without pressing inconveniently, and dangerously in one or two instances, upon those who were compelled to stand near them. Many respectable females were deprived of their shawls, bonnets, &c. as well as personal injuries inflicted, independent of the unavoidable facilities afforded to the operations of the light-fingered gentry, who would not lose so good an opportunity of performing their evolutions.

The maimed and exhausted state of persons who were rescued from this crowd, and the tattered appearance of their dress, did not seem to repress the ardour of others from pressing in to occupy the perilous places which they had abandoned, and hour after hour, as the day advanced, brought a fresh supply to the already overstocked throng, and all the avenues of the metropolis, north, south, east, and west, poured forth their tributary streams to fill the current which was setting to St. James's, until the hour had arrived (four o'clock) for prohibiting further admission.

The stair-case was lined with mutes, marshalmen, soldiers, and Yeomen of the Guard, with their partisans, hats, and swords covered with crape. The latter entirely lined the ante-chamber of the state-room. The appearance of the state-room was not so imposing as we were led to expect, when the whole arrangements were completed. The military part, of which so much was said by anticipation, consisted in having a few officers of the Guard lounging or lolling on the railway which enclosed the centre of the room under the large chandelier, and two standing with what looked like standards, bound with crape. The coffin appeared on the platform, covered with an immensely large pall, and was placed apparently quite on a level, instead of being raised at the head. Its foot was towards the centre of the room, and was the only part of the coffin that was visible to the company. Upon the pall was laid his late Royal Highness's Field Marshal's baton, sword, coronet, and orders: and behind the coffin sat, in full Court mourning, Sir Herbert Taylor in the center, General Sir George Cooke upon his right, and Colonel Stephenson on his left. Three gentlemen from the Lord Great Chamberlain's office stood at each side of the coffin; and next them stood the same number of gentlemen pensioners, bearing heraldic banners connected with the state and dignity of the illustrious deceased; among them were the white rose of York, the Hanoverian horse, &c. Ranged on each side of the coffin, on the steps of the platform, were some of the oldest Grenadiers, with their firelocks reversed, and the heads of the men leaning over the butt-ends of their guns. The company passed in front of this platform, and retired through the Armoury, which was lined with Yeomen of the Guard and Marshalmen, into the Court-yard opposite Marlborough-house.

A very serious accident took place during the day in Pall-Mall. A gentleman, attended by his servant, was driving a cabriolet towards St. James's Palace, when its off wheel came in contact with a gentleman's carriage, with such violence that the cabriolet was overturned, and the gentleman and his groom thrown out with considerable force on the ground. Several persons ran to their assistance, and it was found that the groom's right shoulder had been dislocated, and two fingers on his left hand broken. The gentleman's face was severely lacerated, and the cap of his left knee dislocated. They were both placed immediately in a hackney-coach, and driven home to the gentleman's house in the Regent's-park.

FRIDAY, JAN. 19.

Notwithstanding the danger and inconvenience to which the vast concourse of persons were exposed, who attended at St. James's Palace on Thursday, for the purpose of viewing the solemn and imposing ceremony which was held within its walls, as early as eight o'clock yesterday morning crowds began to assemble in front of the Palace; and at nine o'clock the number of persons who waited for admission could not have been less than 800, while every moment brought fresh arrivals. It was intended that the boys belonging to the Royal Military Asylum at Chelsea, of which his late Royal Highness was the founder, should be admitted at eight o'clock in the morning, but the concourse of persons assembled at that early hour at the door of the entrance in Cleveland-row, precluded the possibility of adopting that design in the manner proposed, and the boys were permitted to pass through the door of egress in Palace-yard, and thence up the grand staircase to the chamber where the mortal remains of their illustrious Patron were laid in military state. In consequence of the insufficiency of some of the barriers in front of the Palace, it was found necessary to replace them in the night, and others were erected possessing greater strength, and against which the pressure of the multitude during the day had no effect. Another improvement was also adopted, the want of which was sensibly felt on the preceding day. On a white board, affixed to the barriers, the public were directed to the door of entrance, by which means, a great deal of doubt and inconvenience was obviated, and the point to which all were struggling was at once known. From ten to eleven, as on the preceding morning, the privileged few who were fortunate enough to procure the Lord Chamberlain's tickets, were admitted to the Palace through the entrance set apart for that purpose, and a few minutes after eleven o'clock that portion of the anxious multitude outside, who had forced their way to the door of entrance in Cleveland-row, were admitted, and an equal number of persons from the outer barrier were allowed to take their place, and wait for their return to gain admission. This arrangement, which was observed through the day, was effected by means of strong detachments of constables, headed and marshalled by Bow-street officers, and several companies of the 17th Lancers, to whose patience and good temper, with one or two exceptions, the crowds collected on this occasion were much indebted.

At twelve o'clock, in consequence of the crowds that thronged from every side, having added their numbers to those already collected, the front of the Palace presented a scene of bustle and commotion such as we have already witnessed. Thousands of well-dressed men, a large majority of whom were in mourning, and a great number of respectably dressed females, also in decent mourning, were huddled together, straining every nerve, and puffing like spent porpoises, as though the object to be gained affected their dearest hopes. Every one knew that nothing but exertion the most powerful would overcome the almost insurmountable difficulty of shouldering successfully an immense concourse of persons, and reaching a given point, and so, with one heart and with one object, the moving multitude seemed for a while impelled. But human nature could not stand it long. Arms of iron, and ribs of steel would be almost inadequate to bear the pressure that ensued. It was then that the women felt their shoes slipping from their feet, and their bonnets borne from their heads, while, in accents of distress, they begged to be permitted to return. But the thing was morally impossible, and so they were told to bear up a while—that fainting was of no use, for that nothing could be done to relieve them, and that they would soon reach the wished-for door, where they might enjoy sufficient room, and meet with the cool breeze. But all this was poor comfort, and we were really distressed to see several respectable females obliged to be forced from the crowd at the expence of their apparel, in order to avoid being suffocated. It is really surprising, after the accidents and distressing scenes of the day before, to think that women should be found to rush into the crowds of yesterday with the certainty of losing some of their garments and of being dreadfully pushed, and with the possibility—not a very remote one either—of being crushed to death without any hope of rescue. We saw at least a dozen females borne senseless from the crowd; most of them without shoes or bonnets, and some of them with their gowns actually torn from their backs: and yet, with these examples actually before their eyes, we saw several women anxious to push their way into the crowd, and only restrained from doing so by the men in their company. At several periods of the day during the pressure of the crowd, we heard the screams of females, and although we have not heard of any very serious accidents having occurred in consequence of the headlong spirit of curiosity that induced women to enter such scenes, we have no doubt that those who have suffered from their folly, are taught a lesson which they will not easily forget.

Having passed through the long wished-for door that led into the Palace, the crowd for the first time had space to breathe in. The interior of the Palace, its dismal passages hung with black, its dim lights, and the mute attendants that at intervals presented themselves with their solemn insignia, have all been described already, and we therefore have only to observe on the strong contrast which the chamber of death afforded to the stirring and animated scene from which we had just issued.

Having regained the street, on looking to the clock, we found that we had just been three hours struggling for admission.—Crowds from all parts were fast accumulating, and the Lancers with difficulty kept back the throng, in executing which duty one of their horses pushed down a poor woman in St. James's-street, and we heard she was much hurt. She bled from the mouth, and was taken to a house close by. The mob believing the Lancer to be in fault, hooted him, and one boy in particular used some offensive expressions, on which a constable struck him a violent blow on the head with a brass staff, and his face in an instant was covered with blood. The act on the part of the constable appeared to be most wanton, and on a complaint having been made to the officer commanding the Lancers, he ordered the soldier who had rode against the woman to fall out of the ranks. The pickpockets were most industrious on this occasion, and we saw a fellow in the crowd a few yards off, cut a gentleman's pocket with a pair of scissors, and very leisurely put its contents into his hat. The gentleman, however, having been apprised of the robbery, seized the fellow, and gave him a terrible thrashing with a good stick with which he was provided.

The crowds continued until a quarter after four to gain admission, when the gate was closed; but we understood that persons were admitted at intervals until six o'clock. A fall of snow which came on a few minutes after four o'clock, contributed in a great measure to disperse the crowd; and by six o'clock the space before the Palace was comparatively empty. The shop of Mr. Sams, the bookseller, at the corner of St. James's-street, and the adjoining shops, were all closed: many of them had platforms raised in front in order to afford accommodation to witness the funeral procession this morning.

Several carriages belonging to the nobility and gentry were drawn up for the greater part of the day in front of the Palace, to afford the ladies who were inside a view of the busy scene.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES.

On Friday night, after the public had retired, Mr. Bailey and his assistants immediately proceeded to make the necessary arrangements for the funeral on the next morning, the persons who were to take part in the procession having previously received their respective fitments and instructions so as to prevent confusion.

THE APPEARANCE OF THE METROPOLIS.

For several days previous to the movement of the procession, the intended course of which had been announced, applications were made to many respectable housekeepers in St. James's-street and Piccadilly, from families of the highest distinction, for whole floors and windows, from whence to view the passing scene. For this accommodation, large sums were offered, and, in some instances, paid; but with many, these advantages were reserved for their private friends. There were a vast number, however, who determined to take advantage of public curiosity, and seats were let, as at the time of the Coronation, at various prices, from five shillings to five guineas; and this may be said to have been the case throughout the whole road to Windsor.

As early as five o'clock yesterday morning, although the streets were still involved in darkness, all the avenues leading towards the line of procession were crowded with persons of all rank proceeding to take stations in such places as chance might offer, or as had been previously secured. Hundreds, we might say thousands, of these pursued their route through Hyde Park Corner, and spread themselves along the paths for miles. Every elevated spot was tenanted, and waggons, carts, carriages, and temporary platforms, ranged on each side the roads and streets offered additional advantages. On no former occasion, in fact, did we witness a more intense excitement in the public mind.

As the morning advanced, the crowd became more dense, and the bustle increased, while the individuals departing in their carriages and other vehicles, for Windsor, gave additional animation to the busy groupes.

It had been previously understood that all the shops should be closed, and, in fact, the whole appearance of the town was that of the celebration of some solemn fast. All business was suspended and the public offices, except in cases of unavoidable necessity, were closed. A Proclamation was issued by the Lord Mayor, on Friday, recommending this course as a tribute of respect and affection to the memory of the illustrious deceased. It was announced, too, that service would be performed in all Churches and Chapels, and these edifices, throughout the country, were placed in mourning, while funeral sermons, suited to the occasion, were preached from every pulpit. The whole nation united, in fact, in testifying its respect by every possible means for the memory of the deceased.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE PROCESSION.

At an early hour, Mr. Bailey and the Lord Chamberlain's assistants, were in attendance at St. James's Palace, and the individuals who were to take part in the procession, were seen hurrying to the appointed place of rendezvous.

At seven o'clock, the escort which was to accompany the Body, and which consisted of a Field Officer's Guard, arrived at the great gates of the Palace. It consisted of one hundred and twenty men, furnished from the 2d Regiment of Life Guards.—The officers wearing crape scarfs, and the standard covered with crape. A large body of Police was likewise in attendance, under the direction of the Magistracy and Mr. Lee, the High Constable, in order to preserve regularity among the multitude which was assembled.

The carriages, horsemen, and other formal members of the procession, assembled in St. James's Park, where they were arranged in the order in which they were to move.

Shortly before eight o'clock, all being in readiness, the signal for forming was given, and the hearse in which the body was to be placed, having been drawn up to the private entrance to the State Rooms, the coffin was brought down and placed within it.

THE PROCESSION

moved up St. James's-street in the following order, according to the official directions, issued from the Herald's Office:—

Trumpets and kettle drums of the two Regiments of Life Guards on horseback, the drums muffled.

The drums and fifes of the Foot Guards, on foot, drums muffled.

Eight Knight Marshal's men on foot, with black staves.

A Mourning Coach, drawn by four Horses, conveying the Servants of his late Royal Highness, Messrs. Wilde, Hughes, Longden and Cooley.

A Mourning Coach, drawn by four horses, conveying the Pages of his late Royal Highness, Messrs. Ude, Batchellor, Youard, and Marriane.

A Mourning Coach drawn by six horses, conveying the Medical Attendants and Private Chaplain of his late Royal Highness, (Sir Henry Halford. Sir Astley Cooper, Sir James M'Gregor, and the Rev. W. Deakins.)

A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, conveying the Secretaries of his late Royal Highness, (Lieut.-Col. George Disbrowe, and Major Thomas Maling.)

A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, conveying the Aids-de-Camp of his late Royal Highness, (Sir Henry Cook, Col. Armstrong, the Hon. G. Anson, and Col. Russell.)

A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, convening the Equerries of his late Royal Highness, and the Assistants to the Adjutant-General and Quarter-Master General (the Hon. Colonel Upton, Mr. Culling Smith, General D'Aquila, & Colonel Freeth.)

A Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, conveying Garter Principal King at Arms, and two Gentlemen Assistants (Major-General Sir Henry Torrens, Sir Willoughby Gordon, Major M'Donald, and Sir R. Jackson.)

The State Carriage of his late Royal Highness, drawn by six horses, conveying Clarencieux King of Arms (Ralph Bigland, Esq.) with the Coronet of his late Royal Highness, attended by two Gentlemen Ushers to the King, as supporters

THE BODY,

In a magnificent Hearse, ornamented with a profusion of black feathers, and adorned with Escutcheons of his late Royal Highness's Arms, and drawn by eight of his Majesty's black Horses, driven by His Majesty's Body Coachman.

A Mourning Coach drawn by six horses, conveying Garter Principal King at Arms (Sir Geo. Nayler), and two Gentlemen Assistants.

Mourning Coach, drawn by six horses, conveying the two Executors named in the Will of His late Royal Highness (Sir Herbert Taylor and Colonel Stevenson).

Carriage of his Majesty drawn by six horses—the Coachman and Footman in deep mourning, with scarfs and hatbands.

Carriage of his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence, drawn by six horses, the Coachman and Footman in deep mourning, with scarfs and hatbands.

Carriage of the Princess Augusta, drawn by six horses.

Carriage of the Duchess of Kent, drawn by six horses.

Carriage of the Princess Sophia, drawn by six horses.

Carriage of the Duke of Sussex, drawn by six horses.

Carriage of Prince Leopold, drawn by six horses.

Carriage of the Duke of Gloucester, drawn by six horses.

The whole of the procession was flanked by the Life Guards, and twenty-four horsemen, in deep black, were placed at intervals between the carriages.

St. James's-street, at this time, presented a dense mass of spectators, all clad in black, while every window was thronged with spectators, among whom the fair sex, many of them of the first distinction, predominated. To convey an adequate idea of the coup d'œil at this interesting moment, would require no ordinary powers, and would bid defiance to the pencil of the most celebrated artists. As the procession moved, all the church bells of the Metropolis tolled, and the crowd preserved a respectful and solemn silence, although some little confusion was created by persons rushing forward to get in advance of the band of the Horse Guards.

On turning into Piccadilly, the crowd increased in numbers, and every house seemed to overflow from its foundation to its summit. In this way the procession advanced at a pace of about two miles and a half an hour.

At this slow and solemn pace did the cavalcade proceed till it reached Cranford-bridge—about fourteen miles from town, where it had been arranged that a stoppage for refreshments should take place, and where relays of horses and of the Life Guards were in waiting.

The whole country round seemed to have poured its inhabitants into the main road, and the villages of Knightsbridge, Kensington, Hammersmith, Turnham Green, Kew Bridge, Brentford, and Hounslow, were as densely crowded as the streets of London, while the roads were lined with vehicles of all descriptions completely crammed with spectators. It was two o'clock before the halt took place at Cranford Bridge, and the Inns of this place were so thronged, as scarce to admit of the slightest accommodation for those who had not previously bespoken rooms.

PREPARATIONS AT WINDSOR.

Our next task will be to describe the preparations at Windsor for those parts of the obsequies which were observed there, and which were by far the most interesting, both in points of extent, and mournful magnificence.

So early as Friday the town began to exhibit the external symptoms of the preparatory bustle for the Royal Funeral.—The Mayor, on that day, issued a notice to convene a Public Meeting of the Inhabitants in the Guildhall on Monday next, for an Address of Condolence to his Majesty upon this melancholy occasion; and notice was also issued, that at eleven o'clock on Saturday, Divine Service at the Parish Church would be performed, to suit the passing solemnity. The road from town to Windsor presented a military spectacle during the whole of Friday and yesterday. On the former day, a large body of the Foot Guards, upwards of eight hundred in number, marched to occupy the stations assigned them in Windsor and the neighbourhood, as well as some detachments of the Lancers, who halted on the parts of the road, where they maintained the order of the funereal procession. The officers were billetted in Windsor on their arrival; and the utmost difficulty was found to get beds at any price. Many persons of great respectability were glad, instead of being compelled to bivouack in the streets, to occupy small apartments, paying a sovereign each, and sit through the night as they could.

For the purpose of opposing as few obstacles as possible to the business of yesterday, in the town of Windsor, the regular weekly market in the streets was held on Friday; and yesterday business of all kinds was suspended, the shops were closely shut, and every demonstration of respect was paid which was suitable to the occasion. The whole of the military detachments for the town and immediate vicinity of Windsor, arrived on Friday evening, and were stationed at Datchet and near the Castle.

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

Mr. Bailey, his Majesty's upholsterer, and the persons of his establishment, were occupied throughout the week in making the necessary arrangements in this magnificent Gothic edifice.—The Board of Works erected the platform along which the funeral procession had to pass, and threw forth a covered porch into the court-yard, in front of the great gate at which the coffin was received from the hearse. The whole of the platform and the covered way was covered and lined with black cloth, and lamps were hung to illuminate the latter.

The interior of the Chapel was partially covered with black cloth, which was laid on with great taste, and so disposed as to produce a magnificently solemn effect. At all times this Chapel has been esteemed for its neatness, as well as the rich gothic splendour which characterises its structure. The stone roof is superb—it is an elipsis, supported by pillars of very ancient architecture, whose ribs and groins sustain the whole ceiling with admirable beauty and elegance. Every part of this lofty ceiling has a different device, executed to great perfection, as the Arms of Edward the Confessor, Edward the Third, Edward the Black Prince, Henry the Sixth, Edward the Fourth, Henries the Seventh and Eighth; the Arms of France and England quarterly, the Holy Cross, the Shield or Cross, the Shield or Cross of St George, the Rose, Portcullis, Lion Rampant, Unicorn, Fleur-de lis, Dragon, Prince, Feathers, &c.

The good taste of those who had the superintendence of the fitting up of the Chapel for this mournful ceremony, prevented their defacing its beauty by any tawdry and unnecessary artifices for decoration. A flooring was erected immediately within the porch and along the south aisle, forming a sort of inclined plane, which was covered with black cloth, and this led to the end of the nave, which was also railed off and similarly covered, two long steps being erected outside the ceiling for the soldiers who bore the torchlights. Within the Choir, the sable decorations were arranged with similar taste—the stalls were merely covered—a flooring was thrown up on the marble pavement, which was covered with black cloth: the seats were similarly decorated, but the whole of the knight's stalls, their escutcheons and armorial bearings were exposed, and their richness and martial appearance not only relieved the gloom of the building, but finely harmonised with the solemnity for the obsequies of a military chieftain. In the north aisle seats were erected, gradually ascending above each other, which were intended for the accommodation of the Eton Boys, and those persons who were furnished with tickets from the Lord Chamberlain's office. Other seats were constructed on the east side of the altar, in the choir, for which the issue of tickets was but limited, and those principally confined to persons of distinction.

The whole of the preparations were not completed till the middle of yesterday.

During the whole of the day the din of fresh arrivals kept the town in a constant bustle, and the scene of confusion in the market-place almost beggars description. The Royal Dukes took up their residence at Frogmore, and remained there until the proper time arrived for proceeding to the Chapel; but such was the crowded state of the place, that many of the members of the procession were subjected to the greatest inconvenience.

According to the arrangements for the ceremony, a detachment of the Horse Guards (Blue), dismounted, and of the Grenadier Guards, proceeded to St. George's Chapel at six o'clock, every fourth man bearing a flambeau. They were formed in line along each side of the platform on which the procession was subsequently to move.

A Battalion of the Grenadier Guards lined the approach from the Castle Gate to the entrance of the Chapel, and a select detachment, consisting of the oldest soldiers of his late Royal Highness's regiment lined the porch or immediate approach to the entrance, as well as the space where the body afterwards went into the line of the procession.

A double line of Guards and Infantry of the Line was formed from the porch down to the street, as far as the market-place, and from thence a free space was kept by the Cavalry, every sixth man bearing a flambeau, to Frogmore. From Frogmore to Datchet Bridge, the communication was kept up by picquets, who were subsequently assisted by the rear-guard of the procession.

Persons having tickets to the north aisle and altar were admitted soon after six o'clock, and took their seats in the most orderly manner. Scarce a whisper was heard, and all seemed absorbed in the contemplation of the painful cause of their assemblage.

In the course of the day the entrance to the mausoleum, which is described more at length hereafter, was removed, and the platform so arranged, as to receive the body of his Royal Highness, and lower it at the proper signal. The moveable bier on which the body was to be placed during the progress of the procession was also brought forward and decorated with an appropriate funeral canopy.

DEPARTURE OF THE PROCESSION FROM CRANFORD-BRIDGE.

Soon after four o'clock, the signal was given for resuming the march of the procession, when the Field Officer's guard, which was stationed there as the relief, took the posts of the men who had marched from London, and the latter fell into the rear, and formed the rear-guard. In this way they proceeded through Datchet and over Datchet-bridge, every fourth soldier, after the fall of night, bearing in his hand a lighted torch.

ARRIVAL OF THE PROCESSION AT FROGMORE.

Shortly before eight o'clock, the distant glare of torches and the melancholy note of the approaching cavalcade gave notice that the procession was near at hand, and the servants and grooms of his Majesty and of the Royal Family, in deep mourning, each bearing a flambeau, accompanied by the band of the Royal Household with their fifes and drums, stood prepared to receive it at Frogmore. The pitchy darkness of the night was now completely dissipated by the brilliancy of the torches, and the appearance of the whole at this junction exhibited a gloomy grandeur, perfectly in unison with the character of the scene.

The procession being thus increased, now advanced up Park-street, amidst the multitude by which it was surrounded, and turning into Castle-street, approached the gate which led into the Castle-yard, and thus to the entrance of the Chapel. Every window and every spot from whence a view of the procession could be obtained, was crowded to excess; and the Castle-yard itself, in the rear of the soldiers, on both sides, was equally thronged: but, notwithstanding the countless groupes thus collected, the most respectful demeanour was observable.

CEREMONIES IN ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

At eight o'clock, according to previous concert, the procession reached its destination, and the servants, grooms, trumpets, and drums, filed without the door. The individuals in the mourning and other carriages then alighted and entered the Chapel. The hearse finally approached, and the body was immediately carried into the south aisle by ten Yeomen of the Guard, where it was placed on the bier we have already described, which was drawn up close to the door for its reception. It was then received by the Dean and Prebendaries, attended by the Choir.

The soldiers who flanked the platform, and who carried torches, had previously lighted them, and thus an admirable view was obtained of the procession, which was then formed under the direction of the Lord Chamberlain's Assistants, and moved down the south aisle and up the nave, into the Choir, in the following order:—

Yeomen of the Guard, with their partizans reversed.

Upon the arrival of the Procession within the Choir, the car was wheeled upon the platform, and the Coronet, Baton, and Cushions, were placed upon the Coffin.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence then took his seat upon a chair placed at the head of the Coffin; his supporters standing on each side.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex occupied a seat close to that of his Royal Brother.

The Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household took his station at the feet of the Corpse; and the Supporters of the Pall, and of the Canopy, arranged themselves on each side.

During the progress of the Procession, the organ struck up its solemn peals; but all being arranged, its tones gradually sunk into silence, and the Rev. the Dean of Windsor proceeded to read the Burial Service, in the most impressive manner. During its performance, the pall was taken from the body; the Coronet and Baton were removed—and the Coffin gradually descended into the space leading to the tomb, till it was hid from every eye, save those immediately contiguous to the Canopy. The Dean then read that beautiful passage containing the words, "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust." At that moment some consecrated earth was cast upon the body, and the Choir again sent forth its enchanting strains.

The service concluded with the collect and blessing.

Garter King at Arms now advanced and proclaimed the style and titles of the deceased in the following terms:—"Thus it hath pleased Almighty God to take out of this transitory life unto his Divine mercy, the late Most High, Most Mighty, and Most Illustrious Prince Frederick, Prince of Brunswick, Lunenburgh, Duke of York and Albany, Earl of Ulster, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter and of the Most Honourable Military Order of the Bath—Brother of the Most Illustrious and Most Potent Monarch George the IVth, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, King of Hanover, &c."

During the whole of this awful ceremony their Royal Highnesses the Dukes of Clarence and Sussex were deeply affected, and repeatedly applied their handkerchiefs to their eyes. A similar feeling seemed to pervade all those who were witnesses to these last tributes of respect paid to the memory of a Prince so justly and deservedly respected and beloved.

The whole having been thus brought to a conclusion, the Royal Brothers retired, and the remainder of the procession returned nearly in the same order as in which they came. During their departure the Organist played the Dead March in Saul on the organ, in a truly affecting manner.

A vast number of persons were then admitted to view the coffin and its splendid paraphernalia, as it lay in the passage—from whence it was shortly after conveyed to the place of its final destination.

THEATRICALS.

Our limits have been so occupied in detailing the particulars of the national affliction with which we have been visited, that we are unable to pay the attention we could desire to the interests of the stage—and even what we now write is written under a certain impression of distaste—but we feel that we must write, and we accordingly write as we feel.

Mr. KEAN appeared on Monday se'nnight, in his originally introductory character of Shylock, for the first time since his return from America. There was no reason for supposing, at least with rational beings, that this actor's re-appearance would be attended with any of those disgraceful circumstances which marked his last exit, previous to his transatlantic exportation—and even if there were a few blockheads who assembled in the theatre, on this occasion, under that fallacious expectation, their notions and their efforts were equally circumscribed. The disturbance created, in the first instance, by the public occurrence in which Mr. KEAN's character at that period was involved, arose out of party feeling, which was then attempting to establish the respectability of an actress, who had forfeited all claims to the distinction: and it was imagined there was no better way to do it, than by pitting it against the delinquencies of another performer, at the rival theatre. It is an odd thing that, eventually, the reverse of all this should come to pass—but so it is—Miss FOOTE has sunk as low as any person can well sink, in public opinion, and the COCK OF BUTE has regained the popularity, and is likely to regain the fortune, which he had lost—and it is but a proper retribution—for the LADY was a mass of humbug and impudence throughout, and the GENTLEMAN was "more sinned against than sinning."

There is not to be detected the slightest alteration in the performances of Mr. KEAN—they possess the same glaring errors, the same exposure to ridicule, and the same trickery which always marked them—it is in vain to deny that they still retain, as they also formerly possessed, some of the strongest indications of genius, ever exhibited to public observation, and some portraitures of human passions certainly approaching sublimity. Mr. KEAN's return was "a consummation devoutly to be wished," from the barren state of Mr. PRICE's tragic department, and by virtue thereof Messrs. COOPER and WALLACK being restored to their proper level, we may expect to see our higher order of plays done every possible justice to. The tide of popularity seems to be running rather strongly in favour of Drury Lane Theatre altogether—they have not only the best pantomime at this house, but they precede it by the best plays, acted by the best performers—a selection, the result of which will put it out of the power of the American Ex-Manager, to regret the sacrifices he has made in his own, or the arrangements he has made in this country. We have all along professed ourselves alive to his interests, and cannot better prove that we are so, than by congratulating him on his present good fortune.

We have seen Mr. MORTON's new comedy, and like it much—we like FARREN's acting in it much—and we will take an early opportunity of saying much more about it. We will talk to Miss HARGRAVE, if she continue to play, and to Miss JERMAN, when she does play—the latter of whom has lately been astonishing the natives at Bath, and astonishing herself by a benefit of 122*l.*, in that said city.

But the public calamity absorbs every other consideration at present—so "here break we off."

"The Eulogies" delivered in honour of Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson are nineteen in number, making a volume of 422 pages.

An Address of Condolence to the King was voted on Friday, by a numerous and highly-respectable meeting of the parishioners of St. Olave, Southwark, the Rev. A. H. Kenny, Rector, in the chair, to be forwarded to the Secretary of State for presentation to his Majesty.

Monday was the birth day of the Duke of Gloucester, when he entered his 55th year. The usual observances were not kept up, nor were the tradesmen's houses illuminated, in consequence of the death of the Duke of York.

Although it is not customary for the livery servants of the King to wear mourning, except on the demise of the King or Queen, his Majesty, being desirous that every mark of respect should be paid to the memory of his much lamented brother, has commanded his livery servants to appear in mourning at the funeral of his late Royal Highness. This was also done on the decease of his beloved daughter the Princess Charlotte.

DUBLIN, JAN. 14.
(From a Correspondent of a Morning Paper.)
DEATH OF THE DUKE OF YORK.

The melancholy tidings was received by the Protestant community of this metropolis with unostentatious regret. He was regarded as an excellent friend, not only to every solder under his command, but also as a steady friend and chivalrous advocate of Protestant prineiples. His death was in that quarter deemed no less than a public calamity, and nothing but gloom was visible there. On the other hand, the Roman Catholics felt, and expressed their feelings, in a very different way.

Yesterday evening a scene in low life exhibited pretty clearly the prejudices which the speech of his Royal Highness on the Catholic claims has instilled into the minds of the lower classes. The scene I allude to took place in Capel-street. A certain wandering street vocalist, called Crotty, took up his station, in broad daylight, collecting a crowd round him, who filled the footway to obstruction, and dwelt with ravished ears upon the metrical periods of the Clonmell patriot. We have here no street-keepers; but Captain Bell, of our City Police, unluckily for this volunteer in fugitive music, heard him exulting—not in Irish, but in intelligible English doggrel, and using phrases by no means equivocal, or feneed in with "ifs" and "buts," or such other qualifying phraseology as much greater men have occasionally studded their lucubrations with: as thus, alluding to the Duke of York's death:—"Our enemy is dead and d—d!" "Three cheers to the bleeding friends of our country." He sold these ballads quickly to the approving auditory, who scrambled for the prizes with all the avidity imaginable. The vocalist was soon a captive, was brought before the sitting Justices who usually preside at the Head Office of Police—the fact was distinctly proved—the violation of the public peace to which it led given also in evidence—and, exercising a summary jurisdiction, the Magistrates converted the singer into a martyr, and sent him to Newgate for a month.

THE YORK CLUB.

This society of Protestants was formed in November, 1824. The title of "York" was applied in compliment to his late Royal Highness, although his celebrated speech was not spoken until April, 1825. A more influential body, perhaps, has not been known in Dublin for many years. They could have returned Mr. Goulburn for this city, but he looked at the time to Cambridge. On the last election they proposed to support Mr. G. O. Moore, the present Member, on the Thursday, and before Saturday night he was virtually the Member of Parliament. They consist of about 300 members; amongst them are several Peers, distinguished Churchmen, and many persons of wealth and respectability.

Yesterday evening, about half-past four o'clock, as Mr. O'Connell was walking towards Merrion-square, leaning on Mr. O'Dwyer, Mr. Remmy Sheehan, brother to the proprietor of the Evening Mail, met him at the door of Morrison's tavern, which leads into Nassau-street, and suddenly said to him, "You abused me," or words to that effect, and then struck Mr. O'Connell with an umbrella which he held. Mr. Sheehan instantly ran off, and darted into Morrison's tavern. Mr. O'Connell walked to Sir Garrett Neville's house, and lodged informations for the assault. A warrant was forthwith issued.—Dublin Paper.

POACHERS.—PRESTON, JAN. 13.—Yesterday morning about two o'clock, another of those deadly fights, which are now so common in every part of the country, took place in the grounds near Claughton-hall, the seat of T. F. Brockles, Esq. The keepers having received information that a party of poachers were seen upon the road from Preston to Garstang, made preparations to protect the preserves. Having mustered to the number of eleven, they kept watch until three o'clock in the morning, when, as they supposed, they observed a party of about ten or twelve persons following their unlawful practices. The keepers immediately rushed upon them, and a terrible conflict ensued, in which some desperate blows were exchanged on both sides. In the end the keepers overpowered them, taking six into custody, and capturing five guns. During the affray one of the poachers fired his fusee, and lodged its contents in the thigh of an assistant keeper, named Francis Whitehead. By this discharge the flesh was desperately mangled, and the bone splintered in various places. When the men were all secured, and express was sent off to Preston for surgical aid: and to relieve the wounded man, Dr. Robinson, accompanied by Mr. Walker, of the Dispensary, arrived about six o'clock, and found it necessary to amputate the limb instantly. The poachers were brought to Preston yesterday, and having undergone an examination before the Rev. R. Moore and Mr. Marshall, were remanded for another examination this day. They are all Preston men; Their names are Peter Spencer, Thomas Varley, James Bleazard, William Mawdsley, John Barrow, and William Morland. The remainder of the party escaped, Two of them are badly wounded, and others received more or less injury before they surrendered.—Preston Pilot.

Sir Walter Scott is to receive 11,000l. sterling for 8,000 copies of his Life of Napoleon, the Baronet himself paying for the paper and print. The copyright to revert to the author after the sale of the first edition of 8,000 copies.—Evening Paper.

His Majesty's vessel Nimrod, 18 guns, and the American packet, bound for Liverpool, Panthea, with dispatches from the Mexican Ambassador to Mr. Canning, were totally wrecked at Holyhead, in the gale on Saturday evening. Everything was lost except the lives of the Captains and crews, and these were preserved by the exertion of the harbour-master, under Providence, and the Captains of his Majesty's Holyhead packets.—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

The late Mr. Gifford appears to have been in the receipt of a large income. During the time that he was editor of The Quarterly Review, Mr. Murray paid him 900l. a year. He received annually, as one of the comptrollers of the Lottery-office, 600l. He had a salary of 300l. as paymaster of the band of gentleman pensioners, 200l. a year as clerk of the estreats in the Court of Exchequer; and, in addition to all these sums, he enjoyed a pension of, we believe, 400l. per annum from Lord Grosvenor.—Evening Paper.

A report is current, that circulars are issued to the Lords Lieutenants of counties, requesting them to hold themselves in readiness to call out the militia on the shortest notice. This rumour is probably founded on the knowledge that if it were found necessary to despatch more troops, even to a very small amount, from this country to Portugal, or elsewhere, the assistance of the militia must be temporarily called for, for home duty.

BEDFORD.—Within these few days the Russell and Whitbread families have distributed one peck of bread and two bushels of coals to upwards of a thousand poor families, and a present of game to each of the principal inhabitants of the town.

The beautiful grey cob, upon which his late Royal Highness the Duke of York is represented in the popular print lately published, and of which his Royal Highness was remarkably fond, is, by the order of his Majesty, to be turned out to graze for the rest of his life.

IMMACULATE LAWYERS—Dishonesty is of such rare occurrence among the Notaries of Paris (who also act as conveyancers and consigners of money during the arrangement of affairs that pass through their hands,) that one of them having on a recent occasion gone off with 3,000l. the body were so shocked that they immediately made up the sum to the person injured!

Sir Herbert Taylor and Colonel Stephenson are the executors of the will of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York, the final codicil to which was added the day before his Royal Highness's death. These honourable persons have already entered upon their functions, by endeavouring to ascertain the exact situation of the pecuniary affairs of the Royal Duke up to his demise.

MR. LONG WELLESLEY.

The following are the letters alluded to in the trial :—

August 9.

Madam:—Since your elopement on the 31st of July last, I have been under the painful necessity of endeavouring to ascertain facts relative to your conduct previous to that date; and I have, in consequence, to inform you, that I have been enabled to procure such a strong body of evidence, publicly and authentically attested, as to leave no longer any possibility of doubt of your criminality, of which you did not hesitate to make my house the theatre. I have only now to make known to you, that I have taken the proper course under the existing circumstances.—I have the honour to be, &c. ——— BLIGH.

[Mr. Hart stated, that that proper course alluded to in Captain Bligh's letter, was to give notice to all the tradesmen to give her no credit on his account.] On the same day Mrs. Bligh returned this answer to her husband :—

9th August.

Sir,—Considering the lapse of time which has taken place since you drove me from my home, and the manner in which you have abandoned me to want and misery, and the way in which you cast off from me all hope, I think your letter is at least ill-timed. Whatever may be the evidence against me, however public, and however well authenticated, yet I am not unwilling to meet it. I desire that the evidence you possess against my character may be transmitted to me without delay, and, upon my honour, it shall receive a satisfactory answer. [After alluding to the declaration of her husband to the British Ambassador, and to Mr. Maxwell, that he had nothing to allege against his wife's character, the letter concluded thus.] Courting inquiry in every shape, I am quite ready to give answers to every question which may be put to me. I have this minute received your letter through Mrs. Maxwell, and I answer, as you perceive, without hesitation. I remain, &c. HELENA BLIGH.

Naples, October 2, 1823.

Sir,—The time is at length arrived when I consider myself at liberty to call upon you for that satisfaction, which, under all circumstances, I am entitled to claim at your hands, and which I do not see how you can possibly refuse me. It is not, Sir, the deep stain alone that you have dared to put on me and my family that must be wiped out, but likewise the repeated insults I have, for these last two months, been subjected to in consequence of the very extraordinary line of conduct adopted by you and Mrs. Wellesley, towards Mrs. Bligh, subsequent to her elopement from my house. Under any circumstances, Sir, I have yet to learn what plea you or Mrs. Wellesley can possibly have for interfering in my family affairs.

I do not think myself called upon to account to you for the length of time that I have, from imperious circumstances, been obliged to take, before making this communication to you, although in your very insolent note to me, of the 20th of August, you make that a plea for "assuming to yourself the power of holding no communication with me;" I must, however, remind you, that (in every way) I am as well entitled as yourself to assume to myself powers. I therefore shall expect a speedy and satisfactory answer. Your obedient servant,

(Signed) THOMAS BLIGH.

The Hon. W. L. Wellesley.

P.S. I beg leave to propose Terracina or Beneventum as a place of rendezvous, as I believe we are both bound in honour not to break the peace in the Neapolitan dominions.

(Signed) B.

October 3, 1823.

Sir,—I distinctly decline giving you the satisfaction you demand, but not without offering you alternatives, which, hereafter, will enable me to acquiesce in your wishes.

My reasons for not now acquiescing in your wishes, are, because your letter, of the date, I believe, of the 2d of August, to Mrs. Bligh, together with the conduct with which you followed it up (I allude to that letter by which you deprive her of credit with tradespeople), fully justified any one giving to any wife so abandoned, support; but the peculiar circumstances under which I was placed, made it imperative upon me to give Mrs. Bligh protection publicly.

The same cause fully justified the subsequent and present conduct of Mrs. Wellesley and myself; which is, has, and will continue to be, so long as it meets with the assent of Mrs. Bligh's family, to give her delicate and becoming support against that which we believe and contend to be, calumny, and which Mrs. Bligh as well as myself have offered to prove to be so.

Because, even had you written no such letter as that above alluded to, the period of time which has elapsed (above two months) since your wife quitted your house, precludes the propriety of your seeking the redress you require for a conduct so unequivocal as that of Mrs. Long Wellesley's and mine, and of such lengthened duration.

Because, were I to accept of your invitation in the present stage of Mrs. Bligh's affairs, I should prejudice her cause, and I might compromise my character—the insuperable objection to granting your demand.

The alternatives which I offer you are, when you prove in a British Court of Justice your wife's criminality with me. If the Duke of Wellington and Lord Darnley think proper to occupy themselves with my conduct to Mrs. Bligh—when they, after giving me an opportunity of explanation with their Lordships, come to the result that my conduct has been, in any shape derogatory to your honour.

(Signed) W. L. WELLESLEY.

To Captain Bligh.

Naples. Oct. 4. 1823.

Sir,—In answer to your letter of yesterday, refusing me satisfaction for the injuries and insults I have experienced on your account, I have, in the first place, to say, that part of your letter where you accuse me of having abandoned my wife, is positively false—"any wife so abandoned!"—it being a notorious fact, that she, on the contrary, abandoned me, and quitted my house for no other ostensible reason than because I had refused to permit her any longer to receive your visits, which (as I told her frequently) I thought highly improper. My letter to Mrs. Bligh of the 2d of August, to which you refer, was the necessary consequence of her having taken this step.

Your affording Mrs. Bligh your protection (under all circumstances), I cannot but think very rational; but you were not therefore obliged to appear publicly with her on your arm before my face—an insult, which nothing but the obligations I have hitherto lain under, could have prevented me from resenting at the moment.

Your objections to affording me satisfaction appear to me absurd. It is surely the injured person that has the power of choosing his time and place of redress. It is here, at Naples, that I have been injured—that I am pointed at as a cuckold; and it is here, and at the present time, I again demand redress.

You are pleased to offer it to me, when I shall have proved in a British Court of Justice my wife's criminality with you.

I must remind you that there are may cases of this sort, where, though it may not have been possible to prove the fact in a Court of Justice, it has, nevertheless, been fully proved, to the belief and satisfaction of every honest mind. Should I, however, succeed in so proving the fact, I am sufficiently redressed in another way; and, as to the reference you propose making to the Duke of Wellington and Lord Darnley, I cannot possibly conceive how they are to decide upon a point of private feeling; and I, therefore, refuse to accept your alternatives.

(Signed) THOS. BLIGH.

To the Hon. W. L. Wellesley.

Capella Vecchia, Oct. 4, 1823.

Sir,—You appear, by your letter of this day's date, to have strangely misconceived the sense of an expression in my letter to you of yesterday's date. The term "so abandoned" applies to your letter of the 2d of August, to Mrs. Bligh, and has no reference whatever to your general conduct towards your wife. I conveyed my letter to you yesterday by Dr. Bulkeley, in order that he might explain to you any ambiguity there might be in its contents.

The cause you assign for Mrs. Bligh's quitting your house was quite unknown to me; her intention of so doing was equally unknown to me, till it was in execution; and I used all the influence in my power to prevent its fully taking place.

With regard to giving your wife my arm, I most assuredly have done so in conducting her, in company with Mrs. Wellesley, from Mrs. Wellesley's box at the opera to her carriage.

Upon this point I am at issue with you, and until it is cleared up, I will never give you the meeting you require. I contend that the evidence of criminality against Mrs. Bligh and myself, I can make evident to any honest mind of plain sense, to be false. You say it is true. But give it to me; let it come forth, and I will prove it false; and I will manifest to you that your wife was free from crime with me as any virtuous woman can be. When of this truth I fail to convince such men as the Duke of Wellington and Lord Darnley, or Lord Darnley alone, if you please, I will give you the satisfaction you require.

I am, Sir, &c.

(Signed) W. L. WELLESLEY.

To Captain Bligh.

OCCURRENCES IN BRIEF.

The King certainly goes to Brighton next week.—The Princess Augusta is quite recovered from her late accident, and paid a visit of condolence on Friday to the Princess Sophia and Duchess of Kent, at Kensington Palace.—The French Ambassador at Rome is said to have declared to the Pope that the Liberty of the Press should be abolished in France during this Session.—Some papers have announced that Lady Anne Coke has been delivered of a third son. The silence of the Norwich papers on the subject gives reason to doubt the truth of the statement.—Lord Portsmouth's concerns were again before Chancery on Saturday on three petitions presented to the Master, who had come to no result. Nothing was done, however, from the necessity of the Lord Chancellor seeing the Master. The court was crowded with Lord Portsmouth's creditors, who appeared extremely dissatisfied with this new delay.—Bank of England Branch Banks are to be established at Leeds and at Lincoln.—At Hants Quarter Sessions a great number of prisoners were tried for offences against the Game Laws. The increase of this crime the Chairmen attributed to the depressed state of agriculture.—A "Circular," issued by the trustee of Constable and Co.'s estates (the great booksellers of Edinburgh), intimates that from the state of the funds there will be no dividend.—Lieutenant Francis Beggs, convicted of manslaughter last week in Dublin, for killing a sheriff's officer, has been sentenced to transportation for life.—The aged father of a man named Littlewood, committed to prison in Yorkshire for shooting a gamekeeper, is since dead, supposed from grief at his son's delinquency.—The warehouses of Messrs. Cox, Young, and Co. at Limehouse, were destroyed by fire on Friday morning. The loss is estimated at 2,000l.

Fatal Effects of Jealousy.—Wednesday an inquest was held at the Blue Anchor, in Coleman-street, on the body of Caroline Redmans. It appeared that the deceased, who was a young and good looking female, had been only married nine months, and lived in Greea-court, Coleman-street. Her husband is a shoe-maker. For the first six months they lived happily together; but for the last three they had lived very unhappily; and the husband repeatedly declared, that he would leave her altogether, and endeavour to obtain work in the country. A month or two since, a woman named Rhodes came to town from Cambridge, where she left her husband, and took up her abode with Redmans and his wife, much against the inclination of the deceased; and, to add to her indignation, he insisted on the woman sleeping in the same bed with them. This roused the unfortunate woman's jealousy; in which she indulged so much, that about three weeks ago she procured some corrosive sublimate, and in the presence of her husband and the woman Rhodes attempted to swallow it; but was prevented by her husband, who forced the tea-cup out of her hand. The woman remained sleeping night after night with them; and Redmans' wife repeatedly said to the persons about the house, that she could not put up with such treatment, and she was determined to destroy herself. On Saturday week, her husband gave her five shillings to procure a Sunday's dinner, which she did; and after she had got it ready, he refused to dine with her, and ate his meal up stairs with the landlady; in the afternoon, his wife swallowed a large quantity of oxalic acid, and died soon afterwards. The jury returned a verdict of insanity.

The depth of rain that fell at a village in Rutland in the four last months of the year 1826, was 7·8 inches, or 3268 hogsheads per acre; which was something more than what fell in the aggregate of the eight preceding months on the same area of the earth's surface. The medium of the barometer for the whole year was 29·42. and the maximum heat 84· (within doors), on the 31st of July.

Fire.—On Thursday morning last, between two and three o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in St. John-street, on premises belonging to a Mr. Fowler. Such was the rapidity of the flames, that the inmates of the house had great difficulty in escaping with their lives; and, for a time, the surrounding houses were threatened with destruction. The arrival of several engines, however, and a plentiful supply of water, in a short time, furnished the means of subduing the flames, which, by the active exertions of the firemen, were got under in less than an hour. The fire broke out in the upper part of the house; from what cause is unknown. The lower part was occupied by a widow, of the name of Butler, who carried on the business of a grocer and general dealer. She had paid a considerable sum of money on coming into the premises, about six weeks ago; and is now, in consequence of this calamity, reduced to penury; no part of her stock, &c. being insured. The whole of the upper part of the premises is consumed; and the houses on each side are greatly injured.

Singular Conviction.—James Deans, driver of the Royal Blue London Bath coaches, was last week fined in the mitigated penalty of 5l. and costs, before E. Pickwick, Esq., Mayor of Bath, under 50th Geo. III., which provides, "that if any coachman or guard shall put any outside passenger into the inside of a coach, without the leave of one at least of the inside passengers, and next to whom such person shall sit, such outside passenger, not paying as an inside passenger, the coachman or guard, or, if they cannot be found, the proprietor shall forfeit, on conviction, not less than 50s. or more than 10l." It appeared in evidence on the above case, that the coachman had used insolent language towards the complainant, and had declared that no passenger was his master, or had a right to dictate to him; and that he would put into his coach as many persons as he pleased. The Magistrate's Clerk read to Deans another clause of the Act in question, of which he observed, Deans seemed to be ignorant, namely, that he was liable to a penalty of from 40s. to 5l. for insolence to any passenger. The informant's share of the penalty was given to the Bath Hospital.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Charge of Forgery.—A young man named Evans Jones, was brought up in custody on Thursday, on a charge of forgery. The facts of the case, as elicited from the testimony of several witnesses, were briefly these :—

On Tuesday, the prisoner left at the bank of Messrs. Jones, Lloyd, and Co. Lothbury, a bill drawn on them for acceptance for 300l. purporting to be by one of the firm of Jones and Co. bankers in Llandovery, Wales, who have an account open with Jones, Lloyd, and Co. The prisoner called next day, in the usual mode of business, for the bill, and the forgery having, in the interim been discovered, he was shewn into a private room, while an officer was sent for, who took him into custody.

Mr. Taylor, one of the partners in the firm of Jones, Lloyd, and Co. stated, that the house of Jones and Co. of Llandovery, had an account opened with them.

Two of the Clerks in the same firm proved the facts connected with the tender of the bill, and the circumstances which had induced them to have the prisoner given into custody.

Cope, the officer, into whose custody the prisoner was given, stated, that when they desired him to show where he lodged, he gave them a wrong direction; but, after some remonstrance on the folly of such conduct, he brought them to the right place, 136, Aldersgate-street. On a search, some parcels were found, and a portmanteau, which was concealed under the bed.

Mr. Jacob Hall, of 136, Aldersgate-street, stated, that the prisoner had lodged with him since the middle of November last; he only knew him by the name of Jones, and could not tell how he obtained his livelihood.

Mr. Stephen Ridge, of 57, High-street, Borough, linen-draper, said, the prisoner had lived with him as shop-clerk nearly two years, during which time he had frequent opportunities of becoming acquainted with his hand-writing. (The bill was here handed to the witness.) He had not the least doubt that the entire of it had been written by the prisoner. The prisoner left his employment with witness on the 23d of November.

The Lord Mayor remanded the prisoner till Wednesday next.

UNION-HALL.—On Thursday a young man, named James Cooney, was brought up to this Office, in custody, before the Sitting Magistrate, M. Swabey, Esq., charged with having committed an assault of a most outrageous nature upon his own father.

A watchman of St. Saviour's parish stated, that on the preceding night, hearing cries of "Murder" issue from a house on his beat; he went to it, and on entering a room, on the ground floor, he observed the complainant, an elderly man, lying on the floor, with his throat cut, and the blood flowing profusely from the wound; he pointed to his son, who was also present, saying, "that's the villain who has cut my throat." The watchman immediately took the prisoner into custody. The prisoner appeared as if he had been fighting, for his face was cut and bruised a good deal.

To the horror of every one in the office, the defendant's father now stepped forward, and exhibited a frightful gash in his throat. He stated, that on the night before, between eleven and twelve o'clock, while in his bed-room, he heard a noise below stairs, and on going down he saw his eldest son, the defendant, and some of his other children, quarrelling. He ordered them to bed; the defendant refused, and ultimately struck his father a blow on the head with a chair. The latter, enraged at such treatment from a son, collared him, and in a struggle they both fell to the ground. While in this position the defendant, who was uppermost, reached over to a rack on which the working tools used in their trade were kept, and snatching out a sharp instrument, called a razor-knife, drew it across the old man's throat. The complainant added, that he was subsequently conveyed to the hospital, where, on inspection, it was ascertained that he had a narrow escape of his life, for, had the instrument penetrated a little further, the windpipe must have been severed. The House Surgeon, he said, sewed up the wound, and permitted him to appear at this Office to state the atrocious conduct of his son.

The Chief Constable gave evidence of the outrageous and turbulent conduct of the defendant towards his father on previous occasions.

The complainant said, that he was in continual danger of his life from the threats of his son, who has often declared he would murder him.

The defendant, who listened to the charge with the most perfect indifference, said, that his father was drunk at the time, and in struggling together, while he (the defendant) had a knife in his hand, cutting some bread, the instrument slipped, and cut his father in the throat.

The Magistrate held the defendant to bail, which he being unable to procure, was committed to gaol.

On Saturday a middle-aged and fashionably-dressed female, the wife of a Director in a Government office, was charged at Worship-street office with shop-lifting. She gave her name Elizabeth Foreman. T. Atkinson, shopman to Mr. Hopkins, linendraper, Shoreditch, deposed that the prisoner and another female (her daughter) came to the shop on Friday evening, and purchased a piece of lace, value 2s. 7½d. He afterwards displayed some half stockings, but she refused to purchase! While sitting beside the counter, the witness saw her draw a pair of stockings from the counter into her muff, which lay in her lap; and on her paying for the lace, he told her he was sorry to say he believed she had a pair of stockings in her muff. She replied, "No, I have not;" but as the stockings were partly out of the muff, he reached across the counter and drew them out. While she was moving towards the door, the witness looked over the counter, and observed a card of lace lying at the foot of the chair in which the prisoner sat, and he immediately passed round the counter and stopped her, saying, that he could not allow her to quit the shop until he had acquainted his employer with her proceedings. On searching her, a pair of the stockings that she had been looking at were found tightly rolled up in her hand. Mr. Butler attended for the accused, and urged that she might have taken the property involuntarily, and Mr. Hopkins said he had no doubt of it, and appeared most anxious to forego a prosecution. The magistrates, however, ordered the prisoner to be committed, but afterwards admitted her under Mr. Peel's Act to bail in the sum of 200l. to answer the charge at the Sessions.

Crowds opposite Printshops.—The Lord Mayor has issued a proclamation, prohibiting persons from crowding in front of print-shops, to the obstruction of foot-passengers, and stating that the street-keepers have received orders to prevent such obstructions. This step has been rendered necessary in consequence of several accidents having recently occurred through the obstacles presented by crowds of persons so assembling; particularly one which occurred last week in Gracechurch-street, when a person passing was thrown off the kirb-stone on his back and the wheel of a heavy dray passing at the time, unfortunately went over his head, and caused his instant death.

A verdict of Manslaughter was returned on Wednesday last at West Wratting, Cambridgeshire, against the father and mother of a child named Maine who died in consequence of their cruelty.—The child was of unclean habits, for which they frequently severely punished it, the father kicking and the mother beating and nearly starving it. On Saturday week it had again dirtied itself, when the the mother obliged it to be stripped, and, forced it into a pond or dike of water at the bottom of the garden, and so placed the child, that the water went all over its head and body; and after it came into the house, beat it with a whip or stick, until it was broken about the poor little sufferer, who died in a day or two after.

The last intelligence in the French Papers is favourable to the idea that peace will be preserved. The Swiss troops of France left Madrid on the 12th. The Spanish Government, on its part, has issued a manifesto, in the form of a circular, to the Governors of Provinces, declaring its pacific disposition towards Portugal. In Paris, whatever alarms had been excited at the beginning of the week, seem to have disappeared, and the French Funds have recovered from their depression. So long as a rebellion continues to rage in Portugal, the issue of the crisis must be doubtful, but the chances of the continuance of peace, even with Spain, still we think greatly preponderate.

The intelligence from Java yesterday reaches down to the 17th September. The Dutch authorities have been roused by the alarming state of the Island, to the most energetic measures; in addition to the 750 soldiers, lately landed from Europe, all the disposable forces from the coast and the adjacent Islands have been ordered to Batavia, to make one grand effort against the Rebel force. The troops from Pedang had passed Anjer, and those from Palembang had been spoken with, one day's sail from Batavia.

The authorities also appear to combine apparent moderation with their military movements. The Sultan of Djocjocarta, the good friend and ally of England, who has been a prisoner in the Moluccas since the evacuation of the island by the English forces, has been shipped to Batavia, and, under an escort of military, passed Solo on his way to Djocjocarta, to be crowned. The Dutch expect the greatest effects from this apparent clemency, as the son of the Sultan is the leader, and one of the most active of the rebels in Java.

We received intelligence yesterday, from Mexico to the 3rd of December. The measure for loading the import of cotton goods with high duties is partly confirmed—a measure to this effect has been submitted to Congress. A piece of goods, which cost at Manchester 16s. 6d., is liable to a duty of 11¼ dollars, or 45s.; low goods pay in proportion to the fine.

In consequence of this measure, the English merchants in the city of Mexico have sent orders to Vera Cruz to bond the cotton goods immediately on their being landed "for exportation."

The political intelligence from Mexico has no leading feature. The accounts represent the riches and resources of Mexico as inexhaustible, but assert that the country is suffering from ill-advised measures of the Government.

On the 6th of November two regiments raised the cry for General Guerredo as President, but the movement was instantly suppressed.

A convoy, with twelve hundred thousand dollars, left the city of Mexico for Vera Cruz on the 5th of November, and it was expected 300,000 more would be ready for the escort when it reached Puebla.

Mr. Bethell has very properly directed the subscription entered into to support his pretensions at the late election to be returned to the respective contributors, and has himself defrayed the expenses of his canvass.—Leeds Intelligencer

One of the French papers of Wednesday builds an absurd speculation on the absence of Lord Granville from a diplomatic dinner given by M. Damas. The death of the Duke of York is surely sufficient cause to account for the non-attendance of the British Ambassador at a sort of public entertainment. We may here mention that the French Court wear mourning on this occasion for eleven days. The first six days in black, the five last in white. The mourning began on Thursday last.—Times.

The quantity of tea taken for home consumption within the last twenty years, amounts, in the whole, to 430,308,170 pounds weight. The average consumption of this article in the kingdom, for that period, therefore, is yearly, 21,515,408 lbs.; weekly, 413,758 lbs. or 58,947 lbs. in each day.

It is computed that the different new works now in contemplation by the Middlesex County Magistrates, if all carried into effect, will require county rates amounting to upwards of 200,000l.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—Tuesday night, about eleven o'clock, as the Exeter coach was on its way to Bristol, the driver found the road impeded, between Taunton and Bridgewater, by a wagon and a gig, the latter being upset. On the passengers alighting, they found one gentleman lying dead on the road, the forewheel of the wagon having passed ovre his body, and anothre, much bruised. The latter stated, that in attempting to pass the wagon, the wheels of the gig came in contact with a heap of stones, which had been carelessly left in the road, by which means it was upset. The gentleman killed was a Mr. Lucas, of Taunton.

A gentleman who arrived in town on Tuesday, from Madrid, says the state of society there is dreadful: every one is afraid, not only of his neighbours, but of the members of his own family. The utmost reserve and caution is observed in conversation amongst the most intimate friends, and distrust is prevalent everywhere.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.—On Thursday a Court of Common Council was held for the dispatch of ordinary business. A petition was presented from the Rector, the Select Vestry, and a number of the inhabitants of the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, praying an advance of money from the Court, in payment for that part of the burial-ground belonging to the parish, which was wanted in the formation of the intended new Fleet-market. The Corporation had, it appeared, agreed to purchase the burial-ground in question for the sum of 9,000l. In consequence of this agreement, the parish had sought other ground, and had made a bargain with the Bishop of Bangor for the purchase of a plot at the sum of 4,000l.; but, now all arrangements were formed, they found that they could not make out a good legal title for the conveyance of their own ground to the City. They now offered security to the City for sixty years, and prayed that the difficulty of the title might, upon that security, be waived.—Referred to Improvement Committee.

HURRICANE.—On Sunday last the metropolis and its environs felt the effects of one of the most severe gales of wind which have occurred for some years. Upwards of 200 feet of the east wall of the New London Dock, now building at Shadwell, thirty feet high and four thick, was blown down. Had the wall been two feet higher, it would inevitably have fallen on the roofs of houses in the rear, and reduced them to a heap of ruins, and their inmates would most probably have been buried in them; or, had it occurred upon a week day, there is scarcely a doubt but many lives would have been lost, as there is a large body of men constantly employed about that part of the wall which has given way. As it was, two pigs and some fowls were destroyed. The expense of rebuilding the wall is estimated at nearly 2000*l*. The accounts from all parts of the country give melancholy details of the effects of the storm, though in no instance have we heard of any lives being lost. On Friday se'nnight, the Dublin coach to Cork, when it arrived at the bridge Urlingford, on the bog of Allen, owing to the tempest being almost terrific, the horses were either unable or unwilling to proceed; and one of them becoming restive, the passengers got out; they had, however, scarcely alighted when the coach, horses, and coachman were blown over the bridge into the bog; by which three of the horses were suffocated. The coachman was not injured, and the other horse, with some difficulty, was saved.

ELLISTON'S BANKRUPTCY.

The third examination came on on Friday, before the Commissioners of Bankrupts. There were very few additional debts proved.

Mr. Calcraft, M.P., of Manchester-square, came to prove two separate debts—one of 4,795l. 16s. 8d., as chairman of the proprietors of Drury-lane Theatre, on their behalf; the other, a private debt of 135l. He proved the latter without opposition.

Application was then made on behalf of all the parties interested, for a sale of a mortgage of 500l., with interest thereon, amounting to 161*l*. 0s. 7d., made to Mr. Soane on the Croydon Theatre by the bankrupt.

The Commisssioners thought they had no authority to order the required sale.

The solicitor of the assigness said a similar order had been granted and acted upon in the case of J. Green, of Hatton-garden.

The Commissioners asked the bankrupt if he had his balance sheet ready?

Mr. Elliston said, he had only yesterday come to town, and thinking that Mr. Dunn the treasurer's accounts would be sufficient, he had not come furnished with further accounts. However, he would be ready by to-morrow with them, if necessary.

The solicitor of the assignees said, they wished to accommodate Mr. Elliston in every thing, and would be satisfied with any day for an adjournment most convenient to him.

A day was then appointed for the adjourned meeting.

DISSENTERS' MARRIAGES.—A curious case occurred on Sunday last at the Church of St. George the Martyr, Queen-square. A Dissenting couple, under the denomination of "Free-thinking Christians," presented themselves at the altar to be married, and at the same time tendered to the officiating Minister their usual protest against the ceremony, not believing the doctrine of the Trinity. The Minister refused to marry them but on their conforming to the words set down in the Ritual, and the parties left the church. On Monday they attended again, with an "Elder" of their church, and after a lengthened argument, in which he protested against the errors of the Church of England, and called upon the Minister to do his duty, the parties proceeded to the altar. The bridegroom presented a copy of the protest which he had delivered the previous day, saying, "This, Sir, is a declaration of the grounds on which we submit to the law." The ceremony then proceeded in the usual way, till the bridegroom was told by the Minister to repeat after him, "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The bridegroom paused, and asked, "am I compelled to say that, when I do not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity?" The Minister insisted that he should do so, when the Elder said, "as Elder of the Church of God to which they belong, I protest against their using these words, but if you insist upon it, they will comply." The bridegroom then said, "In the name of the Father, and (but protesting against it) of the Son, and (but protesting against it) of the Holy Ghost." The Minister paused, but after having conferred with Mr. Marriott, one of the Magistrates of Queen-square, proceeded.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of

"MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is stongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES. Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

Warehouse, 107, Strand, corner of the Savoy Steps.—The Original Fish-sauce Warehouse.

FISTULÆ and PILES.—From the very great pain I have endured, and the wonderful cure that has been effected by Mr. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur, of No. 2, Half Moon-street, Piccadilly, I am induced, for the benefit of others so afflicted, to give publicity to my case. Having been afflicted with those painful complaints for more than 10 years, during which period I was attended by several eminent Surgeons, whose best endeavours afforded me no relief, I had nearly given up all hopes of a cure; but fortunately hearing of several great cures performed by Mr. Van Butchell, I was induced to place myself under his cure, when to my great surprise after not more than 45 attendances, and without confinement I have the happiness to acknowledge myself perfectly cured. T. BARKER.

N.B. Cards of my address may be had by applying to Mr. Humphreys, No. 2, Mary-le-bone-lane, Oxford-street.

COLDS, COUGHS, ASTHMAS, &c.

BUTLER'S PECTORAL ELIXIR. Experience during a very long period has incontestably proved the superior efficacy of this Medicine, in all cases of Colds, Coughs, and Asthmatic Affections. By promoting gentle expectoration, it very shortly relieves the Patient of a slight or recent Cold, and a few doses are generally sufficient to remove those which neglect has rendered more confirmed and obstinate, and which are accompanied with Cough, Spitting of Blood, and other serious symptoms. Its peculiar balsamic powers tend to heal soreness, and allay the irritation of the lungs, in cases of Cough; and in Asthmatic Affections it assists and gives freedom to the Breath.

Sold in Bottles, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh: and 54, Sackville-street Dublin: Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Willmott, 83, High-street Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom may be had, BUTLER'S BALSAMIC LOZENGES, used in recent Coughs, Hoarseness, &c. and for rendering the Voice clear and flexible, and protecting its organs from the effects of exertion. In Boxes, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d.

N.B. Be careful to ask for Butler's Pectoral Elixir.

A Letter from W. Drayton, Esq. Sion-Hill, Bath.

TO Mrs. VINCENT, SOLE PROPRIETOR of GOWLAND'S LOTION.

MADAM—I should think myself deficient in duty to society and you, were I to withhold my public testimony to the great efficacy of your GOWLAND'S LOTION, which I have seen performed by the administration of it in a case under my own roof.

A young gentleman, aged about seven years, son of a Colonel in the army was afflicted with a virulent and sore eruption, accompanied with an intolerable itching in the wrists and insteps, the only places of attack of the complaint and that to so violent a degree as to make it necessary to confine his hands in bags, particularly at night: the complaint resisted various applications from the united consultation of three physicians of eminence, and continued to grow worse under the regimen prescribed, when a lady, who had received a cure of a very bad case of Scurvy in the face, of several years standing, by your Gowland's Lotion, recommended a trial of the same remedy. It was applied under my own inspection—the disease gave way—and three quarts of your Lotion performed a radical cure of a disorder, which had been of about four years duration, and had baffled the skill of several physicians eminent in their profession.

From my conviction of the above cure I recommended your Gowland's Lotion to a lady whose face exhibited a very disagreeable eruption, (even large pustules, and as one died away another appeared,) so much as to prohibit her going into company: a Quart of your Gowland's Lotion effected a cure, and she is now free from eruption. I am, Madam, &c.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhea, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, are various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

Principiis obsta; sero medicina paratur.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author. Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

EXPERIENCE IS THE TEST OF PRETENSION.

MANY years have now elapsed since the just appreciation, by a discerning Public, of ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL as the most infallible promoter of the growth, accelerator of the beauty, and antidote to decay, of the human Hair, of any specific of ancient or modern times. Uniformly successful in felicitous result, and unparaleled in universal estimation, this benign and balsamic fluid pervades, with creative energy, the pores of the head, cherishes the latent roots of the hair, and elicits a luxuriant flow of that fine adornment of manhood, and fascinating enhancement of female attractions.

Not less conspicuous for energetic virtues is ROWLAND'S KALYDOR the ORIGINAL and GENUINE, as the faithful auxiliary of beauty, sustaining unimpaired the charms of loveliness in youth and maturity, and renovating age itself, with a juvenile bloom. So perfectly innoxious and efficacious, that Infant and Adult derive pleasure from its application, while it operates as a thorough cleanser of the skin from all unseemly impurities, by mild, yet powerful and imperceptible influence, irradiating with transparent whiteness, and adorning the neck and arms with transcendant and irresistless attraction. Rowland's Macassar Oil and Kalydor thus pre-eminently distinguished, and established as indispensable at the toilet and the dressing-table have excited the envy of empiricism.

The Public are therefore CAUTIONED against the manœuvres of IMPOSITION, and respectfully recommended, in purchasing Macassar Oil, or the Kalydor, to ask for Rowland's; to attend to the labels on the respective bottles of the original specifics, each bottle bearing the autographical signature and address, in red ink, "A. ROWLAND and SON, No. 20, Hatton-garden" all other preparations vended as Macassar Oil, or the Kalydor, are gross impositions.

CHILBLAINS, RHEUMATISM, SPRAINS, &c.

BUTLER'S CAJEPUT OPODELDOC.—Cajeput Oil, which is the basis of this Opodeldoc, has been long esteemed on the Continent, as a remedy for Chronic Rheumatism, Spasmodic Affections, Chilblains, Palsy, Stiffness, and Enlargement of the Joints, Sprains, Bruises, and Deafness; and the experience of late years, in England, proves that it merits the high character given of it by the most eminent in the profession, in those obstinate complaints. Being combined in the form of Opodeldoc, it is rendered more penetrating, and consequently much more efficacious as an external application. Rubbed upon the skin, by means of flannel, or the warm hand, it allays morbid irritation of nerves, invigorates the absorbents, and accelerates the circulation.

Sold in Bottles, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 51, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 146, New Bond-street; Wilmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom also may be had MARSHALL'S UNIVERSAL CERATE, an excellent Remedy for Chilblains when broken; used also in Scalds, Burns, &c.

MR. BUCKINGHAM'S TRAVELS in MESOPOTAMIA are to appear in the course of the ensuing week.

This journey in the deserts, and among the ancient and ruined cities of that interesting country, was performed, we understand, without the advantage of an European friend, companion, interpreter servant, or attendant of any sort. He adopted the dress, manners, and language of the country through which he passed; and, in order to ensure perfect accuracy to his descriptions, nothing was left to the doubtful records of memory, but every scene and event that he witnessed, and every observation that suggested itself, were immediately noted on the spot.

NEW PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION LIBRARY.—26, Holles-street, Cavendish-square.

EDWARD BULL begs respectfully to announce, that he has opened these extensive premises (late the Banking-house of Sir Claude Scott, Bart. and Co.) as a British and Foreign Library, with the primary design of furnishing to Subscribers in town or in any part of the United Kingdom, a more immediate regular and enlarged supply of New Publications, than is attainable through any other means; at a moderate expense. Subscribers have also the privilege of choosing, from a valuable and extensive collection of standard works, the use of the best Periodicals, Foreign as well as English, and the right of requiring the purchase of any publication of general interest that may not already be comprised in the Library. With these great advantages, added to an experience of many years active engagement in the Libraries of Mr. Colburn and Mr. Ebers, E. Bull ventures his pretensions to a share of public patronage, which he will zealously study to merit, sparing neither pains nor expense to ensure its continuance. Catalogues and Terms to be had on application.

Reviews, and Monthly Journals, of Literature, Science, &c., will be received into this Library regularly from France, Italy, and Germany.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale under the title of "MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is strongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgiss's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

ATTACK ON PRINCE TALLEYRAND.

"PARIS, JAN. 21.—Yesterday, at the conclusion of the funeral service at St. Denis, the Prince de Talleyrand, who officiated at the ceremony as Grand Chamberlain, left the church, and waited in a saloon adjoining, where the Princes retire previous to entering their carriages, when a man approached him hastily, and struck him on the head with his closed fist. The violence of the blow knocked the Prince down; the same man then gave him several kicks before the persons present could master him. The individual who has allowed himself to be guilty of these acts of violence is M. de Maubreuil, whose name has made so much noise in the Courts of Law, by reason of a famous suit.

"Monsieur, the Dauphin, was in the saloon at the same time, and his Royal Highness was one of the first persons who was enabled to assist Prince de Talleyrand.

"M. de Maubreuil was arrested and conducted to the Prefecture de Police; he did not endeavour to excuse the act. Prince de Talleyrand was conveyed to Paris in an alarming state; he was bled twice during the night; this morning he was a little better.

"P. S. We learn to-night that Prince de Talleyrand, after being bled for the second time, at midnight, became extremely weak; the weakness did not continue long. He slept well; the pains in the head, although more extended, have not become more severe. There is no fever."

The Biography of Living Persons, contains the following particulars relative to the individual who made so violent an attack on Prince Talleyrand, at St. Denis:—

Marie Arnaud Guerry de Maubreuil, was born in Brettany, about the year 1780. After making many campaigns in the French armies, he went into the service of Jerome Buonaparte, then King of Westphalia.

He was in Paris at the period when the allies entered it in 1814. He traversed the Boulevards, declaiming with extreme violence, against the usurper; some days afterwards, he said he was charged with a mission to get back the diamonds of the crown, which had been carried off by the Buonaparte family. On the route to Fontainbleau he met the Princess or Wirtemberg, the wife of Jerome. He detained her carriages, and seized a number of chests, containing articles of value. The Royal Government ordered them to be restored to this Princess, but a box of great value was not to be found.

M. de Maubreuil was immediately arrrested, and brought before the tribunal of the Seine, which declared itself to be incompetent to take cognizance of the charge.

He was set at liberty, but again arrested during the hundred days, when he published a libellous memoir against the Royal Government. Suddenly the doors of his prison were thrown open, and he hastened to Brussels, under a false name, but was recognised and arrested as a person suspected of intending to attempt the life of Louis XVIII. He was conducted to Ghent, where he attempted suicide in prison, but was prevented from carrying his design into effect, and carried to Aix-la-Chapelle, to be given up to the Prussians. He escaped on the road, and arrived in Paris at the moment of the second restoration.

In June, 1816, he was arrested once more, being accused of having plotted to carry off the Princes in the environs of St. Cloud. In August, 1817, he was brought before the Correctional Police, for seizure of the diamonds of the Princess of Wirtemburgh. That tribunal declared itself incompetent. M. de Maubreuil was then sent back to the Royal Court. He pleaded there his own cause, but like a man of unsound mind, and, at the same time, he addressed a note to all the Ambassadors, insulting their respective Sovereigns.

The Court of Cassation sent him back to the Royal Court at Rouen, and afterwards before that of Douay. At the moment when the sentence was to be pronounced he escaped from prison for the fourth time. He went to Belgium, and thence to England. The Court of Douay condemned him, for contumacy, to five years imprisonment, and a fine of 500 francs.

MADRID.

The circular letter of the King of Spain to his Captains-General is published below. As part of the Portuguese rebels are now retreating towards the Spanish frontier, it will be seen apparent whether the Spanish Ministry mean to conciliate or to deceive Great Britain, by the avowal here expressed of a desire to avoid offending her. If the Portugnese rebels, on their return, should continue to be protected, encouraged, and kept united as a military body by the officers of the Spanish frontier, there exists no further possibility of negotiation:—

"Substance of a circular letter, addressed by the King of Spain's Minister (Zambrano) to the Captains-General on the frontiers, dated 11th January.

"The events which have taken place in Portugal since the death of his late Majesty John VIth, have called his Catholic Majesty's most serious attention to the present state of affairs in that country. His Majesty being determined to preserve his kingdom from every attempt against the safety, dignity, and independence of this Crown, and against the fundamental order of the Monarchy, all which may turn to the prejudice and contempt of Spanish honour, has thought fit to take measures most proper to fulfil this essential object.

"In consequence of this Royal determination, all the frontier towns have been reinforced with suitable garrisons, in order to combine a line of defence with the Army of Observation under the command of General Sarsfield.

"His Majesty has desired me to inform you of this measure, and to announce his desire of preserving friendly relations with his august allies, and to avoid giving any offence to Portugal, or to England its ally. It is, however, his Majesty's intention to repress by force the least aggression against the Spanish teritory, and also every internal attempt at revolt from discontented Spaniards. (Signed) "ZAMBRANO."

LISBON, JAN. 1.—"The ships have all arrived out, after excellent passages. The Spartiate, 74, entered the Tagus to-day, in seven days from Spithead; so that we have now here, the Ocean, Vice-Admiral Lord Amelius Beauclerk; Wellesley, Rear-Admiral Sir Thomas Hardy; Genoa, Windsor Castle, Albion, Melville, Glocester, Spartiate, Romney, Pyramus, Falcon, and Lyra; the Sandwich packet, and nine sail of transports, which brought out the 10th Regiment from Cork, &c. The Melville and Romney will sail to-morrow for Gibraltar, to bring troops from that garrison. Sir William Clinton arrived yesterday in the Wellesley. The 4th Regiment and 1st battalion of the 60th Regiment landed previously to his arrival. The 63d Regiment landed this afternoon; the Guards will land to-morrow. The following are appointed as the present quarters of our auxiliary force:—Brigade of Guards, at Belem; 4th Foot at Val de Perario; 10th Foot at Campo d'Orique; and 11th Foot at Beato Antonio: 23d Foot at Bon Morte; 43d Regiment at Beaton Antonio, with two companies at Grillo; 1st battalion 60th Regiment at Val de Peraris; 63d Foot at Xebregas; the cavalry, artillery, and staff corps. Commissary-General and Store-keeper's departments, at Belem. Captain Ommaney, R.N., of the Albion, at present commands at Fort St. Julien, with the marines. There appears to be little known here of the operations of the anti-Constitutionalists, since they gained possession of Almeida. The Marquis of Chaves is at Vigura. Lord Beresford is here, at present, a quiet spectator; at least, he has not assumed any military command. The public feeling here appears most fluctuating; at present it is not possible to make out how parties run."

PORTUGAL.

By the mail, which arrived on Thursday from Lisbon, we received Portuguese papers to the 8th instant:—

LISBON, JAN. 1.—Two regiments of the English Guards have landed on the quays of Belem.

JAN. 3.—The 10th English Regiment of Foot, and some Lancers, have landed. All these corps were received with the greatest enthusiasm and satisfaction by all the inhabitants of this capital.

We learn from private letters that the rebels were at Gouvea. The Conde de Villa Flor was at Cea, and General Claudino and Colonel Piato in Tornaes; the Loyal troops were engaged with the rebels.

HEAD-QUARTERS, OPORTO, DEC. 30.—Colonel Pinto, Governor of Coimbra, writes on the 29th, from that city, that the Conde de Villa Flor, by a despatch of the 27th, dated Fulha Dozo, informs him that he intended to proceed by forced marches to the bridge of Murcella, having learnt that the Marquis de Chaves had passed the Mondego, and was marching to the same point; the Count, therefore, ordered him to proceed also with his forces to the same bridge at Murcella, which he expected to occupy on the 31st. Colonel Vasconcellos writes from Amarante on the 29th, that being informed that some guerillas advanced to our lines and forced in the out-posts, he had ordered some troops that morning to disperse them, which they had done, taking prisoners ten guerillas with arms in their hands.

It appears from the above official communications, that a decisive action must soon take place between our troops and the rebels, since the divisions of the Count de Villa Flor and of Generals Claudino and Azeredo joining, the rebels must either fight or fly precipitately, losing their baggage, and abandoning the Portuguese territory.

COIMBRA, DEC. 25.—This evening despatches were received from General Claudino, saying that the rebels were retreating by the road of Trancoso, where he thought to arrive before them.

Count Villa Flor writes to the same effect, and that his advanced guard was already engaged with them. It may, therefore, be expected that there will be a general action at the passage of the Coa.

JAN. 4.—A report has been current in the best informed circles, that Lord W. C. Beresford takes the command of the Portuguese army. If this means a command in chief, independent of the Ministry, as was formerly the case, we cannot suppose that any Ministers of the King would advise such a step. It would be a manifest violation of the charter, this being a public office, for which only Portuguese citizens were qualified, and General Beresford is a foreigner.

The public, however, is perhaps mistaken, and it may be only intended to give the illustrious General the command of operations (O Commando de Operacoes); but even in this there are constitutional difficulties which we do not pretend to solve.

We do not know whether it is absolutely necessary to place a foreigner at the head of a Portuguese army; but if it be, it seems more natural, conciliatory, and politic, that General Clinton, who commands the superior English forces, should take, as long as the necessity continues, the command of the Portuguese, who, by their reduced numbers, could make but a small addition to the English force. However this be, and whatever may be the intention of the Government, it seems to us that there is no foundation for the general anxiety which this report has caused, since we cannot believe that the Government will take a resolution manifestly contrary to the spirit of the letter of the Charter, by which the Constitution of the State would be essentially affected.

OPORTO, JAN. 3.—The Count de Villa Flor was on the night of the 27th at Oliveira de Hospital, and his advanced guard at Galizes. On the 29th, at 11 o'clock, they marched against the rebels, who had passed the night about a league distant.

Our troops went to pass the night at Torrozello, and marched to the heights of Pinhancos, where Magessi, Telles Jordao, and Silveira, were said to be.

The rebels are supposed to be flying to the Serra, in the direction of Covilhan.

Silveira had his head-quarters on the 30th at Passos, and the Count de Villa Flor at Cea. On the 31st the latter set out at six in the morning, and the rebels were retiring, occupying the country from Pinhancos to Gouvea. The troops of Claudino and Azeredo were at Carregal on the night of the 29th.

The Count de Villa Flor sent a flag of truce to the rebels, summoning them to surrender and lay down their arms, but they did not agree to this.

The position in which they are is very remarkable. The Count de Villa Flor on one side, Claudino and Azeredo on the other, and the Serra de Estrella, now covered with snow, on another.

There is a letter from Coja which says, that the rebels are entirely surrounded in Passos by the troops of Villa Flor and Claudino, and on the other side by the Serra de Estrella. Forty baggage-waggons are already taken.

A mail has arrived from Francoso and Pinhel, and it appears that part of the letters from that city are dated the 30th, which is a certain proof that that part of the country was already cleared.

We extract the following from a letter of a deputy:—

"The Infant Don Miguel has sent to his brother Don Pedro IV. the original invitation, the oath taken at La Serena, and the other papers sent to him by the rebels in Spain, calling him to the absolute Sovereignty of Portugal, with a solemn protest, wholly disapproving of such an attempt as his best and most faithful subject, which was officially transmitted to the Government, and by Austria to its Ambassador here."

Sir Robert Wilson is going to organize and command a Lusitanian Legion of 3,000 men, to act as a free corps.

Lord Beresford has rendered great services to the legitimate cause of Don Pedro, and his special mission to our Government had the most important consequences.—O Portuguese to the 5th of January inclusive

WAR-OFFICE, LISBON, JAN, 7.—The Count de Villa Flor writes from Gouvea on the 2d, that the rebels had precipitately retreated from the left to the right bank of the Mondego by the bridge of Cabra. He caused the bridges of Cabra and Palhes to be reconnoitred by the 4th and 13th Infantry, the 3d and 9th Chasseurs, and the 11th Cavalry. There was a good deal of skirmishing on the bridge of Cabra, which our troops passed under a constant fire of the rebels of the 4th and 7th Chasseurs and 40 Artillerymen, who defended the bridge and adjoining positions. The rebels had three killed and eight prisoners, all of the 4th Chasseurs; at the same time, some men of the 3d Regiment of Infantry abandoned them, and came over to our troops. An Ensign of our troops was severely wounded; also one private. Major Schewalbach, commander of the 3d Chasseurs, was the first that passed the bridge, crying "Long live Don Pedro IV." All the troops behaved bravely. The Count had given orders to explore the march of the rebels, which appeared to be in the direction of Trancozzo.

The General of the Lower Beira writes from Caria, on the 2d, that the Marquis and Marchioness de Chaves and Telles Jordao had arrived at Guarda the day before, and that he (the General) was advancing to Belmonte.

The Chief of the 1st Department, PINTO.

GREECE.

The following is an extract of a letter received in town from Mr. Gordon, of Cairness, the gentleman well known to the British public for the active part he has long taken in Greek affairs, dated Zante, the 28th of Nov. 1826:—

"I shall now proceed to give you an abstract of the service which circumstances have enabled me to render to the Greeks with the limited means that were intrusted to me.

"On my arrival in Greece, last May, I perceived at once that the state of affairs was such as to preclude the possibility of forming a new corps of regular troops at that moment. In fact, the loss of Missolonghi had produced an universal discouragement; the magazines were empty, so was the treasury, and the regular troops were on the point of disbanding for want of pay and provisions. Fortunately, the enemy was weak also. Under these circumstances, my first care was to replenish the magazines of Napoli, and to give to Colonel Fabvier the means requisite to enable him to maintain and re-organize his corps. I then provided for the defence of Hydra, that bulwark of Greece (which was threatened with a very formidable attack), by throwing into it a garrison of regular troops (exclusive of Fabvier's corps), and furnishing them with pay and provisions for the space of two months, until the danger was past. This measure had the effect of raising the spirits of those brave islanders, and likewise of inducing the Spezziotes to go thither with their families and fleet, thus forming one community out of the two. I next turned my attention to other points; fully victualled the fortress of Carabusa, in Crete, and sent supplies to General Colocotroni, to the troops of Gastouni, and to the army of Roumelia. At different times I have shipped off from Zante more than 1,200,000lb. of flour and biscuit. I have still a portion on hand, which I propose to forward in small quantities, according to emergencies; and I am happy that at the present moment there is in this port a whole squadron sent by the European committees, and loaded with necessary supplies for Napoli. For the last month I have had a vessel of my own ready here, and only wait for a fair wind to return to Greece, in order to see whether, with my private means, I can put into execution my original project (for which winter is the most favourable season), in concert with the brave Colonel Fabvier, whom I am now proud to call my friend. This officer, although hitherto not very successful, owing to circumstances beyond his control, is treasure to Greece, if they make use of him rightly. His corps, though not so numerous as at first, is much fitter for service (as it proved at Athens), and he has been able to gain the attachment and confidence of his officers and soldiers. The Greek fleet, if its achievements have not appeared so brilliant as on some former occasions, has, nevertheless, shown more zeal, courage, and perseverance than it did before; neither have the Turks ever made a more inglorious naval campaign. I attribute this, in a great measure, to the hope of Lord Cochrane's arrival, which will, when it takes place, be the most important of all possible events for Greece. Should he have but a frigate and a steam-vessel, the enthusiasm that his name will create, and the confidence that the Greeks have in him, ensure his success. I cannot say enough in praise of the different European committees, who have been continually sending the most necessary supplies. Strange that England alone should be dead to such a cause! All we want here is bread, powder, lead, and a little money from time to time. Fabvier is supported by the French Philhellines. The late successes in Roumelia seem to have put Athens out of all present danger. Ibrahim Pacha is weak, and suffering greatly for want of money and provisions. For near six weeks we have had nothing but rain and gales of wind from the south, and no vessel has been able to get from hence into the Archipelago."

It is remarkable that Sir Wm. H. Clinton, now commanding the British troops in Portugal, is probably the only British General personally known to Ferdinand VII. It was at the quarters of Sir William, then commanding the Anglo-Spanish army, forming the blockade of Barcelona, that his Catholic Majesty alighted on his return from France, in March, 1814, after a fatiguing journey from Gerona. The King expressed himself very flatteringly to the British General, whose courtly manners are always acceptable with the great. General Sarsfield, now spoken of as the officer appointed to the command of the Spanish army on the frontier of Portugal, was, during 1813 and 1814, acting in immediate communication with the British forces, and in some degree under the command of Lord William Bentinck, and subsequently of General Clinton. General Sarsfield, although born a Spaniard, speaks English with fluency, and having learned it from his Irish relatives, with as fine a brogue as if he had never left the shores of Killarney. He is directly descended from the General Sarsfield who makes a figure in the Irish campaigns of James II. The present General Sarsfield distinguished himself highly at the defence of Tarragona against Suchet, and had his counsels and example been followed, that place would not have proved so easy a conquest to the French arms.—Evening Paper.

The Liverpool Ship-owners' Association have unanimously agreed to petition Parliament, complaining of the effects of the late alterations in the Navigation Laws.

On Thursday morning last, at Barnstaple, the tide, after having ebbed, and left the shipping to the port all a-ground for half an hour, suddenly returned and floated them again. A tremendous gale of wind came on at high water, to which the sailors attribute the phenomenon.—Alfred.

THE PEERAGE.—One of the most useful, as well as one of the most accurate, views of the Peerage of the British Empire we have yet seen, has just been published by Mr. Sams, of St. James's-street, and has deservedly obtained much of public patronage. The perspicuity of the arrangement (the names of the Peers following in simple alphabetical order, instead of being classed according to their ranks, and again divided according to their respective countries), is calculated to remove all those difficulties which have hitherto been encountered in the perusal of these works; and as it embraces the parentage, births, marriages, and issue, of all the living members of each family, descended in the male line, from the first Peer, it becomes doubly valuable. The work is to be continued annually.

The demand for weaving continues unabated, but wages are no higher; indeed we have been informed that a large house has again reduced the weaving of their mediums to the same price as their cambrics. Upon what principle of justice any manufacturer can offer the same wages for these two fabrics we are at a loss to discover, as the mediums are made from considerably finer materials, and require much greater skill in the workmanship. This system, if it become general, will operate materially to the injury of the weaver, and will be equivalent to a serious reduction of wages.—Bolton Chronicle.

On Tuesday evening, shortly after nine o'clock, as a young woman, named Webster, living in Allen-street, Goswell-street, was returning home across the Britannia fields from Frog-lane to the City-road, she was overtaken by an elderly and respectable-looking man, who, after warning her of her danger in being out at that time, offered his arm. This offer, however, was declined; he afterwards attempted to take some indecent familiarities, which she resenting, and calling out for assistance, the ruffian knocked her down by a blow on the shoulder, and after inflicting a wound with some sharp instrument, just above the left knee, darted off towards Hoxton. She had been also wounded in the left shoulder, where she had first been struck. Both wounds were, however, slight.

THE SPANISH REFUGEES.—Twenty pounds were sent anonymously on Tuesday to the Lord Mayor, and ten pounds on Thursday, for these unfortunate gentlemen. Several communications have also been received by the Committee, which shew that the distresses of these strangers have not been forgotten in the distribution of charity to poor natives. A number of tickets, entitling the bearers to a share in parochial allotments of coals, &c., have been sent by several well-intentioned individuals. The greatest difficulty to the unfortunate Noblemen and Gentlemen would, perhaps, be in getting the coals home, as the usual share of a peck or a bushel would in all probability weigh down their feeble frames.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, Jan. 24.

WELLESLEY V. THE DUKE OF BEAUFORT.

On the sitting of the Court, Mr. Heald resumed his argument on this case. He confessed that he had the greatest difficulty in saying to what particular points he should address his remarks. It was almost impossible to say on which the opposite side rested their defence. They had filed affidavit after affidavit, the whole of which had been received by the Court, and treated with the most extraordinary patience. That patience of his Lordship had, however, been productive of the greatest benefit to Mr. Wellesley, and he would say, that that gentleman was a man who, since his return to this country, had been watched both day and night. Not an hour had his enemies allowed to escape without tracking his footsteps to some myrmidon. He had been dodged from his house to his garden, and from his garden to his house. Watchmen, police, attorneys, clerks, and servants had been called into action for the purpose of tracing his proceedings. Every one possessed of the slightest opportunity of setting forth his conduct, and to whom a shilling appeared to be an object, had been converted into a spy; and the natural result was, that a strong prejudice had been created against him in the public mind. No one ever heard of a crowd being assembled to hear the praises of an individual; but once begin a tale of condemnation, and there would be no dearth of listeners. Therefore, considering that expense was no object to Mr. W., especially when put in competition with his character, the delay had been most favourable to that gentleman, because it had given him an opportunity, not merely of meeting the case which had been adduced against him, but of sifting the whole of the circumstances to the very bottom. The case was consequently fully before the Court, and although as a Counsel he might have looked with too favourable an eye on one side, still he felt confident that the Court would grant the prayer of the petitioner. After consulting with his learned friends as to the defence against the petitioner, he could only discover the following to be the abstract of their case:—They set out by asserting that Mr. Wellesley was not to be believed on his oath; that he had sworn falsely, in order to mislead the Court—therefore that his explanatory affidavit was of no value—and that consequently a case was established against Mr. Wellesley sufficient to call upon the Court to withhold from him the guardianship of his children. He had also further discovered that the other side chiefly relied upon the affidavit of Dr. Bulkeley—that that was to have every credit heaped upon it, while Mr. Wellesley was to be considered as a perjured man, and that, from being regardless of an oath, it was utterly impossible he should be a fit person to be intrusted with the protection of his children. Notwithstanding, however, the assumptions of his learned friends, he was satisfied that no person acquainted with the proceedings that had taken place before that Court, could feel that there was the slightest ground for depriving Mr. Wellesley of what the law of nature and the land entitled him to, namely, the custody of his children. If, indeed, his conduct had been such as it had been represented to be, then the case would be widely different, and the Court, by setting upon him the seal of disgrace, by depriving him of his children, would only be doing that which the whole country, if referred to, would adopt by acclamation. Dr. Bulkeley's affidavit, then, his very first, containing the statements which must be regarded as the head and front of the case brought forward on the other side; he would at once proceed to an examination of some of the principal parts of that document. As third Counsel for Mr. Wellesley, it was unnecessary for him to enter into minute particulars; but still there were some observations which might properly be made. The learned gentleman then proceeded to inspect the statements made by Dr. Bulkeley, and to question their probability. On his reading this passage, "Mr. Wellesley replied that he hoped I did not think him capable of boasting of having received a lady's favours, but did not deny it."

The Lord Chancellor said that if the deponent meant to construe Mr. Wellesley's expressions into an acknowledgment of the truth of the report alluded to, that was a stretch of inference would not be allowed in a court of justice.

Mr. Heald said he had viewed the matter precisely as his Lordship had done, and proceeded with his examination of the affidavit. On his remarking on the improbability of that part of the affidavits in which the conversation took place between Dr. Bulkeley and Mrs. Bligh respecting her pregnancy,

The Lord Chancellor said he believed that, during such conversations persons generally retired, and therefore it was almost impossible to know the particulars.

Mr. Heald concurred with the remark, but thought it monstrous to suppose that any married lady should have behaved as Mrs. Bligh had been represented to do.

The Lord Chancellor assured Mr. Heald that it would take much to surprise him, after what he had heard on the case of the Gardner Peerage. He had gained a variety of information on the subject during that investigation with which he had no doubt even Mr. Heald himself was unacquainted.

Mr. Heald said he had never been called in on a consultation of that kind, and therefore acknowledged his ignorance. He said he should not designate the affidavit of Dr. Bulkeley as some of his learned friends had done those of Mr. Wellesley, but he would leave it to the Court to say whether it was worthy of credit. His mildness towards Dr. Bulkeley had excited the astonishment of some of his learned friends on the other side.

The Lord Chancellor remarked, that they did not appear to care greatly about it, for none of them were present. Then addressing Mr. Beames—"As you are concerned in making the new orders of the Court, I wish you would settle this point:—When four counsel of a side are engaged, and all of them are to be heard, to the presence of how many of them is the Court entitled during the hearing of the cause?" He was entitled to the assistance of counsel, and the only assistance they gave him was to gain their hearing, and then to absent themselves.

Mr. Heald continued, and having gone through the affidavit, contrasting it with others, he expressed it as his decided opinion that the Court would not feel itself called upon to attach to it much credit. Mr. Wellesley, he said, positively denied the statement of Dr. Bulkeley, but then it was said by the learned Attorney General, that Mr. Wellesley had been guilty of perjury. And what was the evidence on which he was to be condemned? Why, he had incorrectly stated a single date. A mistake, it should be remembered, which was readily admitted, and most satisfactorily explained. If, indeed, Mr. Wellesley could have been guilty of perjury for the purpose of misleading the Court, then beyond all question there would be sufficient ground for the interposition of the authority of the Court, so properly vested in the keeping of the first law officer. Then would his Lordship, in common with the whole country, feel that Mr. Wellesley was unworthy of the custody of his own offspring.—But such was not the fact; and it must be palpable to the most ordinary understanding, that Mr. Wellesley, on the contrary, had been most anxious that the whole truth should be laid before the Court. But besides that circumstance, what had been the conduct of Mr. Wellesley towards his children? Had it not, from their infancy to the present time, been strongly marked by affection? It had. He had exhibited the greatest solicitude for their welfare, and the sincerest parental attachment. Dr. Bulkeley had indeed stated, that he had advised his children, "to follow and to debauch every woman they met with." But that was an assertion to which it was next to impossible that any credit could be given, for at the time the language was represented to have been used, the eldest child was only nine years of age. He thus dismissed Dr. Bulkeley's affidavit, and with it he thought the charge of perjury, which, to say the least of it, had been so hastily made against Mr. Wellesley. There were points, he admitted, in Mr. Wellesley's conduct which he (Mr. Heald) did not mean to defend; but he had yet to learn, that if a man in fashionable life gave way to some of the many temptations which assailed him, that was a ground upon which the Court would deprive him of the custody of his children. Whatever might have been his faults, the morals of those children had never been prejudiced by them; and even when his wife, from circumstances, was compelled, as it were, to drag herself from him, under the advice of Lord and Lady Maryborough, even then, while he expressed his shame at the passion which enchained him, he evinced the strongest love for his children, and hoping that time would enable him to conquer the lamentable influence of a fascinating woman, he entreated that their education might receive the utmost attention. And further, so highly did Mrs. Wellesley think of his intentions, that she received from him a written statement of the plan upon which they were to be brought up. That same care he had evinced for them from their childhood, and in order to impress on their minds, as soon as possible, the difference between right and wrong, he had a book, that he termed, "Doomsday Book," in which he entered all their actions from the earliest period, rewarding or reprimanding as might be required. There was one more, and but one more affidavit to which he wished to call the attention of the Court, and that was one made by an apothecary, or a doctor, as he called himself. If that person could be believed to have deposed truly, then again would there be some case against Mr. Wellesley, for he stated that Mr. Wellesley had declared to him, "that it was his determination to bring his children up in such a manner that they should become perfect blackguards." It happened, however, for the purposes of truth, that Mr. Wellesley was under the advice of that doctor for an inflammation in his eyes, and being unable to write himself he dictated to him two of those very letters to his children, which had been so much and so justly commended for their moral sentiments and the excellent advice they gave. Another word on the doctor's affidavit could not be necessary. It was altogether monstrous to imagine that Mr. Wellesley would in one breath seriously tell a man that he intended to make scoundrels of his children, and in the next dictate to the very same individual a letter to those children which would powerfully tend to make them value virtue and to detest all kinds of vice. The court had, most properly, withheld from the bar all knowledge as to the view which it took of the case, and therefore all that counsel could do was to use their best discretion, and to direct their remarks to such points as seemed to them essential. This his Learned Friends who had preceded him had done so fully, that he, a third counsel, felt it unnecessary to offer any further remarks, and should conclude by expressing his firm conviction, that the court, instead of depriving Mr. Wellesley of his natural and common law rights, the guardianship of his children, would restore them to him with perfect confidence and without restriction.

Mr. Beames rose. He also appeared as Counsel for Mr. Wellesley, and he felt the difficulties of his situation not a little increased by the consideration that that was the fifth day which had been devoted to the arguing of the case, and that he was the eighth Counsel who had addressed the Court. The great importance, however, of the case, both to the public and to particular individuals, to the infants, those who acted for them, and, above all, to his client, convinced him that he should greatly neglect his duty if he did not offer some observations to the Court. The learned gentleman then fully stated to the Court the progress of the case from the very outset up to the present time; and proceeded to comment at great length on the arguments which had been adduced against Mr. Wellesley's right to have the custody of his children. He apprehended that it was not at all necessary for him, as Coulsel to Mr. Wellesley, to establish a case in his favour; all that he had to do was, to show that there was no case against him; that no sufficient grounds had been set forth to deprive him of a natural right confirmed by the law of the land. Mr. Wellesley stood upon his common law right, and therefore if his opponents failed in shewing that he had done something which ought to suspend that right, their case was gone. He maintained that the Attorney-General, although he had charged Mr. Wellesley with committing perjury for the purpose of deceiving the Court, had offered no proof in support of his assertion, unless ingenious argument could be called proof. When Mr. Shadwell stated that the Court had decided that drunkenness was a sufficient ground for depriving a father of the custody of his children, and would thence infer that adultery was also, he took leave to differ from his learned friend, and to declare that no such decision of the Court was to be found in print. He also denied the soundness of Mr. Shadwell's argument, when he attributed perjury to Mr. Wellesley, in consequence of an error in a date in one of his affidavits, and solemnly declared that if he (Mr. Beames) could have been induced to have believed that Mr. Wellesley would have perjured himself in order to deceive the Court, so that he might have his children restored to him, he would not have held the brief he then did. While arguing on the affection which Mr. Wellesley had ever shown for his children, the learned gentleman stated, as an instance of his solicitude for their welfare, that he had desired they might reside at the family seat, Draycot House, in consequence of its healthy situation.

The Lord Chancellor asked whether the house belonged to Mr. Wellesley or to his son.

Mr. Wellesley—To my son.

The Lord Chancellor afterwards called the attention of the learned gentleman to two letters, which had been written by Mrs. Wellesley. The one was dated June 4, 1825; and the other July 3, 1825. They were written after Mrs. Wellesley had received Mr. Wellesley's instructions respecting the education of his children; and the latter one in particular was important, for in it there was a statement to Col. Shawe, respecting the violence of Mr. Wellesley's conduct to the children.

Mr. Beames would endeavour to satisfy his Lordship on that point, after he had offered such remarks on Mr. Wellesley's letters as appeared necessary. He then proceeded to combat the arguments which had been adduced by the opposite side, and contended that the letters were most honourable in many respects to Mr. Wellesley. He maintained that the charge of perjury which had been brought against Mr. Wellesley in consequence of his last affidavit was altogether unfounded, and was arguing that Mr. Wellesley had not seen Mrs. Bligh between the end of November and the end of February, when—

The Lord Chancellor remarked, there could be no doubt Mr. Wellesley had not actually seen Mrs. Bligh from the 14th of November to the end of March; but whether he had corresponded with her or not—whether he had received letters through the post office, directed to L. P. W.—was another question.

Mr. Beames then proceeded to contend against the argument adduced by Mr. Pepys, and observed that Mr. Wellesley had been treated with great harshness respecting two letters which contained one or two expressions which certainly could not be justified.

Some discussion here took place on the production of the original letters, when—

Mr. Hart said, that as they were the property of his client, he should request that they would be returned to him.

The Attorney-General said he should object.

Mr. Wellesley said that as the letters were his property, he wished to have the whole of them returned to him; and he requested his Lordship to call for the production of all his original letters, so that he might have them.

The Lord Chancellor said he could make no such order.

The Attorney-General said he was desirous that the Court should peruse the whole of the originals; he thought it had done so, and was ready to hand them up.

Mr. Hart said he should argue the question at the proper time.

Mr. Beames then proceeded to contend that the letters were written for no other purpose than that of benefitting his children, when he was interrupted by the rising of the Court.

In reply to a question from Mr. Beames, the Lord Chancellor said he had no objection to the argument being resumed to-morrow.

The Court was crowded, and Mr Wellesley was again present during the whole of the day.

THURSDAY, Jan. 25.

Mr. Beames resumed his argument in this case, which principally went to shew that the dying request of Mrs. Wellesley, that the children should not be given up to their father, on which such stress had been laid by the opposite Counsel, could not influence his Lordship in his decision. Mr. Pepys had laid great stress upon the noble fortune which Mrs. Wellesley brought her husband—that was not material in the present inquiry, nor would it weigh a feather with his Lordship.

The Lord Chancellor said it had been stated that Mrs. Wellesley had brought her husband a fortune of between 35,000*l.* and 40,000*l.* a-year, and that subsequently 100,000*l.* had been raised on mortgage.

Mr. Wellesley immediately rose, and begged permission to give a short outline of his pecuniary affairs; he wished for no disguise, and he could do it without committing any breach of confidence. If there was any one act of his life on which he prided himself more than another, it was his conduct in pecuniary matters; and he would pledge his honour, that, if he were allowed to lay them before his Lordship in private, he should command his Lordship's respect. He wished to explain to his Lordship every thing connected with his embarassments. Mrs. Wellesley's property came to him under very peculiar circumstances. A portion of the property, now his son's, was subject to considerable charges, and incumbered with a debt which he had paid off. When the amount of the annual charges on the property was considered, it would be found that his income was far less than had been commonly supposed. He did not mean to say that he had not been guilty of imprudences; but when he found that he had so committed himself, he had adopted a principle, and laid down a line of conduct, the object of which was to preserve his property intact to his heir. He was willing to lay the whole of his accounts before his Lordship in private, and his honour should be pledged to the truth of them.

The Lord Chancellor wished to know what were the present circumstances of Mr. Wellesley, and whether the arrangements with his creditors were of a temporary nature or not, as he might again be compelled to leave the country, and he (his Lordship) would not suffer a child, who was a ward of that Court to be taken out of the kingdom. A discussion then took place as to the production of certain letters between Lord Maryborough and Mr. Wellesley, the latter objecting to their production if made public; but his Lordship said he could not accede to that production; he was bound to act as a Judge.

About the year 1810, his Royal Highness the late Duke of York, whilst reviewing, in company with his present Majesty, the troops of the eastern district, on Lexden heath, near Colchester, then commanded by the Earl of Chatham, an old soldier was observed by his Majesty, mounted on an old hack, who requested to be informed who he was. The Commander-in-Chief replied, "Why, it is old Andrews, the oldest soldier in the service, having served in the reigns of George the First, Second, and Third, and now on half-pay." An Aid-de-Camp was then immediately despatched for the old veteran's attendance, which was of course complied with, and a long and pleasing conversation ensued, of which the following forms part:—"How old are you, Andrews, and how long have you been in the service?" says the late lamented Duke. "Why, your Royal Highness, I am now ninety years old, and have been in the service about seventy years." But his Royal Highness, seeing he was dressed in an old suit of regimentals, asked how long he had had them? "Why, your Highness, about forty years;" at which his Royal Highness took up the skirt of his coat for the purpose of feeling its texture, and remarked that such cloth was not made now-a-days. "No," replied the old veteran, "nor such men either." The reply so pleased his Royal Highness and his Majesty, that the old veteran was placed from that day on full pay, making the remainder of his days comfortable. He died at the advanced age of 97, and was buried in the churchyard of St. Mary's, Colchester.

We are happy to have it in our power to state, that a petition for a revision of the game laws was signed by some of the magistrates attending our late sessions, and still lies at the office of the clerk of the peace for the signature of such others as may be inclined to give it their sanction. The object of the petition is to represent to Parliament the lamentable and increasing evils resulting from the violation of those laws, as peculiarly affecting the morals of the labouring classes; to point out the fact, that although the sale of game is prohibited, the demands of a large and wealthy class of the community create a market for it which can at present only be supplied by fraud and depredation; and the individual thus tempted to an infraction of the law, is led by degrees to the commission of the most atrocious crimes; and without expressing any opinion as to the general policy of the game laws, to solicit such modification of them as may render the execution of them less imperfect, and their operation more beneficial than at present. —Bury Gazette.

On Thursday morning last, at Barnstable, the tide, after having ebbed, and left the shipping in the port all aground for half an hour, suddenly returned and floated them. A tremendous gale of wind came on at high water, to which the sailors attribute the phenomenon.—Alfred.

On the afternoon of Wednesday, the 17th inst. the almost naked body of a female was discovered by two boys, while passing along the beach of the Solway Frith, a little to the westward of Balcarry Bay. The sight of such an object in such a place, made a deep impression on the minds of the boys, and they immediately made all the haste they could to alarm some labourers who were working near. The labourers followed their conductors in silence, and rather unceremoniously dug a hole, and interred the corpse, at a short distance from the spot where it was found. A proceeding so informal, made some noise in the district where it occurred, and Colonel Gordon, of Culvenan, so soon as he became acquainted with the circumstance, humanely provided a coffin, a shroud, and every other necessary; and after the body had been disinterred, it was finally deposited in Berwick church-yard, with every degree of decency and solemnity. From the state of the corpse, it was evident that it had been long in the water; its appearance was that of a perfect skeleton; a shirt, a pair of stays, one stocking, and one shoe, were all that remained of the original clothing, and these articles have been retained by the sexton of Berwick, as the only means existing of identifying the deceased, should her relations ever learn, and take the trouble of inquiring into her unhappy fate. We should add, that the body was so far mutilated, that one of the feet had entirely disappeared, and that an opinion is entertained by some that the deceased could be no other than the female who perished along with the sailor, who endeavoured to save her during the melancholy shipwreck of the Ranger, in November last.—Dumfries Courier.

An Agricultural Association has been formed for Tunbridge Wells, and has resolved to petition Parliament against a free trade in corn. The Agricultural Association for the Rape of Hastings has also agreed to send a similar petition to Parliament.

The immense flocks of wood-pigeons which, since the commencement of the severe weather, are to to be seen near Chichester, are truly surprising, from 1500 to 2000 having been congregated in one field of twelve acres. Sir H. Featherstonhaugh's keeper, at Up Park, killed 60 couples of these birds in one day, which are retailed at 6d. a piece, and are in good condition, from the abundance of their favourite food, the beach-mast.

THE AGE.

LONDON, JANUARY 28.

It appears, by the latest accounts from Lisbon, that the Constitution of Don PEDRO is not so enthusiastically upheld, as we have been led in England to imagine. It is stated, that the pride of Portugal has taken umbrage at Don PEDRO's self-alienation from his European realm; and his appointment of a Regency, to the exclusion of Don MIGUEL, is regarded, by the Portuguese, as a virtual infraction of their liberties. The progress of the traitor CHAVES has been rapid; and, but for the arrival of General CLINTON's army, little doubt is entertained that the insurgent force would, at this instant, have occupied and given law to Lisbon. The movements of the MARQUESS have undeniably been conducted with celerity and skill; and he has had the address to attach considerable popularity to his enterprise, in the provinces which he has traversed either in advance or in retreat. Unauthenticated rumours prevail of a dissention between the REGENT and her Council, occasioned by her ROYAL HIGHNESSES's appointment of Lord BERESFORD to the Command in Chief of the Portuguese operating army. Peculiar energy appears to have been indispensable to rouse the feelings of the soldiery; and if the principle of emulation were wanting, we cannot too emphatically commend the sagacity of her ROYAL HIGHNESS, in having selected that gallant and experienced Nobleman to inspire the drooping spirits of her countrymen. It is also rumoured that the Government of Portugal had demanded, as a pledge of the neutrality of Spain, the restoration of the fortress of Olivenza, which for some time past has been in the possession of the Monkish arms. It is said the Apostolic faction will reject this reasonable requisition. The coldness of the populace of Lisbon is stated, with apparent exultation, by those who are opposed to our faithful interference in behalf of our ally. That such an inglorious spirit of inertion may exist among the indolent and worthless dregs of a metropolitan population, is by no means incredible or discouraging. The animated exertions of the British Ministry were designed for worthier purposes than the mere propitiation of an unenlightened mob, and the excitation of clamorous festivity among the poor and sluggish refuse of the capital. We confidently trust the object of our interposition will be steadily pursued, and that such ungracious apathy, in so miserable a class of beings, will in nowise damp the ardour of an undertaking, by which the liberty of one nation is to be secured and the perfidious despotism of another is to be annihilated. We trust that the leaven of affected clemency, which would emasculate the energy of the REGENT's Government, will fail in its design, and that a prompt and salutary penalty will be invariably attendant on the capture of those flagitious instruments of external mischief, who have conspired, at the instance of foreign bigots, to subvert the institutions of domestic liberty in Portugal. The unqualified pardon of such abandoned traitors would, in the present crisis of Peninsular distraction, amount to nothing short of sanction to succeeding insurrection. No one extenuating circumstance can be adduced by CHAVES, SILVEIRA, or their coadjutors, in mitigation of their infamous defection from the cause, and welfare of their country. Let it be seen by those misguided agents of the Spanish tyrant, that he will yield them without an effort for their salvation; and the dependents on that Royal wretch's false professions will learn the preferable course of an adherence to patriotism and liberty.

Of the fitness of Lord BERESFORD for his important duties, we can give no more striking evidence than that contained in the Times of yesterday:—

> It is not denied, that Lord Beresford possesses good sense, and clear judgment, and that he is a person of undoubted fidelity to his cause, of unshaken courage, a thorough master of the principles on which an army ought to be framed and organized, one who actually made the Portuguese army, for the size of it, one of the very best in Europe. He will be prompt, vigorous, and effective in all his undertakings, and will attach to the system of which he assumes the direction, that spirit and energy which are especially requisite for quelling a rebellion which has made such rapid and alarming strides.
> [illegible] Lord Beresford have the good fortune to overpower the [illegible] opposition of national disgust at his unlooked-for appointment, [illegible] Government of the Regent will probably have cause to be [illegible] with its choice.

The Lord Chief Justice BUSHE was asked, the other day, in Dublin, the reason "why every person sneezed at SHIEL in the manner they did?"—and replied, "because there is so much of the Irish blackguard in him!"

The Gazette of this week has afforded another striking instance of the wisdom of the British Cabinet, and the unlimited confidence reposed by His MAJESTY in the talents and virtues of his Grace the Duke of WELLINGTON—both have united, and the universal voice of approbation has sanctioned, the appointment of the Noble DUKE to the command of the military forces of these realms—an office of such trust and responsibility the deliverer of Europe from French tyranny, is justly entitled to hold—he crushed the monster of imperial power with his mighty arm, and rescued the Continent of Europe from the galling yoke of tyranny—to him is the nation indebted for the tranquillity with which our Gracious MONARCH now sits on his throne; and the people, for the full enjoyment of all the blessings of peace, under a just and enlightened Constitution—And yet this is the individual denounced by the brawling advocate of the Catholic Association, as a "traitor to his country;" to be sure it is accompanied with the Jesuitical qualification of having been spoken metaphorically; but even this paltry subterfuge will not do: and we must pronounce the man who has had the audacity to stigmatize the hero by whose glorious victories the peace of nations has been accomplished, a traitor to his country—even with the salvo of a metaphor, to be himself a traitor and an enemy to good order and government. This defiant and intemperate demagogue has wantonly flung the torch of discord amongst his own countrymen, by torturing ideal grievances into actual sufferings; and, not satisfied with this, he endeavours to complete his title to vulgar approbation by his futile attempt to calumniate the hero of Waterloo—vain and impotent are his efforts—and fully do they manifest the foul and dangerous spirit of insubordination that lurks in every political act of the Catholic orator and the Catholic Association. We earnestly hope the Noble and distinguished Personage who now holds the office of Commander of his MAJESTY'S forces, will continue to direct his wise and prudent efforts for the suppression of those domestic evils which have threatened the peace of the sister country, and thereby give a striking proof that the tranquillity of his native soil is an object of not less ambition than the abolition of French tyranny and usurpation was in the continent of of Europe.

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

When out of the Court Mr. WELLESLEY POLE banged,
And the mob began treating him rather too rough;
One half of them said, that he "ought to be hanged,"
And the rest, that he'd been quite dependent enough!

We are far from advocating any measure of inadequate severity, which may hereafter be adduced, upon the score of precedent, to justify the interfence of the Chancery in the exercise of the parental functions. We are altogether indisposed to an anticipation of the fiat, which Lord ELDON will pronounce upon a matter so profoundly and extensively considered, as the case before him, in which the Honourable WILLIAM WELLESLEY LONG has borne, and must continue still to bear, so unamiable and conspicuous a part. It is probable the judgment of the CHANCELLOR will be delivered ere the expiration of the week approaching; and we therefore prefer exerting a respectful patience of the usual juridicial proceedings, to the obtrusion of our opinion on a point, which will, doubtless, be decided with thorough knowledge and impartiality. We are not behind our contemporaries in our detestation of that abominable spirit of gloomy cant and formidable prejudice, by which the noblest purposes of life are artfully and infamously defamed into transgressions of spurious religion, and fanatical morality. On the contrary, our voice has been invariably raised against the torrent of overwhelming ignorance, hypocrisy, and superstition, of pseudo Saints and hirelings. We execrate their sanctimonious mummery, their affectation of forbearance, self-denial, and insensibility to this world's goods; and equally regret and spurn the spell, which they impose with deeper cunning upon kindred ignorance, in their spiritual debaucheries of manly piety and truth. We should much deplore the fate of Mr. WELLESLEY'S children, if their education were confided to instructors, of what is termed the "the Evangelical persuasion;" but it does not follow, as a matter of directly consequent inversion, that we look on immorality and irreligion as the constituent qualities of a desirable tuition. It is our opinion that no one office of paternity demands more serious deliberation than that, by which the plastic character of youth is submitted to the hand of early discipline; and we maintain, that no mind that is corrupted by the indulgence of indelicacy, by frequency of error, and familiarity with coarse transgressions, can possibly make such a disposition for the education of youth, as will insure it the inculcation of breeding, good morals, and religion. We believe there is that, in the more weighty offences against rectitude, so revolting to the native purity of youth, that neither precept or example would effectually inspire it with the love of grave and odious vices; for the very faculty of virtuous instinct guarantees the triumph of humane propensities. But in the minor errors which beset our being, how alluring is example! how fatally impressive, when those errors are exemplified in union with ability, authority, with personal advantages, or pre-eminent station in society! Now, to advert to as little as possible of that distressful history, which Mr. WELLESLEY'S case has set before the public eye, with what effect must his didactic admonitions to his children be attended, when every syllable he utters, on the more material points of moral conduct, which should sweeten the domestic, and protect and honour social life, must be a damnatory commentary on some flagrant outrage of his own. How will these successors to a princely heritage have learned to shun the broad, seductive paths of vicious notoriety and criminal indulgence, at the dictation of a father, when their own domestic circumstance incessantly reminds them, that all eviction of modesty and virtue is confined to the delivery of doctrine, while the triumph of unholy passions is blazoned to the world at large, in defiance of the decent obligations of existence. Mr. WELLESLEY'S children will have ample means of giving an effect to every institutionary feeling, which their education may confirm in them: not domestically, and as private individuals only: we can pretty well premise the situation and the weight of character, which persons so allied are destined to assert on their attainment of an age, which opens to the great the exercise of powers and duties, that affect the welfare or misfortune of mankind. In this point of view it is therefore of importance to the public, that youths so fortunately circumstanced in possibility, should be rendered efficient and voluntary instruments of good, by the judicious appointment of a virtuous, vigilant, and discriminating tutelage. It is remarkable that there are hardly at this moment in the kingdom, any children, in whom the public have so anxious a prospective interest.

Much has been said of the talent and good sense employed in some of Mr. WELLESLEY'S later letters to his children. These very observations seem to strengthen our remarks, regarding the effect of such indisputable qualities, when coupled with an evident obliquity of predilection for wanton habits of debauch and blasphemous vulgarity. We find no fault with Mr. WELLESLEY'S preference for fox-hunting; but he surely might have found a better term of exhortation to his son to ride with bravery and style, than that of pointing out to his ambitious rivalry the illustrative velocity of "Hell and Tommy." Mr. WELLESLEY'S classical remembrance might have drawn on the abundant stores of FALISCUS or NEMESIAN; and might have forcibly imparted to them his meaning of a fall, without recurring to the naked mention of that substantial portion of our clay, which Mrs. COUTTS had once the memorable sorrow to incide. We confess that Mr. WELLESLEY'S nonchalance in putting upon paper such indecencies in his epistles to "his son," have led us to infer that more considerable latitude of speech prevails between himself and the future Pickle, whom he designates as "Mr. JEMPS," than is consistent with the deference that should impress so young a son in his communion with a father. In short, we cannot possibly advert to any portion of the sad disclosures of the WELLESLEY case, without regretting that such reiterated, such incontestible instances of relaxed propriety appear, as justify, at least, our doubt of Mr. WELLESLEY'S fitness for that responsible and weighty duty—the tuition of his motherless and interesting children.

If there is a man in existence, of whom we entertain in one point of view, a more depicable opinion, than we do of another, O'CONNELL is that man; and a stronger instance could not possibly be adduced of the fact, than his recent conduct with Mr. SHEEHAN, one of the proprietors of the Dublin Evening Mail. Every one is of course well aware of O'CONNELL'S having "shot his man," as it is called in Ireland: and on the account he has publicly avowed his determination never again to give a meeting to another—a principle that cannot be too highly extolled, if it were maintained with all the dignity belonging to such a proper resolution.

But the very reverse of all this is the case—he comes to the establishment of a point, which he would have you believe is a nicety of honour, while the conduct he pursues in consequence, is a violation of honour's noblest attributes. Having framed his mind to this bearing, O'CONNELL should assume the demeanour of a peaceful man, at least; however his real sentiments might militate against such assumption; and he should maintain a "meekness of spirit" befitting the judicious resolution he had formed, as the result of the most unfortunate occurrences in any man's life. Instead of this, there is no degree of blackguardism, no approbrium of epithet, no coarseness of language, which he does not adopt to answer his purpose—and where any position is to be carried, the man cares not against whom his personality is directed, well knowing that he stands exempt from the chance of chastisement. Such conduct marks the veriest poltroon in existence, and we are free to say, that he is the veriest. A man of this description should be insulted on every possible pretext: and it is with this persuasion, that we congratulate Mr. SHEEHAN on his manly correction of such a sneaking creature. Mr. SHEEHAN, (we are told) is, as the old song says,

"——— without his shoes,
"Scarcely three feet seven:
While O'CONNELL,
"——— to all men's views,
"Is full five feet eleven!

And yet O'CONNELL coolly suffers himself to be struck, and swears against the striker the peace, which he himself, by the most abusive language, had broken. He is a wretched coward, and well fitted to direct the CAUSE he has elected himself to lead.

When ROGER KEATING heard of the transaction, he expressed his great horror at Mr. SHEEHAN'S horse-whipping O'CONNELL with an UMBRELLA—and, all things considered, it really was shocking!

ZOOLOGY.

Our readers are probably aware that it has been some time in contemplation to apportion a certain part of the Regent's Park, for the purpose of forming a menageric, on the principle of the Jardin des Plantes at Paris. This is a measure, for the completion of which we give our hearty good wishes, as a much more desirable object could not be thrown into the present scale of general improvement. In the first place, by the removal of Exeter 'Change, that inconvenient and intrusive part of the Strand will be extended to the width on the eastern side of it, by which the comfort of the passenger, and the observation of the spectator, will be equally gratified—and in the next place, the apprehension, which must at all times be entertained, by living or passing near a forest of wild beasts—will naturally subside. An establishment, for the collection of birds and beasts, is essential in every country, both to assist the zoological student, and to satisfy the common curiosity of mankind; and it must be obvious, that the very centre of the most crowded thoroughfare in the world, is not exactly the place for such an exhibition—and then, the collection at the Tower, even if people could be found sufficiently patient and inquisitive to go so so far to see it, is but a very limited one—consequently, a fitter place than the proposed one could not be selected in the whole kingdom for such purpose.

It has been imagined, particularly at the western part of the metropolis, that the mass of building now going on in St. James's-street, at the charge of the black-leg CROCKFORD, was erecting for this purpose—but that is a mistake, which has no doubt arisen from the fact of its being undertaken for the purpose of exhibiting many equally extraordinary beasts, now at large upon town, whose wildness, singular propensities, natures, tricks, and general attributes, are matters of almost as much amusement, as those of their savage archetypes. With a view of proving the accuracy of this remark, and at the same time of giving what information on the subject we have been enabled to gather, we submit to the examination of our readers a few particulars respecting the inmates of the projected establishment in the Regent's Park; on perusing which, they will be immediately convinced of the strength of our previous argument. The extensive enclosure, set aside for the immediate exhibition of "the savages of creation," will contain numerous deep dens for the separate reception, in most instances, of each creature, and among the rest, we hear, the following will be shown—a part of which (particularised by us in one of our early numbers) will be removed from St. James's-street, by permission of the present proprietor, RAGGETT, where they have for several years been the occasional amusement and derision of the whole town:—

A COLOSSAL MALE ELEPHANT,
Five tons weight, unquestionably the largest animal ever seen in Europe, whose daily consumption of food is sufficient for EIGHT horses. It is, without hyperbole, a MOVING MOUNTAIN; and may be said to reduce those hitherto shewn to absolute pigmies. Its sagacity almost exceeds belief; it lies down at command, in the form it receives its burden, and in the way it takes repose; bolts and unbolts its door, takes up the smallest article and disposes of it as ordered; and various other feats, to the admiration of the spectator,
The property of Lord Nugent.

A large Sea CALF, brought to England by Lord Harborough.

A huge BONASSUS, from Bombay, presented by Lord Arthur Hill.

A pair of Horned OWLS, presented by Sir J. Astley and Sir W. Abdy. (The breed of the one presented by the worthy Baronet is, we regret to say, entirely lost.)

Two POLECATS, one from Boston, sent by Messrs. Irby and Petre.

A REMARKABLY FINE
ROYAL BENGAL TIGRESS,
(formerly the property of Sir Henry Wellesley,) in the same Den with
A NOBLE BRITISH LION!
(The property of the Marquis of Anglesea.)

A great Goose (very tame) from the Silly Islands, given to the Proprietor, by J. Hayne, Esq.

ZEBRA, or Ethiopian JACK-ASS (formerly in the possession of Lord Clanmorris) beautifully striped on the neck and shoulders, the gift of CAPTAIN Wallace.

ARDEA DUBIA, or BENGAL ADJUTANT,
Called, from its astonishing gorge, the Gigantic Crane!—Some idea may be formed of its amazing voracity, from the circumstance of its swallowing TWO LARGE FOWLS at a meal! (exhibited by express permission of Sir GEORGE WARRENDER.)

A surprising Camel, bred in Anglesea (being the only one ever produced in this country) where it was caught by the Duke of ARGYLE.

A large OURANG-OUTANG, the property of T. Hope, Esq. (A beautiful likeness of this extraordinary beast was painted by a French Artist, and exhibited in Pall-mall some years since.)

A Coati Mondi, or Ant-Eater—by Mr. George Wombwell. (N.B. No relation to Mr. Wombwell, the Exhibitor.)

A Wild Cat from *Bang*alore, given by Lady Barrymore.

A remarkable POODLE—once the property of the late King of the Sandwich Islands—now in possession of Mr. Byng. (N.B. This animal has entirely recovered from the mange,—and may be viewed without any fear of contagion.)

A wonderful Monkey, mentioned by BUFFON—own brother to JACKO-MAKACKO—called DAN. MACKINNO—(the extraordinary feats of this Monkey must be seen to be credited.)

A Variety of Monkeys and Apes by Lords Chesterfield and Valletort, whose antics and gambols afford the highest amusement.

A very large Grey RAT—presented by Lord Normanby.

A Polar BEAR—shewn by permission of Mr. G. L. Fox.

Singular Cuckoo—sent by the Duchess of Bedford.

The largest HAWK, of the female species, ever seen—presented by Mrs. CORRI.

A great Badger—given by Mr. Peter Moore.

A beautiful specimen of the Roe-buck—the property of Lord SUSSEX LENNOX.

Guinea Fowls—presented by the Chorus singers of the King's Theatre.

A Bull—given by Mr. R. KEATING.

Cows—sent by Lord W. LENNOX.

A singular Ass—belonging to Mr. AULDJO.

A pair of Calves—belonging to Colonel CAMAC.

In a portion of the grounds will be cut a reservoir, for the reception of every species of fish that can be brought alive to the place; among which, curious specimens of the following ones will be sent by the parties whose names are affixed thereto:—

Smelt - - -	by Mr. PETRE.
Pikes - - -	Lord BINGHAM.
Jack - - -	Mrs. BLIGH.
Flat-fish - -	Sir V. COTTON.
Lobsters - -	JOHN LYSTER.
Sprats - - -	Lord TANKERVILLE and G. WOMBWELL.

with many others, "too numerous to mention."

REFORMATION IN IRELAND.

From the accounts we have received since our last publication, and we rely on information of an authentic nature, it is as plain as demonstration, what has long been the impression on every serious and reflecting mind, that the great mass of the Roman Catholic population wanted but a fit occasion to shake off the insufferable burden of Popery under which they had been so long pressed to the earth: that they wanted but the example of a few enlightened converts to Christianity, courageous enough to adopt the truth, and openly to profess it, in defiance of the denunciations of the priesthood, to enable them to exercise the liberty of adoring their great CREATOR according to the principles of the true Christian faith—that they wanted but the countenance, encouragement, and protection of the Protestant Gentry, to come fearlessly forward, and make an avowal of that faith, which the apprehension of excommunication and the persecution of the Priests have compelled them to hold in silence—that important event has at length arrived—that example has been set—that countenance and friendship, though but partially extended, will, we are convinced, under the fostering hand of DIVINE PROVIDENCE, become general—at its presence will vanish that murky and degrading superstition which has so long veiled the face of the country—and benighted the ignorant and infatuated classes of the Roman Catholic laity—that country, whose history hitherto furnished a narrative of crime and outrage, of nocturnal massacre and noon-day violence, of ignorance, with all its train of brutallized consequences, has now exalted itself in the scale of national eminence. We hail the moment, when the dominion of priestcraft, which for a period of seven hundred years has held in subjection the people of Ireland, will be uprooted, and every fibre belonging to it completely eradicated—then, and not till then, will the great mass of the Irish Roman Catholics be taught the important value of true Christianity; the gross and abominable errors of that church they had renounced will then be more evident, and the inestimable blessings of the best and wisest constitution in Europe, the British Constitution, will be more fully appreciated—that we should anxiously look forward to an era of such political magnitude and national importance is not to be wondered at, when we reflect on the innumerable obstacles it must encounter from the moral frame and constitution of the Roman Catholic priesthood—and though we strongly deprecate the idea of a comparison between the merits of the Reformed Church, and the ignorant and superstitious Church of Rome (if only for the sake of argument), it must be resorted to.

Every member of the Irish popish priesthood is supposed, by a vulgarity of conception, to be spiritually invited, or "CALLED," to put on the garb of his professional duties, for the sole and pious purpose of promulgating GOD'S holy will and ordinances, and the salvation of the soul of his fellow creatures—a more erroneous notion never existed—false in theory and falsified by practice. When a candidate for the priesthood once announces his spiritual calling, which is immediately followed by his emancipation from all manual labour and domestic drudgery, (as he is invariably the son of some petty farmer, village shopkeeper, or perhaps insolvent artisan) he is sent to a school to receive a preparatory education, to qualify him to become a student of that university called Maynooth College, which the left-handed liberality of the nation has founded, and continues to support by an annual grant to a considerable amount. The superintendance and direction of this juvenile seminary devolves upon certain pastors of the Romish Church: whatever boorish simplicity of manners or natural goodness of heart he might have brought into the academy, quickly vanishes, and in its place is fostered, low cunning, insidious artifice, and intolerant principles—the once, perhaps, innoxious student is soon converted into a dangerous politician, and the candidate for the sacerdotal order is prematurely corrupted by this mode of academical instruction; he is thus launched with all the advantages (if we may speak ironically) of early prejudices, and a biassed mind, from this system of perverted education, and he enters the College of Maynooth (to continue the figure) under auspices as flattering as can be well imagined. We pass over the tedious and uninteresting course of monkish education—monkish habits, and prejudices: and behold him at length fully engaged in the exercise of his clerical functions—here a vast field opens to the view, and affords a fit subject for much serious contemplation—tributary conversion being the object of the Roman Catholic priest, whilst religion and morals form that of a minister of the Reformed church, it is not to be wondered, therefore, the great work of the Reformation has been so long delayed:—the former are distinguished by low cunning, crouching sycophancy, mean origin, and insidious arts—the latter, by their liberal education, enlightened minds, strict morality, and exemplary piety. From this statement of the respective attributes of both, it is morally impossible the work of Reformation could ever have originated with the ministers of the Romish persuasion—they had a direct interest, one that in all countries has wielded a powerful sway in matters of a religious nature, to keep their flock in total ignorance of Scriptural truths—the continuance of that state was to them an income, a subsistence—the discontinuance, the loss of that income, and the means of livelihood—the Catholic priest can only subsist where the Gospel truths have not found their way—his moral food is gathered in the fields of darkness and superstition; for wherever one solitary ray of Gospel illumination has found an entrance, the errors of Popery are forced to abandon their gloomy mansions. The minds of the Catholic laity have been so completely pressed down under the weight of this pastoral despotism, that it has destroyed the very germes of Scriptural knowledge, and blocked up the avenues of religious and moral improvement, and blasted the natural fecundity of the human mind: but the time is at hand when the marshy and stagnant waters of superstition and idolatry, drained and absorbed by the cultivation of Christianity, will no longer corrupt the atmosphere with their unwholesome and noxious vapours. The mind is somewhat astounded, when it beholds the individuals who profess the Romish religion surrounded by the progressive movement of all other nations towards religious and moral improvement, so long withheld by the curb of superstition, had not dared to pass the barriers that separated them from Christian knowledge.

Surely this is lamentable—to find six millions of the human race denied the privilege which belongs to them as a portion of a Christian country, that of reading the charters of their only true salvation, is monstrous intolerance—to keep the Gospels of GOD closed against the examination of his creatures, is impious—and consequently to perpetuate the state of religious thraldom, which so long has disgraced the followers of the Romish Church, is little short of blasphemy. We have (it must be admitted) treated this subject with language which to some may appear too strong, because it is unsuited to certain palates—we cannot help this—we profess not to administer food to such vitiated appetites: our zeal and attachment to support the principles of the British Constitution will remain, as it always has been, unshaken and undiminished; and we will at all times, and in all places, never cease boldly to repeat what we have heretofore strenuously urged—that the reformation in Ireland can alone maintain the bond indissoluble between the two countries, and that whenever the Constitution of these realms ceases for a moment to be in all things Protestant, as it now is, it contributes to its own dissolution. For the present we shall leave this subject: in our next we shall give an accurate account of the influence exercised by the Pastors of the Church of Rome, at and previous to the late contested election in one of the northern counties in Ireland, which will present such a picture of base defection and ingratitude, on the part of the tenantry towards their landlord, as must satisfy every unbiassed mind of the dangerous consequences to be apprehended from such corrupt influence.

ASSAULT ON MR. O'CONNELL.

Saunders's News Letter of Monday last contained a report of a speech delivered by Mr. O'Connell at the Catholic Association on the previous Saturday, in which it was stated that that gentleman, in some remarks made upon the Evening Mail, and its proprietors, asserted that "he (Mr. O'Connell) had once said that they were all renegades: but one of the vagabonds had since published in print that he was not so," and that he concluded some observation in the same strain, by saying "So much for the Clarks (who is a clergyman), and Sheehans, such miscreants are well worthy of each other." In the absence of Mr. Thomas Sheehan, one of the proprietors of the Evening Mail, his brother, Mr. Remmy Sheehan, who has no share whatever in that establishment, but who, it would appear, was included in Mr. O'Connell's attack, resolved upon making the matter personal, if possible, with Mr. O'Connell. Aware of the difficulty attending the execution of such a project, and convinced that no language used by him (Mr. Sheehan), nor any message delivered on his behalf, would effect the purpose, he was driven to the alternative—one very repugnant to his feelings, and at direct variance with his uniform opinion upon such cases—of personally insulting Mr. O'Connell in the most public way, and in the most public place, conceiving that neither Mr. O'Connell nor his advisers would tamely submit to the indignity of a blow. Having come to this resolution the moment he read the report, which was not until late on Monday, and having ascertained that Mr. O'Connell was not at home, Mr. Sheehan walked for a considerable time from the corner of Clare-street to the corner of Nassau-street, through which streets Mr. O'Connell should pass on his way to Merrion-square. Mr. Sheehan was not attended by any one, nor did he communicate his intention to more than two persons; and he resolved not to use any weapon on the occasion other than the umbrella which he carried in his hand. At a few minutes after four o'clock, Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Sheehan met close to the door of Morisson's hotel, when Mr. Sheehan accosted him in these words:—"You traduced my brother and me where we had not an opportunity of defending ourselves,—take that—and that, you lying ruffian," striking Mr. O'Connell on the head with his umbrella. Mr. S. apprehensive of being taken by the police, and not wishing to encounter the attack of a mob, such as that which is generally in the wake of Mr. O'Connell, went into Morrisson's tavern, and through another door into Dawson-street. In three minutes after the occurrence took place, the following note, written before the rencontre, was sent to Mr. O'Connell, and that it was duly received, appeared in the sequel:— "Monday evening.

"Sir,—After what has occurred, little negotiation will suffice between you and me.

"I am gone to Armstrong's Hotel, at King's town, where your friend, when he calls, will have the goodness to inquire for Major Reed who accompanies me.

"I am, your obedient,

"D. O'Connell, Esq." "R. H. SHEEHAN.

Mr. Sheehan instantly proceeded to King's town, and had his arrangements made for crossing the Channel, or, if necessary, going to the Continent, fully impressed with the belief, as were those friends whom he subsequently consulted, that notwithstanding Mr. O'Connell's former resolution, a blow was a thing which neither he nor his friends would submit to lie under. A few minutes before 11 o'clock that night, the waiter entered the room where Mr. Sheehan and his friends were sitting, and inquired whether there was a Major Reed of the party, as there was a gentleman wished to see him. Major Reed being then absent from the room, Mr. Sheehan desired that the gentleman should be shown into a room which had been previously prepared, and went to apologize for the momentary delay, when he was taken into custody by a peace officer, who stated that Mr. O'Connell had sworn informations against him (Mr. Sheehan) for an assault, and that he had been directed there for the purpose of arresting him. Mr. Sheehan was about retiring to the room from whence he had come, but the peace-officer very respectfully told him that his orders were very peremptory not to suffer Mr. Sheehan out of his sight for a single moment; and that he must bring him off to the police-office in College-street. Another peace-officer then made his appearance, and Mr. Sheehan, although labouring under a very heavy cold, and suffering with inflamation in one of his eyes, was compelled to travel on an outside car to the police-office, where he was detained for the night, an armed sentry having been stationed in the room which he occupied. Against this absurd and mortifying proceeding he remonstrated. He stated that informations having been actually sworn against him by Mr. O'Connell, he could now have no object in avoiding the Police, as a meeting between him and that gentleman was of course out of the question. He instanced the impossibility of escape—even where he so disposed—being placed in the upper room of the house, and not being just the figure for creeping up a chimney or jumping out of a window; but all to no purpose. The sentinel on duty, said that he had received his instructions from his superior-officers, and that reliefs for the night had been appointed. Mr. Sheehan was therefore obliged to submit to the indignity.—Evening Mail.

That interesting musical exhibition, the APOLLONICON, in St. Martin's Lane, continues to attract the most fashionable and crowded audiences. The unrivalled effect of this magnificent instrument is testified by the patronage the inventors have experienced for so many years.

OLYMPIC THEATRE.—During the past week we visited this little theatre, and was much pleased with the entertainments the Manager has produced for the amusement of the public. The pantomime, entitled, Æsop's Fables, is extremely well got up: it reflects great credit on Mr. LECLERQ, the Stage Manager; and we can safely add, his efforts are crowned with complete success.

BRIGHTON, Jan. 25.—Since his Majesty's arrival, the Nobility and Gentry have left their names in the Pavillion Hall-book, and in answer to the inquiries relative to the health of the Sovereign has invariably been, "His Majesty is well."

Nine Jews who had induced two women to apostatize from the Catholic Religion in Petersburgh, have been severely punished. Those under 30 were ordered to the army in Georgia.

A CLASSICAL HORTICULTURIST.—At Sutton, near Abingdon, Berks, a board is fixed up on a small cottage at the end of the village, with the following unique announcement:—Thomas Cullum, arbor st, florist, horticulturist, propagator of culinary and esculent vegetables, indigenous and exotic trees, shrubs, and plants; budder-grafter, pruner, and trainer of standard, espalier, and mural fruit trees, and operator of every practical branch of the horticultural geoponics—N.B. Plantations laid out in the most picturesque, geometrical, and scientific principles, on the shortest notice."

A PATHETIC REJOINDER.—A celebrated literary character, in a northern metropolis, had a black servant whom he occasionally employed in beating covers for woodcocks and other game. On one occasion of intense frost, the native of Afric's sultry shores was nearly frozen to death by the cold and wet of the bushes, which sparkled (but not with fire flies), on which, pathetically blowing his fingers, he was heard to exclaim, in reply to an observation of his master, that "the woodcocks were very scarce;" "Ah, Massa, me wish woodcock never been!"

The most distressing accounts of the state of the roads in various parts of the country have been received. Owing to the great fall of snow in many places, it has attained a height of several feet, particularly on the North road. On the arrival of the Edinburgh mail Thursday morning, at the Post-office, the guard said, that below Doncaster they were obliged to have sixteen horses to get on with the mail.

THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY OF BATH PRESENTED TO THE RIGHT HON. GEORGE CANNING, AT A COMMON HALL.

[From the Bath Chronicle of Jan. 24.]

Monday, the Body Corporate unanimously resolved to present the Freedom of the City in a gold box of fifty guineas value to the Right Hon. George Canning, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, as a mark of the high sense entertained by the Corporation of his transcendant talents and eminent public services. The Bailiffs, Robert Clarke, Esq. and Sir Georg Gibbes, immediately waited on the Right Hon. Gentleman, and communicated the Resolution.

Shortly after, by his own appointment, Mr. Canning attended at the Hall, to receive the freedom. He was accompanied by the Earl of Liverpool, and the Right Hon. Sturges Bourne. A great number of ladies and gentlemen had been previously admitted into the banquetting-room, to witness the ceremony. P. George, Esq. the Town Clerk, having read the resolution, the Mayor, Eleazer Pickwick, Esq., thus addressed Mr. Canning:—

"In the name of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens, I have the honour to present you with the Freedom of the City of Bath, which has been unanimously voted to you this day, as a mark of the high sense entertained by this Corporation, of your transcendent talents and eminent public services. I feel, Sir, peculiar gratification, at being the organ of communication with you on the present occasion, and wish that you may long continue to exert those talents in our country's cause."

To which Mr. Canning replied:—

"Mr. Mayor, I receive with much satisfaction, an introduction into a society so respectable as that of gentlemen whom I have the honour to address, and the Freedom of a City with which the name of Pitt had, for two generations, been connected. I receive, with cordial thankfulness, this proof of your estimation of my public services; this adstriction is peculiarly gratifying to me, presented as it is by those who have, from their character and situation, as well as their means of information and channels of communication, an opportunity of forming an unbiassed opinion of the conduct of men in public life. This testimony of your regard is therefore most grateful to my feelings, as it evinces your approbation of my humble services; but whatever value they possess, they are derived from those of my Noble Friend—['The Earl of Liverpool, who was on the left of the Mayor.]—(Loud Cheers)—and I have to thank you, Sir, for the kind and flattering terms with which you have accompanied it."

At the same Hall, an Address of Condolence to his Majesty on the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, was unanimously adopted.

M. DE CHATEAUBRIAND'S Indian Tale, "THE NATCHEZ," which is on the eve of publication, records principally, the Adventures of an American Chief, who, being conveyed to France, was condemned by an act of cruel injustice to the galleys of Marseilles, from which, after a time, he was liberated, and presented to Louis the XIVth. by whose means, he was introduced to all the illustrious men of the age, and in short, was enabled to contemplate society in its highest point of splendour. After a few years, this warrior altered in his mind and habits, returns to his country, where, in his old age, he becomes acquainted with a Frenchman named René, who seeks an asylum from his misfortunes in the wildernesses of America. This occurrence, of which Chateaubriand has fully availed himself, produces the reverse of the former picture, and the reader who has seen the wild man in the brilliant societies of Paris, now sees the Parisian in the huts of the Indian warriors and huntsmen.

On Thursday last, Mr. Higgs, the Coroner, held an inquest in Dean-street, Soho, on the body of Elizabeth Collins, an unfortunate creature, who absolutely died from want in Meard's Court. She had been turned out of her lodging for non-payment of rent, and continued three days without tasting food. Another unfortunate girl had taken her to her lodging, and shewn some humanity towards her, but nearly every article of her apparel had been taken away. The Jury's verdict was—"Died by the Visitation of God!"

A violent storm visited this town on Saturday last, and continued until the following evening; the wind was so violent during the greater part of Sunday that many persons were deterred from venturing into the streets, from a fear of encountering some serious injury, by the falling of chimneys or slates from the houses. Considerable damage was done to the premises of several individuals in the town and neighbourhood; but by far the most serious mischief that has occurred, was the falling down of the newly built end of a factory, belonging to Mr. Kynaston, cotton-spinner, at Astley-bridge, near this town. The building was not quite finished, the windows on the western side not having been put in, the consequence of which was that the current operated on the opposite side of the building with redoubled force, and brought the whole fabric to the ground. The other part of the factory was not injured. The part blown down was six stories in height, and eight windows in length. We are sorry to say it was not insured. In other places the storm was extremely violent. At Liverpool, the river was as much agitated as the sea in a storm, and several vessels were forced from their moorings; no material damage, however, was done. At Leeds several buildings were more or less damaged or disturbed, and the lead stripped from their roofs; several large trees, engine-chimneys, and a whole stack of chimneys, supposed to have weighed nine tons, were blown down; but providentially no lives were lost, though many persons were in imminent danger.—Bolton Chronicle.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT AT THE DUKE OF YORK'S FUNERAL. On Saturday week a shocking occurrence took place at Knightsbridge. As Mrs. Ann Willis, of Philip-lane, London-wall, was on her return home from Hounslow, after viewing the funeral procession of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York, in company with her son, a youth five years old, and a female friend; on their arrival between the Half-way house and the Horse Barracks at Knightsbridge, she was suddenly knocked down by a horse running away with a gig, and so dreadfully injured her that she expired in a few minutes; her son was also thrown under the vehicle, who narrowly escaped a similar fate, and her friend was much bruised. A gentleman named Grosse, a professor of music, was returning from Kensington and saw the occurrence; he saw the horse and chaise galloping at a furious rate along the road without any persons inside, they having been previously thrown out. The horse ran with the vehicle at a rapid pace along the footpath, and forced down several persons; it then proceeded on the main road again, and in a few minutes he heard the screams of a female, and the upsetting of a chaise, which was broken in pieces. Here the horse was stopped from doing further injury. Mr. Grosse went forward to assist the unfortunate woman, she was totally insensible, groaned bitterly, and died in a few minutes. The body was speedily conveyed to St. George's Hospital. The whole of her ribs were completely beaten in, and severe injury done to the vertebræ of the neck. The poor woman has left a husband and four children to lament her death.

Last week, the widow of John Preston, a labouring man, was brought up by Mr. Mason, churchwarden of Cripplegate, on suspicion of being privy to the stealing of the body of her husband. The grounds of suspicion against her were, her having allowed a surgeon to open the body on the day her husband died, and also partially to dissect the corpse on the following day in the presence of several of his pupils, for a gratuity from the latter; her postponing the funeral from the 12th to the 16th; and, contrary to her custom, her sleeping out of the room on the night of the 15th, when it was stolen.—There appearing no evidence to impeach her, she was discharged.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The household of the late Duke of York removed on Friday from Rutland-house, in Arlington-street, to the residence of his late Royal Highness in South Audley-street.

The Field Marshal's baton, borne by his late Royal Highness the Duke of York, respecting the disposal of which the Dean and Chapter of Windsor and the executors are at issue, is, it seems (if it be one at all), no contemptible "perquisite," as, in addition to the value it may be supposed to derive in the eyes of the reverend gentlemen, from the associations connected with it, its intrinsic worth is sufficient to render it an object of cupidity. The staff itself is of silver richly gilt, with appropriate inscriptions, and the knobs which terminate it at each end are superbly set with diamonds. It is a present to its late owner from his Majesty. This is not the first occasion on which the Dean and Chapter of Windsor have been in hot water on the occasion of Royal funerals. At the time of the funeral of the late Princess Charlotte, it was reported that their conduct drew on them the displeasure of Royalty.—Globe and Traveller.

The rivers and smaller streams of Dartmoor, which are honoured with distinct appellations, amount to 53; the nameless brooks and rivulets cannot be counted; and the bridges kept in repair at the county expense, are at least 120; all within a district only 20 miles long by 10 wide, which is the computed extent of the forest and its purlieus.

ACCIDENT AT THE CANAL, ST. JAMES'S.—On Tuesday morning, as some boys were skating on the Canal in the Park, the ice gave way, and one of them unfortunately was drowned. It is much to be lamented that the police-officers are not a little more vigilant, by preventing persons from going on either of the Canals before the ice is sufficiently strong.

The rustic Lodge, for the Gatekeeper, at the northern entrance to his Majesty's Cottage in Windsor-park, was on Tuesday destroyed by fire between the hours of one and two o'clock. It is only within these few weeks past, that fire-places have been added to these little boxes, which are stationed at the different gates. They are composed of the boles of fir-trees fixed together after the Swiss fashion, and the chimney being placed at the back, and terminating with the roof, is supposed to have communicated the fire to it.

CONFLICT WITH POACHERS AT CLAUGHTON-HALL.—We regret to state, that the man whom we noticed last week was so badly wounded in the thigh, (and had undergone amputation), when assisting to take the poachers at Claughton-Hall, died on Saturday morning, in consequence of the injury he had received. A coroner's inquest has been held on the body, and a verdict of "Wilful Murder" has been brought in against William Marley, James Blizzard, Peter Spencer, Thomas Varley, John Maudsley, and John Barrow, who have been committed to Lancaster Castle to take their trials at the next assizes.—Preston Pilot.

ELOPEMENT.—A few days since, a gentleman, aged 37, a resident of Congleton, eloped on a matrimonial trip with a beautiful and accomplished girl, aged 17. In order to deceive the vigilance of the father of the young lady, the lover took his beloved in a cart to Leek, whence they set out for Manchester, and the would-be happy couple presented themselves at the church-door; when, lo! the father, who had taken the nearer road through Wilmslow, arrived at the church just in time to prevent the nuptials from being celebrated, and bring back his single daughter to Congleton.—Macclesfield Herald.

THE SERPENTINE RIVER.—The first day's exhibition was on Wednesday, when this fine sheet of water was completely frozen over. One-fourth of the surface, however, only bore the weight of the adventurous skaiter; and he only who excelled in the light and airy movements, escaped a ducking. We saw no less than three immersed in the water, in consequence of heavy falls, but they escaped after a severe struggle, by the assistance of the paraphernalia provided by the men belonging to the Royal Humane Society. The preservation of life is now almost certain by the means had recourse to; not only is there a flat-bottomed boat, running on rollers, but lines are run across the river in three several places; and where the springs rise, there are poles sunk with proper notifications. We saw few, very few, performers of eminence. Our old friend Mr. Atkinson, from St. Petersburgh, was there; and since the retirement of our men of rank, we consider him to be the best skaiter of the day. This gentleman exhibited all the most perilous figure-movements with an ease and grace quite peculiar to himself. There were in the New Road (the one just formed near the projected brige), about a dozen carriages. The best skaiters were near the bank, making their display of fine forms to the ladies. The watermen from the Thames attended, and were erecting their booths through the day. The purveyors of gin and gingerbread were in full request. The fashionable pedestrian promenade, on the south bank, from one to four o'clock, was well attended.

MANCHESTER, JAN. 22.—On Saturday last Miss Helsby, a young lady residing in Salford, 19 years of age, died in a very sudden manner. On the preceding evening she was invited to a party, at the house of a gentleman residing in Broughton, where there was a dance, in which, as she felt a little indisposed, she declined joining, but played on the pianoforte for the dancers. As it was late in the evening when the parties broke up, she slept all night in the house of the gentleman who gave it, and rose in the morning, to all appearance, in good health. She was in the act of washing her hands, when she suddenly exclaimed to a young lady who was in the bed-room with her, "I have got the cramp in one of my hands;" and after pausing a moment, added, "and in the other also." In a very few minutes she entirely lost the use of both hands and both arms. Feeling a good deal alarmed at the circumstance, she went down stairs, and had scarcely got to the bottom, when she began to feel the same sensation in her feet, and in a very short time wholly lost the use of her limbs. This torpidity then gradually extended over her whole frame, and in a few hours put an end to her existence. After death, a surgical examination was considered necessary, and took place yesterday, when it was ascertained that her decease was owing to the rupture of a blood-vessel in the spine, and a consequent effusion of blood upon the spinal cord.

The Ordnance-office, it is understood, is to be dissolved, the branch of it which concerns the sea force being transferred to the Admiralty, the military part to the office of the Commander-in-Chief.

On Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the following Commanders took leave of the Court previous to departing for their respective destinations, viz.—Captain William R. Clarence Dalrymple, Vansittart; Captain Richard Glasspoole, Buckinghamshire; and Captain David Rae Newall, Scaleby Castle, for Bengal and China.

The late Johanna Southcott has still many followers in the north of Devon. Queen Boone, alias Mary Johanna, &c. is returned from London to her residence at Staverton. One of the peculiar practices of these people is the non-observance of the Christian Sabbath, and the keeping of the Jewish Sabbath instead. A farmer near Totness, an old disciple, instead of frequenting Totness market on Saturday, the market-day, regularly attends with his basket of butter, &c. on Friday. Like most other fanatics, the members of this sect are highly intolerant, and deem all persons who do not believe their mass of absurdities, and follow their whimsical practices, to be out of the pale of salvation. Twelve of the most faithful are chosen to represent the twelve Apostles; these never shave their beards. When one of them dies, recants, or is degraded, another is immediately selected to fill his place, so that the number twelve is constantly kept up. A long beard of this class may be frequently met with in the street of Plymouth and Devonport.—Evening Paper.

THE LATE DUKE OF YORK.

OFFICIAL GENERAL ORDER.

Horse Guards, Jan. 23.

The last duties having been paid to the remains of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, the King deems it right to convey to the army a melancholy satisfaction, which his Majesty derives from the deep feeling of grief manifested by every class of the military profession, in common with his people at large, under the great calamity with which it has pleased the Almighty to afflict the nation and his Majesty—a calamity which has deprived the Crown of one of its most valuable and distinguished servants, and his Majesty of a beloved and affectionate brother.

The King does not think it necessary to dwell upon the pre-eminent merits of the late Duke of York; his Majesty knows that these are impressed and engraven on the hearts of his Majesty's soldiers. His Majesty desires that it may merely be observed, that the able administration of the command held by his Royal Highness for a long series of years, his assiduous attention to the welfare of the soldier, his unremitting exertions to inculcate the true principles of order and discipline, his discernment in bringing merit to the notice of the Crown, and the just impartiality with which he applied the honour of the service, have combined to produce results that identify the army as a profession, with the glory and prosperity of this great country, and which will cause his virtues and services to be in the grateful remembrance of the latest posterity.

The King feels that, under the present afflicting circumstances, his Majesty cannot more effectually supply the loss which the nation and the army have sustained, than by appointing to the chief command of his Majesty's forces Field Marshal his Grace the Duke of Wellington, the great and distinguished General who has so often led the armies of the nation to victory and glory, and whose high military renown is blended with the history of Europe.

By his Majesty's command,

HENRY TORRENS, Adj.-General.

GENERAL ORDER.—Horse Guards, Jan. 24, 1827.

In obedience to his Majesty's most gracious commands, Field Marshal the Duke of Wellington, assumes the Command of the Army; and earnestly requests the assistance and support of the General and other Officers of the Army, to maintain its discipline, good order, and high character.

By Command of his Grace, the Commander-in-Chief.

HENRY TORRENS, Adjutant-General.

A forgery of a dividend warrant has been committed, by which 700l. was obtained on Tuesday, at the Consol Dividend Office at the Bank. The perpetrator has not been discovered.

The Duke of York's Library is to be sold by Sotheby. It contains about forty-five thousand volumes, including, besides a number of valuable illustrated books of ancient days, nearly every publication entered at Stationers' Hall, and every Novel and Pamphlet printed in the United Kingdom during the last forty years. In the Library is a valuable and extensive collection of maps and charts.—Morning Paper.

Lady Bathurst, the sister of the late Duke of Richmond, was not forgotten by the Duke of York in his last moments. The conduct of the Duke of York, in refusing to fire when he met the Duke of Richmond, then Colonel Lennox, on the occasion of their dispute, excited the highest admiration of his Royal Highness's magnanimity in the mind of her Ladyship. A strong friendship existed between the Duke of York and Lady Bathurst from that time to the period of his Royal Highness's death. At the interview which took place between his Majesty and his Royal brother, immediately before the Duke of York's death, his Royal Highness requested that his Majesty would, in the event of the disorder proving fatal, send a lock of his Royal Highness's hair to her Ladyship, in token of his friendship and affection. On Monday last his Majesty forwarded the hair to Lady Bathurst, at the Albion Hotel, Brighton.

Receipts for "Catholic rent" have lately much fallen off in Ireland; and, according to Dr. Doyle, the Priests are getting tired of seeing their parishioners drained of money to fill the exchequer of the barristers and attorneys belonging to the "Association."

It is a curious coincidence, that both the capitals of England and France were on Saturday last set apart for mourning rites sacred to deposited Royalty—London, for the solemnization of the Duke of York's funeral; and at Paris the day was observed as a solemn festival, it being the anniversary of the execution of Louis XVI.

His Royal Highness the Duke of York has left behind him nearly three tons weight of plate, of the most valuable description. The largest portion of it is deposited in chests at Messrs. Coutts's, the bankers. Much of his Royal Highness's furniture is of a rich and costly character. In mere articles of vertu more than 120,000l. have been expended. All these things will be sold by auction during the present season.

Caution to Millers.—All millers grinding for hire are liable to a penalty of 20s. for every offence, unless they put up in some conspicuous place in their mills, and renew when necessary, in fair and legible characters, a table of the prices in money, or of the amount, of toll for which the several operations of their mills are performed. This forfeiture is imposed by 36 Geo. III. c. 85, sec. 6.—In Leicestershire, near Syston, a Magistrate has recently carried the act into effect against his own miller, by laying an information against him.

Case of Henry Dunn.—Our readers will remember the case of Henry Dunn, who was tried with Martha Smith, and found guilty of robbing his employers, Messrs. Sewell and Cross, the respectable silk-mercers, of Old Compton-steet, Soho. The unfortunate youth met with his depraved companion at the theatre, where an acquaintance commenced which has annihilated his prospects, and involved his life in jeopardy. He took a house for her in Brook-street, Lambeth. The expense of this establishment was necessarily defrayed by robbing his employers; and, at her instigation, these depredations were carried to a great extent. He frequently felt and expressed to her his compunction and determination to desist, but she threatened if he did so to impeach him, and disclose his conduct to his employers. When he was ultimately detected, she hoped to escape justice herself, by giving him up as the plunderer; but she was also prosecuted and convicted of receiving the stolen property. It is hardly to be credited, that, after poor Dunn had received sentence of death, this female should have been demoniac enough to send him a night-cap, intimating that he would soon stand in need of one, as his execution was near; but the reader will be the less surprised at this, when he is informed that she had before seduced two other young men into the same guilty courses. But she was not destined to be thus gratified. He was not ordered for execution; and there are some hopes, founded upon his previous good character, the respectability of his friends, and the evident seduction by an experienced adept in crime, that his punishment may be mitigated to one of a comparatively light nature, especially as his late employers, Messrs. Sewell and Cross, have signed a recommendation to mercy, couched in the most earnest terms, and suggesting all the alleviating circumstances, which they admit have great weight with themselves, and trust they will not be overlooked in the further consideration of his case. We may add, that his conduct in prison has been becoming his awful situation. He has attended closely to his religious preparations—and was on his knees at prayers, with Houghton and Bishop, at the critical period when the general respite was forwarded to Newgate, only a few hours before they were to have been ignominiously hurried out of existence.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY.

A Commission under a writ de Lunatico Inquirendo issued by the Lord Chancellor, was opened on Monday, at Gray's-Inn Coffee-house, before three Commissioners, viz. (Messrs. Whitmarsh, Finnemere, and Wellfit), and a Jury of freeholders in the county of Essex (Sir Peter Laurie, foreman), to inquire whether James King, Esq. of Plaistow, in Essex, be of sound mind, or a lunatic, &c.

After the Jury were sworn, and Mr. Whitmarsh had addressed them on the nature of the duty they had to perform, Mr. Scarlett rose, and said, that he had the honour of appearing to conduct the present inquiry, which was of a most melancholy nature. He would, as briefly as possible, give a history of the parties, and detail the facts, which he should prove by the witnesses who would be examined in support of the Commission. The unhappy individual, Mr. James King, was the son of the late Mr. Henry King, a grazier and farmer, in Essex and Bucks, who, during his life time, carried on an extensive business in Newgate Market as a carcass butcher, and who died in 1810, leaving a will, by which his fortune, which by economy and industry he had amassed, consisting of large estates, lands, and tenements, money, and personal effects, devolved upon his two sons. Mr. Henry King, the eldest, and Mr. James King, who was the subject of the present inquiry. Mr. Henry King was the petitioner for having his brother's affairs placed under the coatroul of the Chancellor, and before he concluded, the Jury would see the necessity of the step which he had taken. Mr. H. King had, since his father's death, carried on the business in Newgate Market, and Mr. James King had occupied himself in agricultural and farming business on the estates at Plaistow, Essex, and in Buckinghamshire, and gave up entirely all connection with the butchering business. Soon after his father's death he exhibited symptoms which, for a period, made an impression on the minds of his friends, but they were of short duration. When he first became possessed of his property, his greatest delight was in personally attending to the rearing and improving of his stock; and the first decided symptom of his malady was an alteration in his former useful habits and pursuits. His nights soon afterwards became restless, and he was overheard by the servants to talk to himself in a loud and incoherent manner. The Learned Counsel then proceeded to detail various instances of aberration of mind, which were subsequently corroborated by evidence, and stated that his health had declined, that he gradually fell away, and so alarming were his symptoms, mental as well as bodily, that it was doubted much if his health should be restored, whether his mind would ever be. In a short time his health took a favourable turn, and he ate as voraciously as he had previously done sparingly. It was then hoped that his mind would soon have been restored, but he became wild and restless, and talked without cessation for hours in an incoherent strain. He was always full of business, with nothing to do, and yet he was in perpetual motion; but the most important fact to prove, that he was labouring under mental weakness and delusion, was the surprising change in his manners, habits, and conversation. He had formerly been a kind and indulgent master to his servants, and was rarely ever known to use a bad expression; but after his illness he became violent, passionate, and blasphemous.—Before his illness he was much attached to his horses, and was particularly careful that they should be treated with humanity; but after his indisposition he treated them in the most cruel manner, without any apparent reason. He would tie them up in the stable, and beat them with a stick about the head till the servants exclaimed against his barbarity, and for their interference he threatened to shoot them. Sometimes he would express his fears that a pair of horses could not draw him up the hills about Finchley, and at other times he would drive one horse forty miles without baiting, and gallop as fast as he could up the hills. Prior to his illness he was remarkable for his careful riding or driving of his horses, and he baited them regularly; he was considered a good judge of horses, and made considerable sums by buying and selling; but afterwards he kept a great number of horses without ever using them. He visited Cheltenham and Gloucester in the autumn of 1824, and there he fell into a delusion that he was so popular with the Gloucester folks that they were going to erect a statue to him. He boasted at Cheltenham that he kept a pack of hounds at Plaistow, and that he hunted them with the Duke of Wellington and his Majesty. At Gloucester his conduct was more extraordinary—it was there that he formed a connexion of a criminal nature with an obscure woman, whom he afterwards married. This female lived in a cottage with her father; and the lunatic, after some intimacy with her, took lodgings in the Booth Hall Hotel, at Gloucester, and took her there, and slept with her for one month. One morning he went out of the inn, and proceeded to a glover's shop and purchased gloves, and immediately afterwards he married the woman. On the following day he went to the office of a proprietor of one of the Gloucester newspapers, and requested him to advertise his marriage. In the advertisement he described himself as a relative of Lord Hood's, and that the lady he had married was a daughter of Lord Smith's, and sister to a Major Smith. The editor of the Paper knowing a person named John Lord Smith, took the liberty of altering the advertisement from Lord Smith to Mr. Lord Smith, and the next day the lunatic came to his office, and expressed the strongest indignation in consequence of the alteration in the announcement of his marriage. He insisted that every Paper should be recalled, and he would pay for them; and that another edition of the Paper, with a correct announcement of his nuptials, should be published, but he was informed that it was impossible to comply with his wishes. He afterwards took it into his head to go coursing. A little girl, who opened a gate for him, he determined should be his whipper-in, and he purchased a sort of jockey dress for her, and she was publicly exhibited by him in that dress, and rode out with him; and his general conduct was so extraordinary, that on his approach with the girl in the jockey's dress, they used to exclaim, "Here comes the crazy man." He compelled one of his men to drink a quantity of the Spa water at Cheltenham, although the poor fellow declared he was quite well. His master insisted that he knew better, and the poor fellow was obliged to submit. He gave orders to be supplied with nectarines and apricots, as a dessert after his marriage dinner, and when the fruiterer told him they were out of season, he replied that he must procure them; and, if he were in London, he could buy them at any fruit shop; one of his grooms tore his smallclothes, and he compelled the man to go to bed while he mended them; the orders which he gave to his servants he forgot immediately afterwards; he kept 22 saddle horses at Gloucester, Benford, and Cheltenham, and never rode above one or two of them; he returned to town at the close of the year 1824, and all his former acquaintances were surprised at the singular alteration in the man; he was formerly well behaved, mild in his deportment and of gentlemanlike manners, but he had become violent, and was an habitual swearer; he told different persons that his brother had robbed him of many thousands of pounds, and that he should like to shoot him, and directly afterwards he would sit down and write letters to his brother, couched in the most affectionate terms. After his marriage which took place on the 6th November, 1824, he went to Essex, and saw a female with whom he fell desperately in love; he told her he regretted he had not seen her before, and was not quite certain but he would marry her if she consented. It was impossible that any man could labour under stronger delusions than those which the witnesses would prove the unfortunate object of this inquiry laboured under. He at one time fancied that he was the best physician in England, and that he was a Member of the Medical Board. He boasted that he had purchased Merino sheep for his present Majesty. His late Majesty was somewhat of a farmer, but he (Mr. S.) had never heard that his present Majesty was addicted to any such pursuits. The lunatic had stated that his wife's relatives were persons of rank and fortune, and that his father-in-law could sell timber on his estate value one hundred thousand pounds at any time. He had, before 1823, exhibited the incipient symptoms of that delusion which subsequently took so decided a form, in Newgate Market and at Finchley, and from that period insanity had, more or less, constantly prevailed. He (Mr. S.) did not mean to say that the unfortunate man could not hold a rational conversation for hours together, but whenever certain topics were touched upon, his delusion was strongly manifested. It was not to strangers that he appeared a lunatic, but to those who were acquainted with his former habits.

Mr. Scarlett then called a number of witnesses to prove the case, and among others, Dr. Burrows, who has a large establishment for the cure of insane persons. He stated, that he saw Mr. King in October last, when he found him in the care of two keepers. His chief delusion was about his horses, and their great number and value. He (Mr. K.) pretended that he had purchased horses for his Majesty. Witness saw Mr. King on the 28th of October, and on the 6th and 8th of November, and on other occasions, and he was then perfectly deranged. On one occasion he spoke of his father-in-law's having given him 50,000l. when he married his daughter. The witness saw him on the 9th of the present month, when he spoke of an immense fall of timber on his estate, to the amount of 30,000l.; he also continued to speak of his hunting with the Duke of Wellington, for whom he had purchased horses and Merino sheep; he was intimately acquainted, he said, with all or most of the Sovereigns of Europe, and particularly with the King of Spain, for whom he had purchased horses, he knew the late King well, and also his present Majesty. Being asked by witness what he would do if he were well, he answered that he would travel, and first visit Gloucester, and then the Roman Isles. Being asked where the Roman Isles were, he said he did not know; but he inquired in which of the Roman Isles God lived, for that he should much like to visit him. He insisted that his brother had robbed him of 8,000l. He further stated that his wife's brother was a Brigadier-General, and that he (Mr. K.) was particularly well acquainted with Lords Spencer, Smith, and a great number of noble families. He said that the people of Gloucester adored him, and were about to erect a statue to him. The witness saw Mr. King in 1823; he was then alternately in a high and low state. He conceived that the malady had more or less prevailed with the patient since his illness in 1823, without his having had any thoroughly lucid interval. This was perfectly consistent with his correctness as to matters of account. Mr. King used also to boast of his great skill in medicine, particularly with respect to the inferior animals, and spoke of an operation which he had performed on a sheep's head. He said that he had got 50,000l. with his wife. Dr. Burrows concluded by saying, that he was clearly of opinion that Mr. King was not in a fit state to manage himself or his property.

The most material witnesses to disprove the allegations of lunacy were Dr. F. Willis and Dr. Babington. The former, who has had Mr. King under his care for some time past, on being asked if, according to the evidence he had heard in that Commission, it was his opinion that from the year 1823 to the present time the patient had been possessed of sufficient soundness of mind to buy or sell his property, or to choose a wife? The Doctor answered, that he certainly thought he had been. Dr. Babington stated, that he had attended Mr. J. King during his illness in 1823, at Newgate Market, and had also visited him twice at Finchley. At this time he did not labour under any delusions, nor had his appearance or conduct ever been such as to induce witness to recommend the calling in of any gentleman who had made the diseases of the mind his peculiar study.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

GUILDHALL.—Forgery.—S. England, a well-dressed young man, was charged with uttering a forged cheque upon a banker for 345l. It was proved by Mr. Booth, clerk to Messrs. Hanburys, the bankers, that a cheque for 345l. dated Oct. 3, 1826, drawn in favour of Mr. William Wright, and purporting to be signed by Mr. Sewell, a hop merchant, in the Borough, and who kept an account at their house, was, on the 4th October, presented to be cashed. A 300l. note, and forty-five sovereigns were paid to the person who presented the cheque. He had no recollection of the person to whom he paid the money, nor could he swear that the signature to the cheque was not Mr. Sewell's hand-writing.

Mr. Shepherd, assistant to Mr. Hawley, jeweller, in the Strand, said, that on the evening of the 4th October, the prisoner came to Mr. Hawley's shop, and purchased a watch and appendages, which amounted to 44l. and he paid for it with sovereigns. When he pulled out his money, he observed, "I must take care of this large note." The witness inquired the amount of it, and the prisoner replied that it was a 300l. note, that it was too much to carry about at night, and that he would be glad if witness would take care of it for him until the morning. Witness consented and took his address, "William Parker, Prince's-Place, Kennington."—Next morning the prisoner called for his note, and observed, that he was going to see his father in Northumberland, and had selected a watch, chain, and seals, value about 35l., as a present to his sister, and requested the witness to deduct it from the note.—Witness asked the prisoner if he had any objection to accompany him to the Bank to get change? He answered, none, whatever, and away they went and got four 50l. notes, and one for 100l. The prisoner received the difference, after paying for his second purchase out of the 100l. note, and requested the witness to take care of the 50l. notes until he returned from the country.

Mr. Gates, the solicitor for the prosecution, said, he could bring forward other evidence to prove, that the signature to the check was not in Mr. Sewell's hand-writing. The prisoner was therefore remanded.

It is understood the prisoner was formerly in Mr. Sewell's employ as clerk. On Saturday week, the prisoner presented himself at Messrs. Hanbury's, and gave himself up as the utterer of the cheque, and he was imediately given into the custody of Mr. Cope, the City Marshal. He seemed quite calm, and mindful of the awful punishment that almost uniformly awaits such offenders.

The British Institution, for the exhibition of works of living artists opened on Wednesday, and though the collection is creditable to the character of British art, there are fewer new works of merit than have appeared on previous occasions, a great part of the present being composed of pictures which have already been exhibited at Somerset House and elsewhere.

Vintry Ward.—The result of the arduous contest for the aldermanic gown of this ward was decided on the scrutiny on Thursday. The Lord Mayor declared the number of legal votes for each candidate to be—for Mr. Wilde, 38; Mr. Sheriff Winchester, 35; and declared the former gentleman duly elected Alderman of the ward. The unsuccessful candidate declared his intetion of trying the legality of the election in a higher court.—Mr. Wilde was accompanied to his home by a band of music; and the whole of the streets of the ward were exultingly paraded by his friends.

Extraordinary Arrests.—About 120 shareholders of an independent Gas Light Company were arrested on Friday by Sheriff's officers, for an alleged debt due to the late engineer of the Company. He says that he was engaged for seven years, but was discharged at Christmas last; and he now makes a demand of between 2000l. and 3000l., for which he caused the shareholders to be arrested. Many of the shareholders remained in custody in consequence of their having refused to acknowledge the debt, while others gave bail.

The English Funds have been agitated during the week by the settling day, on which occasion eleven failures took place, five of whom were declared, and six arranged their affairs without a public exposure, the fluctuation was equal to 20 per cent. in the course of the day. Yesterday very little variation took place.

LATEST ACCOUNT FROM TURKEY.

(From the Etoile, dated Thursday, January 25)

CONSTANTINOPLE, JAN. 1.

Dec. 1. Three Jews who have been converted to Christianity by the English Clergyman, were arrested last night, in consequence of their having laid aside the costume of Rajahs, and put on the European dress.

Dec. 21.—The Sultan is engaged in forming a corps of cavalry. It consists already of 2 or 300 men, with whom he has gone through the streets adjacent to the Seraglio.

The Pacha of Bosnia has been deposed, on account of the troubles which have broken out in his Government.

The Sultan every day attends the exercise of the new troops. He holds a whip in his hand, and strikes those who appear to him to be negligent. The pages of Galata Serai, who have been taught the use of arms, are kept in the Seraglio!

Dec. 27.—Eleven Ionian subjects, who were confined in the House of Correction, have been set at liberty, at the instance of the English Legation; one of them had been there seventeen years, another eleven.

Ten thousand men were assembled at Boti 25 days ago. It is supposed that half of them have already arrived in detachments at Constantinople.

Dec. 30.—A Tartar who has come from Agrafa, in Albania, has brought news of the revolt of the Greek inhabitants of that country. He was the bearer of some heads, sent by Ismael Pacha, who is said to have commenced offensive operations against the rebels.

A plot, the object of which is unknown, has been discovered. It was formed by the Albanians, a great number of whom are employed in the public baths; several hundred persons have already been exiled on this occasion.

Dec. 31.—The Pacha of Mouch has revolted; the Porte has ordered Galeb Pacha, of Erzerum, to march against him.

The Sultan has been, to-day, to the arsenal; he has passed the day in exercising the new troops, and examining the details of their organization.

A private letter from Col. Heideck, which M. Eynard has addressed to the Nouvellist Vaudois, states, that the Greeks at the battle of Aracona defeated Muslan Bey Kiaffa, of Rumelia, who had 2,000 men under his command, and actually "sacrificed 1,300 barbarians to the manes of their countrymen who had previously fallen victims to Turkish cruelty."

Brussels Papers to the 25th inst. represent affairs in Java as in a considerably more favourable train than when the last intelligence left the island. The fears entertained for the fate of the Waterloo man-of-war, have been happily removed, by a letter from the Captain, from the anchorage of Borkum Island, where she was lying, on the 18th, dismasted, but not otherwise injured.

The English mail is due since Friday, and that from Amsterdam has not arrived.

Mr. Secretary Canning left Windsor on Saturday night week on a visit to the Earl and Countess of Liverpool at Bath.

Mr. Secretary Peel left Windsor on Saturday night week, in company with the Duke of Wellington, on a visit to his Grace, at his seat at Stratfieldsay, Hampshire.

Prince Polignac will return to London in the course of the week; so will his Excellency have nearly fulfilled his professed intention of not remaining more than ten days absent from this country.

The band of the King's Guard played, for the first time since the death of their Royal Commander, on Thursday morning, while mounting guard at the King's Palace, St. James's. The band was that of the First Regiment of Foot Guards.

THE MIDDLESEX MAGISTRATES.—Several of the inhabitants of the county of Middlesex, are about to send in a memorial to the Magistrates, praying for admission to the Court on the days when the latter assemble to discuss the affairs of the county.

MELANCHOLY CATASTROPHE.—On Sunday, between four and five o'clock, William Lewis, about 14 years of age, cabin boy of the Widdrington, Captain Muers, took a boat and proceeded from the shore to the vessel, for the purpose of feeding a dog that was in it. There being a strong fresh breeze, the boat was rapidly carried down the river by the current. The crew of the schooner perceiving his perilous situation, three spirited young men took a boat and succeeded in getting him into it, but immediately after it was upset by a heavy sea, and all in it sunk, and were drowned. —Berwick Advertiser.

The mortality at Groningen does not decrease so much as was expected from the change of the weather; thirty-seven deaths are reported from the 12th to the 18th inclusive, which make two more than the week before.

Captain Scott, of the Sir Neill Campbell, which sailed from Sierra Leone so long as the 10th ult. states, that our Government had given up the forts of Accra, Anamboo, and Dixcove, and that the garrisons had arrived at Sierra Leone. The colony had been sickly for some time, but at his departure it was perfectly healthy. The Ashantees were quiet.

Several publicans at Bath have recently been fined for not distinguishing their new measures from the old ones.

GANG OF COINERS.—On Friday Daniel Buckley, Shadrack Walker, Jeremiah Andrews, Daniel Pyecroft, Mary Ann Buckley, and Mary Ann Patrick, the individuals who have been five weeks in custody, charged as manufacturers and utterers of counterfeit coin, were brought up for final examination before Sergeant Sellon and W. L. Rogers, Esq. at Hatton-garden office. They were then fully committed for trial at the next Surrey Assizes, and the parties bound over to prosecute.

Intelligence from Constantinople, of the 22d December, mentions a letter from Lord Cochrane to the Greek Government, in which he says, that the time is approaching when he will come to their relief, and that he may be expected in the Morea, in the month of March.

MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.—A preliminary meeting of the Committee for conducting the subscription for this national measure was held yesterday at the Freemasons' Tavern. Letters, containing the strongest assurances of co-operation and support, from numerous distinguished persons, were read. Among those who were prevented from attending, by absence from town, were his Grace the Duke of Wellington and Lord Rolle. After some minor arrangements for a future Meeting, and for inviting other distinguished individuals to take part in the management, the Meeting adjourned to Friday next, when a day will be fixed for a Public General Meeting at the Freemasons' Tavern.

General Pepe set out for London last week, on private business, as it is said.

It is said to be in contemplation to put up the hatchment of the late Commander-in-Chief at the Horse Guards, his palace not being finished at St. James's.

A Supplement to Tuesday's Gazette was published, containing the official account of the funeral ceremonies observed towards the remains of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York.

A letter has been received from Rio de Janeiro, dated the 3d of November, stating, that the ship of war Don Pedro the Fourth had sailed on the preceding day for Brest, to take on board Prince Miguel, who was expected in Brazil, on a visit to his brother the Emperor. This corroborates a story lately current in the French papers, that such a visit was meditated, but it is obvious that many political events may arise in the present state of Europe to prevent its actually taking place.

In the steam-packet which sailed on Tuesday for Lisbon, went passenger, with his spouse, M. Ferreira Borges, an eminent Portuguese Advocate, and one of the leaders of the Oporto revolution. This gentleman for the last three years has resided as an exile in England.

Vice-Admiral Sir Edward Codrington, K. C. B., and Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's squadron stationed in the Mediterranean, has left town for Portsmouth, to join the Asia at that port, and to proceed from thence immediately to the head-quarters of his destination at Malta. His departure was not expected to take place till the latter end of February.

Friday, a poor woman was seen sitting in the room at Union Hall, allotted for persons who are in want of assistance, and are in waiting for the attendance of the parish officers, with an infant in her arms, who seemed to the persons who were passing into the office to be in a dying state, apparently in consequence of the effects of cold. The circumstance having been made known to the Magistrates, they immediately directed the poor woman to be called into the office. The child, whose limbs were paralyzed with cold, was placed before the fire, and rubbed, but all endeavours to arouse the energies of the vital functions were fruitless, and it died in a few hours afterwards in the infirmary, next door, entirely in consequence of long exposure to the air during this inclement season.

DISCOVERY OF THE BODY OF MR. CROMPTON.—The body of this unfortunate gentleman, who, it will be recollected, suddenly disappeared about six weeks ago, and for whom a long and unavailing search has been made, has at length been discovered. On Sunday last, some persons walking along the side of the river, near Carrington, saw something floating down on the surface of the water. With some difficulty they succeeded in drawing it to the bank, when they found it to be the body of a man. From its size and general appearance they immediately concluded it to be that of Mr. Crompton; and on examining the neckcloth, they found it was marked with a C. In the pockets were a watch, a silver pencil-case, a memorandum-book, and other articles, which the unfortunate gentleman was known to have about him when he disappeared, and which, as well as the body, were immediately recognized by his relatives. As the last time Mr. Crompton was seen was when he left the Bolton boat near Oldfield-road, it appears probable, from this discovery, that he must have fallen into the canal somewhere near the locks communicating with the river, into which his body has been subsequently carried. It certainly is difficult to conceive how a person could be drowned in so public a place, in the middle of the forenoon, without some one either seeing him or hearing his cries; but every other supposition is attended with still greater difficulties.—Manchester Mercury.

THE REFUGE FOR THE HOUSELESS POOR.—The two receptacles of the "Refuge for the Houseless," one in Grub-street, and the other in Honduras-street, Wapping, are now open and in full operation, and, from the great influx of persons seeking relief, it is apprehended that the suffering experienced by the lower classes in the metropolis is, and will be, more severe even than that of last winter. Applicants begin to pour in at about seven o'clock in the evening, or soon after night-fall, in such numbers, that more extensive premises are requisite for their complete accommodation. They receive beds of clean straw, and they lie down in stalls, which are soon completely filled. The Committee only give bread and water, and a warm bed of straw. One of the regulations for the preservation of health is, that of compelling every applicant to wash himself night and morning, and towels, soap, and water, are provided for the purpose. Half a pound of bread is given at night, and an equal quantity at morning to each individual. The great body are labourers, or others who have been driven to the metropolis to seek employment. Last year the larger portion of labourers were Irishmen. It is remarkable that there are now but few Irish labourers amongst them; that the majority are Welsh agricultural labourers, who have been driven to migrate by the distress which has of late pervaded their country, and in some instances by the enclosures of the wastes by the Welch land-owners. There is a separate apartment for females, who are provided for under the superintendence of a matron. The persons who seek refuge here are mostly of the lower class of servant girls, soldiers' wives, and other unfortunate creatures from the country, who come to London under similar circumstances to those of the male applicants; but, happily, they are not much above a quarter as numerous. The servant girls are those who, having been long out of place, or who, having come up to London to seek places, have not succeeded.

HORSE STEALING.—William Rust, Thos. Johnston, and Henry Johnston, were brought before the Magistrates at Worship-street on Thursday, for horse-stealing. The prisoners were apprehended at a lodging-house in Gray's-inn-lane; and in their room were found a quantity of horse furniture and a set of instruments for docking and altering the appearance of horses. On Tuesday last a black mare was stolen from the stables of Col. Osborne, at Cheshunt, and traced to Eldridge's stables in Gray's-inn-lane, where it had been left by Rust.—The prisoners were remanded for further examination.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 228, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 1l., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

COUGHS, COLDS, ASTHMAS, &c.

WILMOTT'S COUGH PILLS.—These Pills have been found, by long experience, to be a most effectual Remedy, their operation is by promoting expectoration, and gently relieving the bowels, by which means they will speedily remove the most obstinate Cough. In Asthmas, Hoarseness, and all diseases of the Breast and Lungs, the efficacy of these Pills is well known in a very large and extensive connection, they have stood the test of time, and the inventor can with confidence introduce them into very general use.

Sold in Boxes at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Wilmott, 83, High-street, Borough; Butler's, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom may be had Dr. FOTHERGILL's TONIC FEMALE PILLS, recommended in general Debility of the Constitution, also as a safe and excellent remedy in those periodical irregularities which Females, of delicate and languid circulation, more especially the younger part, are liable to. In Boxes, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. Also Dr. FOTHERGILL's DROPS, so much celebrated for their efficacy in Nervous Disorders. In Bottles at 4s. 6d.; 11s.; and 22s.

IMPOSTURE UNMASKED.—The progress of Merit, although frequently assailed, is not impeded by Envy and Detraction. The aggression of ambuscade terminates in defeat; and conscious rectitude ultimately triumphs in the attainment of the grand object—public approbation. The test of experience is the guarantee of favour, and has established WARREN's BLACKING in general estimation; of which there exists not a stronger proof than the tacit acknowledgment of a host of servile imitators, who surreptitiously obtrude on the unwary a spurious preparation as the genuine article, to the great disappointment of the unguarded purchaser, and manifest injury of WARREN, whose character and interest by this iniquitous system are equally subject to detriment. It becomes therefore an indispensable duty to CAUTION THE PUBLIC against the manœuvres of Unprincipled Venders, who having no character to lose, and stimulated by avarice in their nefarious pursuits, aim at the acquisition of money through any medium than that of honour! The original and matchless BLACKING bears on each bottle a short direction, with the signature

All others are counterfeits; and in many instances the imposition labels are artfully interlined with a different address, in very small characters, between the more conspicuous ones of "No. 30," and "STRAND." It is earnestly recommended to Shopkeepers and others who are deceived by base fabrications of WARREN's BLACKING, to return the detected trash to the source whence it came, and expose the machinations of rascality to merited obloquy.

WARREN's BLACKING is surpassingly brilliant;—it excludes damp; gives pliancy to the leather; retains its pristine virtue in all climates; and, combining elegance with comfort, is an article equally of indispensable fashion and utility. Sold by every respectable Vender in Town and Country, in bottles, at 6d. 10d. 12d. and 18d. each.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4 .

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhea, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases, together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

Principiis obsta; sero medicina paratur.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author. Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add, as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

A Letter from W. Drayton, Esq. Sion-Hill, Bath.
TO Mrs. VINCENT, SOLE PROPRIETOR of GOWLAND's LOTION.

MADAM—I should think myself deficient in duty to society and you were I to withhold my public testimony to the great efficacy of your GOWLAND'S LOTION, which I have seen performed by the administration of it in a case under my own roof.

A young gentleman, aged about seven years, son of a Colonel in the army, was afflicted with a virulent and sore eruption, accompanied with an intolerable itching in the wrists and insteps, the only places of attack of the complaint, and that to so violent a degree as to make it necessary to confine his hands in bags, particularly at night: the complaint resisted various applications from the united consultation of three physicians of eminence, and continued to grow worse under the regimen prescribed, when a lady, who had received a cure of a very bad case of Scurvy in the face, of several years standing, by your Gowland's Lotion, recommended a trial of the same remedy. It was applied under my own inspection—the disease gave way—and three quarts of your Lotion performed a radical cure of a disorder, which had been of about four years duration, and had baffled the skill of several physicians eminent in their profession.

From my conviction of the above cure I recommended your Gowland's Lotion to a lady whose face exhibited a very disagreeable eruption, (even large pustules, and as one died away another appeared.) so much as to prohibit her going into company: a Quart of your Gowland's Lotion effected a cure, and she is now free from eruption. I am, Madam, &c.

CLERICAL, MEDICAL, and GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

DIRECTORS.

George Pinckard, M.D., Chairman.

Rev. Christopher Benson, M.A.	Sir Chas. Des Vœux, Bart.
Rev. Gilbert Beresford, M.A.	James Kibblewhite, Esq.
G. G. Bubington, Esq.	Saml. Merriman, M.D.
Robert Bree, M.D., F.R.S.	A. A. Mieville, Esq.
James Carden, Esq.	F. J. Perceval, Esq.
Arthur Chichester, Esq., M.P.	Sir Geo. Pocock.
Henry James Cholmeley, M.D.	Ashby Smith, M.D.
Thos. Davis, Esq.	Geo. Vance, Esq.

The common usage of excluding from the benefits of Life Assurance, or exposing to a forfeiture of their Policies, individuals who may have been afflicted with "Gout, Asthma, Rupture, Fits, Hemorrhage, Complaints of the Liver, Spitting of Blood, Vertigo, or any other disease," being liable to become a source of fraud on the one hand, and of litigation on the other, this Society, in order to remove every pretence for deceit or fraudulent concealment, respecting the actual state of health of the assured, extends the advantages of Life Assurance to persons subject to such deviations from the common standard of health as do not materially tend to shorten life, on their paying a moderate addition to the premium, proportioned to the increase of hazard.

One half of the Board of Directors being members of the medical profession, the attendance of such a body of eminent practitioners, on every occasion of granting an Assurance, forms a distinguished safeguard, which cannot fail to be greatly beneficial both to the assured and to the Society.

Persons proposing for assurance may arrange to pay their Premiums either in a single payment, by annual payments for a limited number of years only, or by annual payments throughout the whole continuance of life.

The person assured has the option to share the profits, either by adding them to the policy, for the benefit of his survivors at his decease; or to take them, in reduction of the annual premium, for his own benefit during life.

SAMS'S ANNUAL PEERAGE of the BRITISH EMPIRE, in 2 vols. elegantly bound and embellished, price 20s.

"This is one of the most useful, as well as one of the most accurate views of the Peerage of the British Empire we have yet seen, and has deservedly obtained much of public patronage. The perspicuity of the arrangement (the names of the Peers following in simple alphabetical order, instead of being classed according to their ranks, and again divided according to their respective countries) is calculated to remove all those difficulties which have hitherto been encountered in the perusal of these works; and as it embraces the parentage, births, marriages, and issue of all the living members of each family, descended in the male line, from the first Peer, it becomes doubly valuable."—Courier, Jan. 25, 1827.

NEW PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION LIBRARY.—26, Holles-street, Cavendish-square.

EDWARD BULL begs respectfully to announce, that he has opened those extensive premises (late the Banking-house of Sir Claude Scott, Bart. and Co.) as a British and Foreign Library, with the primary design of furnishing to Subscribers in town or in any part of the United Kingdom, a more immediate regular and enlarged supply of New Publications, than is attainable through any other means, at a moderate expense. Subscribers have also the privilege of choosing, from a valuable and extensive collection of standard works, the use of the best Periodicals, Foreign as well as English, and the right of requiring the purchase of any publication of general interest that may not already be comprised in the Library. With these great advantages, added to an experience of many years active engagement in the Libraries of Mr. Colburn and Mr. Ebers, E. Bull ventures his pretensions to a share of public patronage, which he will zealously study to merit, sparing neither pains nor expense to ensure its continuance. Catalogues and Terms to be had on application.

Reviews, and Monthly Journals, of Literature, Science, &c., will be received into this Library regularly from France, Italy, and Germany.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF CHANCERY, Jan. 27.

The Attorney-General said, that in commenting upon the affidavit of Mr. Wellesley, it was particularly disagreeable to be obliged to attribute to him actions inconsistent with the character of a gentleman. He was, however, absolutely compelled to repeat, that Mr. Wellesley's affidavit was founded in direct perjury—not legal, but moral perjury, and equally despicable as regarded the question at issue, which was, whether Mr. Wellesley was or was not a fit person to have the care of his own children? Was it not important that the education and care of children should be intrusted to a person of unimpeached veracity; to a man, who as a husband and a father stood undefiled by foul reproach. He had carefully perused the affidavits again and again, and his opinion of this perjury was unchanged. Mr. Wellesley, with his wife and family reached Naples on the 15th of November, 1822, and Mr. and Mrs. Bligh arrived on the 29th May, 1823. Long before this Mrs. Wellesley had been acquainted with Mrs. Bligh. She was the daughter of a Colonel Patterson, who had greatly distinguished himself in India, and who had resided upon the estate of Wanstead, which was now unhappily dissipated, and its mansion destroyed. There Mr. Wellesley had seen Mrs. Bligh, then Miss Patterson, although he had sworn he had not seen her before her arrival at Naples, in 1823. In this, perhaps, he might have been mistaken. Mrs. Wellesley had sworn that the first time of her seeing Mrs. Bligh was at a ball given by Mr. Hamilton, the English Ambassador at Naples. She then saw Mr. Wellesley walking with her, and asked him who she was, but he did not introduce her. Mrs. Wellesley and Mrs. Bligh were introduced subsequently by the Ambassador's lady, and they then became intimate. Mr. Wellesley had sworn that he was averse to the introduction, which was of his wife's seeking. This part of the affidavit fully showed the character of the man—it evinced one of the meannesses, one of the many proofs of an utter dereliction of every thing just and honourable. Was it consistent with the high spirit of a gentleman—nay, with the common household principles of honesty, to resort to such a paltry, contemptible subterfuge? Seeing the perfect subjection, the slavish servility, in which Mr. Wellesley kept his unfortunate wife, it was perfectly absurd to suppose that her introduction to Mrs. Bligh was against his wishes. The statement was nothing less than gross moral perjury. In the excursion to Mount Vesuvius, Mrs. Wellesley was not of the party, and the whole of them passed the night in one of the huts on the mountain. Mrs. W. had been kept from this party under a pretence of delicate health. Shortly after the improper intimacy between Mr. W. and Mrs. B. began to be rumoured, and Dr. Bulkeley commenced his attendance upon Mrs. B. for her pregnancy, whilst he impressively warned Mr. W., that he was threading upon a volcano. This was in June, and on the 31st July Mrs. Bligh left her house, owing, as Mr. Wellesley pretends, to some quarrel with her husband. The falsehood of this assertion was only to be equalled by its meanness and stupidity. The deed of adultery was alone the cause of her leaving her husband's house. The affidavit of the valet, Meara, conclusively fixed upon Mr. Wellesley the foulest perjury. As to the credibility of this servant, he was at least as respectable as his master, or a thousand times more respectable. Meara swore, that the day after Mrs. Bligh fled from her husband, Mr. Wellesley commissioned him to bribe Mr. Bligh's groom, and Mrs. Bligh's waiting-maid to secresy of their mistress's adultery with him.—The very next day Mr. Wellesley swore that he had never seen Mrs. Bligh but in general society, and under her husband's roof. This affidavit was shown to Mrs. Wellesley. Mr. Wellesley had sworn, on 28th of February last, that he was not living in open adultery with Mrs. Bligh; and he tried, by equivocation, to deceive the Court and the public. About twelve persons had sworn that he was living with this woman in York-street. His affidavit was therefore gross and flat perjury. It was made a great objection to Dr. Bulkeley's evidence, that he had provoked a duel between Captain Bligh and Mr. Wellesley; but the fact was, that instead of provoking, he had prevented a duel. His Lordship had naturally inquired why, if the adultery had taken place at Naples, it was not so proved on the trial? But his Lordship must be well aware of the tactics that were often resorted to in these cases; besides, the parties here were not the same; nor was the subject matter the same as in the trial at law. There was no attempt to contradict Dr. Bulkeley's affidavit, as far as it related to Mr. W.'s conduct at Florence, where it was so gross and vulgar, that even Mrs. Wellesley was convinced of the nature of his connexion with Mrs. Bligh; and after she had withdrawn her protection from her, Mr. Wellesley took lodgings for her in the same hotel with his wife, and continued his adultery with her. It was indubitably proved, that the criminal intercourse between Mr. Wellesley and Mrs. Bligh continued from its commencement at Naples to the period when a child was born to them; and that, therefore, Mr. Wellesley had sworn to that which was false. The birth of a child was a stubborn fact that could not be controverted. On the arrival of the parties at Paris, in May, 1824, it was proved that Mrs. Bligh was there before them, and that Mr. Wellesley slept with her at a hotel on the night of his arrival, having left Mrs. Wellesley on the road. His Lordship would also please to attend to the date of the 24th of June, 1824, when Lord and Lady Maryborough arrived at Paris, Mrs. Wellesley had, at length, upon clearly discovering Mr. Wellesley's intercourse with Mrs. Bligh, written to Lord or Lady Maryborough, that she could no longer hear Mr. Wellesley's treatment of her. Lord and Lady Maryborough went to the Hotel de Londres, where Mr. and Mrs. Wellesley resided, and there it was that, as one of the witnesses had sworn, when Mr. Wellesley saw them, he roared out so loud that he might be heard in the Place de Vendome. It had been attempted to discredit the witness, on account of the improbability of this fact; he could, however, say himself, from local knowledge, that the fact was perfectly possible.—Something, too, might be allowed for the figurative mode of speaking which people sometimes adopted in describing such matters. The late Sir T. Plomer, who sometime spoke in a very loud voice, was, on a certain occasion, speaking in the House of Commons, when two Members were proceeding from the House to a neighbouring coffee-house—one of them proposed to stay to hear him, when the other said, "Hang him, he speaks so loud you might hear him in the next world." It might very well be said that some Counsel spoke so loud that they might be heard from the Hotel de Londres to the Place de Vendome. On the 15th of July, 1824, Mrs. Wellesley left Paris, when, notwithstanding all patience, obedience, and submission, she could no longer endure to live with her husband. Mr. Wellesley at that time gave some instructions relative to his children's education, which he admitted were very proper. She proceeded to Draycot, and lived there while the children were under the care of Mr. Pitman—a man admitted to be a very proper person to conduct their education. His Lordship would in the next place please to advert to Mr. Wellesley's arrival in London, and visit in Clarges street. It was in proof that he arrived on the 26th of June, 1825, and went with Mrs. Bligh to Seymour-place, where Doctor ——— took a house for her, stating to the owner of the house that she was pregnant, and that her name was Madame Roncet, Mrs. Wellesley being at that time residing in Clarges-street. A letter had been written by Mrs. Wellesley to Colonel Shaw, mentioning her determination to procure a legal separation from her husband, and in that letter it was intimated that she had communicated her resolution to Lord Maryborough, and that Mr. Wellesley knew it. What was the object of Mr. Wellesley's breaking into the privacy of his wife in Clarges-street, after she had so properly separated from him? It was to induce her not to sue out a separation, or to enable him to set the application aside by a condonation, the Court often granting a condonation upon the affidavit that the parties had been seen together. The mode of Mr. Wellesley's paying that visit was disgraceful to him in the extreme. Whilst he went to see the unhappy Mrs. Wellesley, he left his mistress to go and pay a visit to Madame Vestris, in the adjoining street. This was what Mr. Wellesley called paying a respectful visit to his wife. Nothing, however, could have been more cruel and ruffianly. From February 1826 to March 1826, there was no evidence of an adulterous intercourse between Mr. W. and Mrs. Bligh. If there had been any cessation, how infamous was it in Mr. W. to renew it. It had previously been kept up at Utrecht, Paris, Dieppe, and London. There may have been intervals, but there was no abandonment of the adultery, and the affidavit that at one particular moment there was neither an open or clandestine adultery carrying on between him and Mrs. Bligh was a dirty quibble—a miserable sophistication that would not deceive any one. The Learned Gentleman proceeded to vindicate the testimony of Mrs. Scott and the watchman from the imputation of perjury. The facts to which they deposed were such as were not likely to come under the observation of other persons. Who else could so well testify to Mrs. Bligh's coming home at three or four o'clock in the morning? The Learned Counsel here adverted to a fact sworn to, as evidence of Mr. Wellesley's general moral habits, that he had a tenancy in common for the favour of a lady, the condition being, that one of the gentlemen should be received in the absence of the other. This was important, as it served to show the habitual abandonment of Mr. Wellesley, and his consequent inability to exercise, with due efficiency, the parental rights with which he sought to be intrusted. As further evidence of the general demoralization of his mind, it was important to remark, that he boasted in one of his letters of his indiscriminate intercourse with women—in illustration of which he introduced a passage from 'Don Giovanni.' The next point to which he would refer was, Mr. Wellesley's declaration, that if he could not get his children by legal means he would have recourse to stratagem to obtain them. And it was important to the Court to consider whether the present defence, the subornation of perjury, was not a constituent part of that stratagem. Were not his affidavits made up of stratagems? Was not his statement, that he was not living in open or clandestine adultery, a fraud to deceive the Court? From it he would have it inferred that, because he was not living in the most barefaced adultery—because he was not, in short, found nudas cum nuda—(loud laughter)—he was, therefore, not carrying on an adulterous intercourse. After commenting on the means by which Mr. Wellesley endeavoured to deprive his wife of her pin-money—of 11,000l. a year—after spending the remainder of her fortune, after she had generously thrown her pin-money into a common stock for their support, and which attempt was only prevented by the influence of Lord Maryborough; the Learned Counsel said he would next make a few observations on Mr. Wellesley's conduct in relation to his children.

MONDAY, Jan. 29.

The Attorney General, in continuation of his reply, said, that he had then presented to his Lordship, a list of dates commencing from the 29th of May, 1823, relative to the connexion of Mr. Wellesley with Mrs. Bligh, in order to deduce therefrom that there had been a continuous and uninterrupted adultery between those two parties from that time down to the present; and that the affidavits sworn to by Mr. Wellesley in February, 1826, denying the continuity of that adultery, were utterly destitute of all foundation in truth. It was, therefore, for his lordship to consider whether the falsehoods contained in Mr. Wellesley's affidavits were not such as destroyed his character as a man of honour and veracity. He contended, that the consideration of that point was a vital one—it was a mistake to suppose that he and his learned friends were contending that adultery was a sufficient ground in itself to take away from Mr. Wellesley all parental control over the education of his children. Undoubtedly, the continuous adultery of Mr. Wellesley was one strong circumstance in their case. They had a right to bring before the Court the whole of Mr. Wellesley's moral principles and conduct. They said that the defence to the present application was deliberately founded by Mr. Wellesley on perjury and subornation of perjury. If that point could be once made out, there was an end to the question; for even his learned friends admitted that if a man deliberately swore that which was false in his affidavits, no security could be placed in his credibility and veracity, and that he was therefore unfit to superintend the education of his children. The learned counsel then proceeded to show, from the affidavits, that the structure of Mr. Wellesley's mind was decidedly profligate and immoral. Among other circumstances to which he adverted in proof of it, was the obstinate manner in which he persevered in his disgraceful and degrading connexion with Mrs. Bligh, notwithstanding the mild and affectionate remonstrances which his wife addressed to him, with a view of breaking it off. He felt it his duty to call the attention of his Lordship to a letter, to which none of his learned friends had hitherto alluded. It was a letter written by Mrs. Wellesley to Lord Maryborough, which he had no doubt had been communicated by Lord Maryborough to Mr. Wellesley, though he could not actually prove it by affidavit. In that letter, written by Mrs. Wellesley after her eyes had been opened to the baseness and cruelty of her husband's conduct, and after her feelings had been outraged in such a manner as the feelings of few women ever were outraged, she offered to Lord Maryborough, that if the connexion between Mr. Wellesley and Mrs. Bligh were broken off, she would, out of her diminished and half-exhausted pin-money, give to that lady the means of obtaining a respectable subsistence. The learned counsel then proceeded to contend, that in proportion as Mr. Wellesley persevered in his adulterous connexion with Mrs. Bligh, in spite of the well-meant and reiterated remonstrances of his affectionate and broken-hearted wife, was the structure of his mind likely to become improper to educate his children, and to gain for him their esteem and respect. He then called the attention of his Lordship to another portion of Mr. Wellesley's affidavits, in which Mr. Wellesley han sworn with the same disregard to truth as was exhibited in the portion to which he had before adverted—he alluded to the indecent attacks made by Mr. Wellesley on his late wife's sisters, the Misses Long. The counsel on the other side had insinuated that those ladies were tainted with that species of over-religion, which, in the dialect of the day, was denominated saint-ship. Mr. Wellesley had gone still further, and had sworn that they were sectarian and fanatical. Now, whether they were so or not, was, as far as related to the issue of the present application, of no importance. Mr. Wellesley's plan was to blacken and destroy, as far as he could do by his own oath, the character of every person who had appeared in the course of this suit to give testimony against him. He had adopted it with regard to Dr. Bulkeley, Mr. Pittman, and other most respectable witnesses, who, the learned counsel said, were placed far beyond the reach of his malice. After defending the conduct of Dr. Bulkeley at considerable length, and contending that in the evidence which that gentleman had given he had not been actuated either by malicious or interested motives, he proceeded to notice the conduct of Mr. Wellesley towards his children. It had been stated that Mr. Wellesley was in the habit of swearing to his children himself, and of teaching them to swear in return—that he regularly instructed them in the patois of the lowest classes of society in the country in which they were, and that ribaldry, vulgarity, obscenity, and blasphemy were permitted to be used in his presence, without restraint, before his children.—The letter of Mrs. Wellesley, on which Mr. Attorney-General relied, was dated May 20, 1825, in which she rejoiced that her boys were placed under Mr. Pitman's care, whilst they were yet uncontaminated by their father's example, and said that, "if they were under their father's roof, they would hear vice upheld and admired, and morality and religion scorned and ridiculed every day." In corroboration of these affidavits, the Attorney-General also read a letter of instructions sent by Mr. Wellesley to his wife, in which he admitted that he had permitted his son William to swear a little, in order that he might be able to distinguish in his mind between a vice and a venial fault. After reading such letters, and such affidavits, he (Mr. Attorney-General) was surprised to find that Mr. Wellesley could have the effrontery and audacity to swear, that instead of permitting and encouraging his children to use blasphemous and ribald language, he had always checked them in it by every means in his power. Was not such an affidavit on the part of Mr. Wellesley an insult to the judicature of the country? It was contradicted, not only by the six witnesses whose affidavits he had read to the Court, but also by Mr. Wellesley's own letter. This piece of posthumous perjury—for the affidavit containing it was dated May, 1826, after all the other affidavits were sworn which specified times, words, oaths, and places, in the most distinct and stringent manner—this piece of posthumous perjury was, he contended, as superfluous as it was imprudent. Could Mr. Wellesley suppose that his unsupported oath would be believed in the lowest Court in the country, in opposition to the oaths of six disinterested individuals, supported as they were, by his own letter?

Mr. Horne wished the whole of that letter of Mr. Wellesley's to be read on, which his Learned Friend relied as contradicting that gentleman's affidavit. With his Lordship's permission he would read it, as the context completely contradicted the gloss which his Learned Friend had put upon it. The Learned Counsel then read the letter of Mr. Wellesley to his wife, in which he told her that her manner to her children was defective, on account of its not being sufficiently peremptory—that her pettish manner to them at one time, and her coaxing manner at another, was not the proper manner to obtain their obedience. "I would recommend you," continued he, "to adopt the course which I adopted to cure William of lying, the father of all other vices. I allowed him to swear a little in order that he might be able to distinguish in his mind between a vice and a venial fault." (Loud laughter in the Court.)

The Attorney-General did not conceive that the whole of Mr. Wellesley's letter varied in the slightest degree the meaning which he had set upon it. He might perhaps agree with Mr. W., that swearing was a less crime than lying. Blasphemous oaths might be mere bruta fulmina, which injured no one: lying was a vice more dangerous in its consequences, as they led to the injury of other parties. He had produced the letter to show that Mr. W. allowed his children to swear. Did it not prove that fact? He allowed them to swear a little! Yes, swearing was mere or-geat and water; lying was a dangerous and intoxicating spirit. He had now only to advert to the law of the case. The counsel on the other side had allowed that if Mr. Wellesley had so far sported with the sanctity of an oath as to deprive himself of all claim to future credibility, he was not a fit person to be intrusted with the guardianship of his children. But they had denied that he had so far sported with the sanctity of an oath, and had then asked whether adultery alone was sufficient to destroy the parent's right to control the education of his children? He would not follow Mr. Beames through his inquiry whether the Court of Chancery possessed the power which it was now called upon to exercise. His learned friend had dilated much on the magnitude of that power. Undoubtedly it was a great power, but then it was given to the Lord Chancellor by the Constitution of the country, and his Lordship would be a traitor to the King, of whom he was the delegate, if he refused to exercise it when called upon by circumstances to do so. There was, however, another branch of this subject, which, as his learned friends had touched upon it, he would also notice. He had not as yet said one word with regard to Mr. Wellesley's pecuniary circumstances. He believed that it appeared in one of the affidavits that a clerk of one of the solicitors employed in this cause had examined the judgments both in the King's Bench and in the Common Pleas, and had found a great many entered up against Mr. Wellesley. Whether those judgments had been satisfied since that examination or not, he could not tell, as he had no evidence before him on the subject. His Lordship had, however, heard Mr. Wellesley's own statement on the point, and would know better than he did how to deal with it. He should, however, contend, that on the score of finance alone, Mr. Wellesley was not a fit person to have the disposal of the money which was to be set aside for the education of his children. His children were to be bred up to the possession of a large fortune; and it was not impossible that an indigent father might lead them into rash and inconsiderate bargains, by which their wealth might be made to contribute to the relief of his distress. He contended, that the indigence of the parent, even supposing there were no moral depravity to be urged against him, might be such as to disqualify him from acting as the guardian of his wealthy children. A case of this kind, for instance, might happen. The husband of one woman might have formed and continued a connexion with another woman for three years in spite of the remonstrances of his wife, and his and her joint friends. He might be so fastened to that woman, either by the charms of her person or by the terror of her threats, or by the various kinds of influence which women often obtained over the men who debauched them, as to sell the interests of the children of his wife to raise money for purposes very uncongenial with their interests. He begged also to remind his Lordship, that it was not an uncommon occurrence for a man to marry the woman whom he had seduced from the path of virtue. He was certain that his Lordship would recollect that it once became matter of grave discussion in the House of Lords, whether all divorce bills should not contain a clause prohibiting the adulterers to marry. Some of their Lordships contended that such a clause would be highly useful to the morals of the community, whilst others argued, and successfully, as appeared by the result, that seduction might occur under such circumstances as rendered marriage a proper atonement to the woman who had been seduced, and to her family. Such an atonement might be expected from Mr. Wellesley, in the present case, by the members of the highly respectable family to which the woman whom he had seduced belonged; and if it were expected, Mr. Wellesley would have great difficulty in evading it, since the death of his wife left him at liberty to take another. Without saying whether such an atonement would be made to Mrs. Bligh or not, he would merely remark, that the rule which some members of the House of Lords had wished to lay down with respect to divorce-bills, had been rejected on the ground that circumstances might require such an atonement as marriage to take place.

The Lord Chancellor, on the conclusion of the Attorney-General's speech, observed, that as he was obliged to attend to-morrow to an important motion respecting a writ of Habeas Corpus, affecting the liberty of the subject, he should postpone his judgment on this case till Wednesday morning. In the meantime he should wish to have some affidavits as to Mr. Wellesley's circumstances. He did not wish to have that minute statement of Mr. Wellesley's circumstances which might be inconvenient; but there were one or two points on which some further information was necessary. There were already affidavits filed as to the number of judgments against Mr. Wellesley in the King's Bench and Common Pleas. With reference to those judgments this distinction had been made—that those which were written in red ink were satisfied, and that those which were written in black ink were not satisfied: It was not, however, stated whether satisfaction was entered up on those judgments. He knew that there was an affidavit of Mr. Wellesley's, stating that he believed that satisfaction was entered up. As that fact was one to which it was unnecessary to pledge belief, since knowledge of it could easily be acquired by any clerk, he should like to have that knowledge. The affidavits likewise stated, that previously to Mr. Wellesley coming to England from the Continent, to which he had fled to be out of the way of his creditors, his trustees had entered into some temporary arrangement on his constable. He also saw her draw a something from her muff at is spot, and she was given in charge to ascertain whether she id not loaded fire-arms upon her person. There was an elderly male then in her company, whom they had not noticed before. here was some delay at the Bread-street watchhouse, in opening e door, and while standing there, the prisoner presented a pistol the direction of his face, within two feet of him, and it snapped. he flint struck fire; but the powder did not ignite. He bobbed r head when he saw the flash, and Mr. Howell seized the prisoner's n. They then all went into the watchhouse.

Mr. John Howell, coal-merchant, of Greenhithe, deposed that ter following the prisoner twice up and down Friday-street, he bserved by the light at the White Horse Inn, that she drew a istol from her muff when she came opposite to them. He saw it istinctly, and sent his friend in search of an officer. Before he eturned, however, he noticed the prisoner spoke to an elderly oman, at the corner of Old Fish-street, and supposing she had iven her the pistol, when the constable arrived, he gave them oth in charge. While waiting at the watchhouse door, witness ood half facing her, between her and Mr. Randall; but they were ll close together. Presently the prisoner drew a pistol with her ght hand from the muff, and extending her arm across witness's nest, levelled the pistol at Mr. Randall's head. Witness seized er arm with his left hand, and the barrel of the pistol with his ght, and just at the instant he raised the muzzle above the line f direction to his friend's head, she pulled the trigger. He got e pistol from her with much difficulty.

In reply to questions from the Alderman, the witness further ated, that he was used to fire-arms, and he was sure he did not ove the trigger himself, in struggling to get possession of the istol. The pistol was loaded with powder to within an inch of e end of the barrel, but there was no bullet. There was powder ound the touch-hole, and the mouth of the pistol was presented ithin a foot of Mr. Randall; but he thought it, instead of snapping nly, the priming had caught, the contents would have passed oove his friend's head, because he had elevated the barrel at the oment. She struggled so hard to keep the pistol, that he hurt er hand in wreaching it from her.

Matthew Carter, the constable, produced a full-sized duelling istol, and the powder with which it was charged, but he had lost e wadding. He said he had tried the pistol and it would not re. He took charge of the two women and conveyed them to the atchhouse. Mr. Howell put his hand into the prisoner's muff nd took out the pistol, saying—"Here's a pistol."

Sir John Perring.—What; He took it out very quietly then?

Witness.—Yes.

The witness continued.—He did not see the pistol levelled at Ir. Randall, nor see the flash, nor hear the snap. He did not otice what passed he was so anxious to get open the watchhouse oor. The prisoner unloaded the pistol herself, because there was othing handy in the watchhouse to do it. She picked out the adding with a pin.

Perhaps it was a nail given her by the beadle. He could not ell what she picked it out with; they had better ask the beadle. Laughter.)

Elizabeth Broadhurst, a laundress, living in South-street, ambeth, said she had washed for Miss Harwood, the prisoner, ree years, and about two months ago she declared her deteriination to shoot Mr. Randall. She dissuaded her as well as e was able, and the prisoner dropped talking to her upon the ubject; but she heard from a female friend of her's that the risoner had purchased the pistol to fulfil her threat. One Saturday, bout six weeks ago, the prisoner called in and said, "don't be larmed, I am going to try the pistol in the yard," and she added hat she would shoot Mr. Randall. She went into the yard and red, but the pistol made very little report indeed. She came up tairs again, and said the flint was not good, and she thought the istol was not good; but upon a second trial in the yard, she roduced a dreadful noise, and frightened the whole neighbourood. When the prisoner went away, she said, "now I am oing to Randall's counting house, and I'll shoot him. I shall e here to-morrow." "Oh," said witness, "how can you xpect to be at large if you think of committing such a rash ct?"

Hammond, the beadle, stated that the prisoner tried to draw the harge in the watchhouse with a pin, but it was not strong enough, ut a nail accomplished the business.

Mr. Howell explained, that Carter saw him perhaps searching e prisoner's muff, to ascertain if she had a second pistol, and onfounded that with what passed out of doors.

Carter remarked, in a low tone, that he knew the gentleman old him something of putting his hand in the muff and of a istol.

Mary Blakely, of Nags-head-court, Knightsbridge, the old oman who was apprehended at the same time with the prisoner, as next called as a witness. She knew very little of the prisoner, id nothing of her intentions with respect to Mr. Randall. The risoner had recommended her to a place of service in Woodreet, and that was the way they happened to come together from nightsbridge, on Monday. She saw a flash like lightning at watchhouse, and there was an immediate struggle to get someng from the prisoner. She did not the pistol at all, but heard gentlemen talk of examining it.

Ir. Randall was recalled to strengthen Mr. Howell's statement, ch had been contradicted by Carter. Mr. Randall said, after pistol snapped Mr. Howell tried to wrest it from her; she sted, and it was a minute before he succeeded. She comced in the watchhouse that her finger had been torn, and l Mr. Howell had no right to tear it. The constable heard t.

Carter was recalled, and questioned as to that fact. He said the soner asked him for a bit of rag to bind up her finger. Her ve, as well as her finger, were torn, and she complained that Randall had done it.

ir John Perring asked the prisoner if she had any thing to say his charge, but cautioned her against saying any thing which ld criminate herself, as it would deprive her of the advantage ny little difficulties that may arise in the proceedings.

he prisoner, who had held her head down, and appeared to be ping while the witnesses were under examination, rose, anced to the table, threw her veil aside, and with tolerable comure, inquired whether the Alderman wished to know the reasons induced her to take such steps as she had.

ie Alderman said, he was willing to hear any thing she had ffer, or any witnesses she pleased, but he cautioned her ist making any statement admitting the charge preferred ast her.

e replied, that she was anxious to give the Alderman a comhistory of her connexion with her accuser, and the motives actuated her in what she had done, if the Alderman would t her; but she would put herself under the advice of Mr. nder.

. Alexander a solicitor then stepped forward and said, he had ttended on her behalf or at her request, but he had received a e of her apprehension from the Governor of the Compter.—he knew of the prisoner was this: She had been recommended im by a friend, as a client, for whom an action for breach of mise of marriage was to be brought. He wrote to Mr. ndall, and at an interview, he was informed of circumstances ich induced him to think such an action would be unadvisable; on seeing the prisoner subsequently, he told her to bring all friends to him, who knew any thing of her history, which, r some time, she did; and from their statements he was satisfied re was ground of action, and he determined, on Friday last, to mence proceedings; but a difficulty arose—he could not obtain Randall's two Christian names, and he directed the prisoner make inquiry in the neighbourhood of Friday-street. He submitted that she might have pulled the trigger accidentally, in struggling with Mr. Howell to retain the pistol. He advised the prisoner certainly to enter into no justificatory detail here.

The prisoner was still desirous of stating her case, but yielded to the persuasions of the Alderman and Mr. Alexander, and contented herself with saying, that when she accosted Mr. Randall in Friday-street, she begged to detain him a few minutes; that he replied to her with very harsh language; and that she meant only to fire over his head to frighten him, having supplicated and done every thing else to gain her point in vain.

The Alderman said, he thought the charge completely established; but he remanded her for a week, that she might have the superior accommodations at the Compter, instead of Newgate, until the sessions approached.

Mr. Lupton Relfe, bookseller in Cornhill, appeared before Mr. Alderman Garratt on Thursday, upon a summons, to answer the complaint of a Mr. Charles Fricker, for misappropriating 60l., entrusted to him for a specific purpose.

Mr. Torriano appeared as solicitor for the defendant, and took an objection in limine, that the Alderman had no jurisdiction under the circumstances of the case.

Mr. Alderman Garratt said he was unacquainted with the facts, and could not judge whether he had a right to interfere until he had heard the complainant's case.

Mr. Van Sandau, the solicitor on the other side, then stated that his client, Mr. Fricker, was a grocer at Brighton, and drew a bill for 60l. upon an individual, who was not able to honour his acceptance when the bill came to maturity; Mr. Fricker, therefore, was obliged to make up the amount himself, which he sent to the acceptor, desiring him to take up the bill with it. The acceptor sent his porter to Messrs. Ransom with the money, and the ordinary notice that the bill was lying there, but they would not receive a Bank-post-bill for 10l. as cash, and the porter knowing his master had transactions with Mr. Relfe, went to him to beg he would accommodate him by changing the said Bank-post-bill, stating the objection made by the bankers, and that he had been sent to take up this bill. Mr. Relfe asked him for the rest of the money, which the porter handed to him with an understanding that Mr. Relfe would pay the whole to Messrs. Ransom, and send the bill enclosed at night to his master. The porter was afterwards sent to Mr. Relfe with a verbal message for the bill, and he returned with a note thanking the acceptor for having exerted himself to collect the money, and intimating that it had been appropriated to another bill of the acceptor's, drawn by Mr. Relfe upon him, and which was then overdue. Mr. Fricker, to prevent himself from being arrested upon his own bill, was compelled a second time to provide a sum of 60l. Mr. Relfe wished it to be believed that he had misunderstood a note which had been sent to him by the acceptor, stating that he was unable to meet the bill he had drawn him; but that he was going to Woolwich, and if he should fail in obtaining money there, he would willingly send Mr. Relfe 10l., and renew the bill, which was for 50l. When the porter gave Mr. Relfe 60l. it was impossible he could suppose that so much had been sent to take up a 50l. bill, and moreover the notice that a bill drawn by Mr. Fricker for 60l. was lying at Ransom's was exhibited to Mr. Relfe.

Mr. Torriano—Exhibited you say; I deny that.

Mr. Van Sandau proceeded to state, that the mis-appropriation was evident, and the consequence to Mr. Fricker had been that he had had to pay 120l. upon his own bill for 60l.

Mr. Torriano asked under what statute Mr. Van Sandau supposed his charge could be entertained?

Mr. Van Sandau said, Sir Thomas Plomer's act.

Mr. Torriano read the 2d section of that statute, and pointed out that it was necessary that the money should have been accompanied by notice in writing of the purpose it was to be applied to.

Mr. Van Sandau said, the banker's notice where the bill was lying, was tantamount to such a written order.

Mr. Torriano observed, that the statute required the written order should be signed by the party placing the money, &c. in the hands of another. The banker's notice would not all bear out the description of notice required by the law, and Mr. Van Sandau would not upon his professional credit assert the contrary.

Mr. Van Sandau at length confessed there was no statute upon which he could rely; but he took up a new position, that a gross misapplication of money by any one was an offence at common law.

Mr. Alderman Garratt said, Sir Thomas Plomer's Act could not be applied to this case, in which he thought he had no jurisdiction, and he regretted the summons had been granted.

Mr. Van Sandau was about to retire, but Mr. Torriano said he observed notes had been taken of the case, and it was unfair that any statement should go to the public without the explanations of the other party.

Mr. Alderman Garratt thought Mr. Torriano had an undoubted claim to be heard, if he pleased, although the case was disposed of.

Mr. Torriano stated, that Mr. Relfe drew a bill for 50l. upon the same individual on whom Mr. Fricker had drawn for 60l. They both came due about the same time, and on the 25th of Jan., Mr. Relfe received a letter from the acceptor that his feelings were much distressed from being disappointed as to some remittances he expected by post to make up the 50l., that he came to London in search of money, and was disappointed still, that he was going to Woolwich with the object, and he would send Mr. Relfe 10l., and beg a short renewal of the bill, if he should be disappointed again at the latter place. This letter was brought by the acceptor's porter, and four hours afterwards that identical porter came in again with the 10l. Bank post bill, stating that he had been to the bankers to take up the bill of exchange (by which Mr. Relfe supposed his own bill was meant), and that they had rejected the 10l. Mr. Relfe aked him for the money, which the porter handed over. There were three respectable individuals in the shop at the time, who, if the case had proceeded, would have deposed upon oath, that if there had been any misappropriation of the money, it arose entirely from the stupidity of the porter in not explaining himself when he asked for change for the note, and gave up the rest of the money. He exhibited the acceptor's bill for 50l. which he was ready to give up at any time.

Mr. Van Sandau remarked, that if Mr. Relfe found the money had got into his pocket by mistake, he ought to refund it, like an honest man.

Mr. Torriano said it would not be given up unless the law compelled it, and made a personal observation upon his opponent's motive in bringing the case before the sitting Alderman.

Mr. Alderman Garratt dismissed the parties, recommending the solicitors to apply to the reporters to suppress the case altogether. The publication of such cases, he thought, sometimes inflicted deep injury upon the whole families.

Mr. Van Sandau concurred in the propriety of the worthy Alderman's recommendation; but the solicitor for the defendant was silent.

BOW-STREET.—Lady Barrymore and Another.—The notorious Mary Ann Pearce, alias Lady Barrymore, was brought to the office on Thursday, charged with "smashing" several glasses in the Portobello Tavern, St. Martin's-lane, and with creating a mob of several hundred persons in the street. Her ladyship was placed by the side of the bar, during the hearing of another charge. She occasionally burst into loud fits of laughter, and boasted of her amours with different magistrates. She afterwards wept immoderately, and begged some one to blow her brains out with a pistol. At this moment, a poor woman, who, several years ago, was the kept mistress of a man of rank, and subsequently was considered one of the finest women that graced the saloons of the theatres, entered the office, with a letter in her hand, which was handed to the Magistrate. Lady Barymore having obtained a view of her, exclaimed, "Here is another poor unfortunate wretch like myself;" and, after some hesitation, she said, "we have been your victims, and now we may lie in a prison and rot." Mr. Halls read the letter, which was signed "Harborough;" and he directed the female to be informed that he could render her no assistance. She refused to quit the office, and was obliged to be ejected by force. Her name is Mrs. Smith. She was the kept mistress of a Noble Lord, and afterwards of Captain B. Since her protector, Captain B., deserted her, she has been in a deranged state, and calls herself "Lady Harborough." She has been confined in Marylebone Infirmary, but was turned out; and now she perambulates the street day and night, without any place to lay her head in. Her application to the Magistrate was to obtain his assistance in getting the restoration of some clothes, which are kept at a house where she lodged in Duke-street, Adelphi; but, as she owes rent, the Magistrate declined interfering.

Mary Ann Pearce was committed till the sessions, and a gentleman in the office gave a trifle to Mrs. Smith to relieve her present necessities.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Robbery at the Travellers' Club House.—Mr. Roe the sitting Magistrate, was occupied on Thursday till the evening, in the investigation of a very mysterious robbery, which was committed between the hours of six and nine on Wednesday morning, at the Travellers' Club House, Pall-mall. It appears that seven massive silver candlesticks, worth nearly 100l., the property of the Club, were stolen from out of a cupboard in the butler's pantry, by some persons who had obtained admittance to the house; but what renders the case a very singular one is, that although there are between 20 and 30 silver candlesticks of the same description on the dresser, yet they were left untouched, and those in the cupboard, amounting to seven (the key of which was turned), were carried off. On the robbery being discovered, the secretary to the Club applied at this office for assistance, and Clements and Schofield, two active officers, immediately proceeded to the Club-house to make inquiries, and apprehended two porters and four young chimney-sweeps, who had been employed in the house on the morning before the robbery was committed. They then swept all the chimneys except one, and the sweeps had appointed to come on the following morning, and finish the work. The prisoners were examined separately. One of the porters said, that about six o'clock in the morning he heard a knocking at the door, and he admitted three persons, whom he thought were sweeps. They did not speak to him, neither did he address them, and they passed up stairs. He understood that the sweeps were to come that morning, but he did not mention to any person that he expected them. He continued his business in the coffee-room, and he saw nothing of the men afterwards. He had been to various places to endeavour to find the sweeps, but without effect.

The watchman said that he observed three persons near the Travellers' Club-house, between five and six o'clock on Tuesday morning; one of them was a boy about 15 years of age, and he had a sack over his shoulder; they told him they were going to make some alterations in the Club-house. They went into King's-place, and he saw nothing more of them.

The sweeps protested that they were innocent, and the watchman and the porters were unable to identify them.

The Magistrate said that nothing appeared to criminate the sweeps, who might all be discharged; neither did he attach any guilt to the two young men, and they were liberated upon their promising to come forward again when required.

MARYLEBONE.—Thursday, John Joseph Stockdale, the publisher of Harriette Wilson's Memoirs, was summoned by the overseers of Acton, to appear before the magistrates at this office, in consequence of his refusing to pay the poor rates charged upon his residence in that village.

Mr. John Williamson, the assistant overseer, supported the claim of the parish, by proving that two rates were in arrear, one due at Michaelmas, and the other at Christmas last, amounting together to the sum of 5l. 13s. 10d., and

Mr. Rawlinson called upon Stockdale for his answer.

There can be no question, said Stockdale, that I am brought here, not by the overseers, but by my landlord; he has obtained unjust possession of my house, and the very day after a new trial is granted, I am summoned before you, Sir, for no other purpose than to annoy me.

Mr. Rawlinson asked the assistant overseer, if there was ground for such an imputation?

Mr. Williams replied, certainly not; for not only Mr. Stockdale, but many others, had been summoned as defaulters, according to the custom of the parish.

Mr. Stockdale then said the parish officers had taken up a new line of policy; for, when he became an occupant, they came upon him, as the occupier, for his predecessor's arrears, telling him that they had a right to come upon the premises for payment. If so, then why did they not now go upon the premises, and obtain payment of Mr. Winter?

Mr. Williamson—The house is empty.

Mr. Stockdale—A person sleeps there.

Mr. Rawlinson—How long has Mr. Stockdale quitted the premises, and when was the rate made?

Mr. Williamson—The rate was made in October, and Mr. Stockdale left about two weeks before Christmas.

Mr. Rawlinson—Then, I think, Mr. Stockdale, you are liable to pay it. What do you propose? Do you want time? I believe it is usual to grant 14 days.

Mr. Stockdale—I expect to be in the house again very soon, and I will then pay it.

Mr. Rawlinson—That won't do.

Mr. Stockdale—Then I propose for them to go upon the premises, where a great deal of my property is left.

Mr. Williamson—Mr. Winter states that there is not a shilling's worth of your property there.

Mr. Stockdale—Mr. Winter says there is no property of mine there! Why, there are ten sacks of potatoes! and surely that is sufficient to pay your rate.

Mr. Rawlinson said, the parish had nothing to do with the dispute between Mr. Stockdale and his landlord, and ordered him to pay the rate.

Mr. Stockdale requested the indulgence of a month, which was granted.

The third edition of the new novel of "Almack's" will be ready for delivery on Wednesday next.

A General Meeting of the Coroners of England and Wales was held on Thursday, at the Exchequer Coffee-house, Palace-yard, for the purpose of preparing a Petition to Parliament, to amend some of the provisions of the old statute respecting the mode of electing coroners, the duties imposed upon, and the amount of fees or salaries paid to these officers. Reporters were excluded, but we were informed that a petition to Parliament, praying the payment of larger fees on inquests, was adopted, without, of course, any discussion.

Truckleborough Hall.—By drawing the portraits of a nobleman in possession of the patronage of a borough containing some fifty electors—his son, one of the members—Mr. Turnstile, a convenient politician—and citizen North, one rather more stern and uncomprising at first, but who wriggles himself, at last, to a seat on the Treasury benches—the author of this diverting Work has exposed the almost universal hollowness of political pretensions, and has shown that what many people imagine to be opinion, is, in reality motive.

A forgery of considerable extent, in which the agent to a Scotch distillery house, residing at Hull, is deeply implicated, has been discovered during the week.—The accused party has absconded.—York Herald.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

Hamburgh Papers to the 29th ult. were received yesterday. They contain no intelligence of public interest; but we extract a few miscellaneous paragraphs:—

"BERLIN, JAN. 24.—His Majesty's recovery proceeds in the most favourable manner; but is said to be his Majesty's wish to keep the foot bound up for a fortnight longer than the physicians at first thought necessary, in order that the cure may be more certain. We hear that the King will go to Toplitz as early as the beginning of May.

"The King has appointed M. Andrew Richet, in Cape Town, Consul at that place.

"The funeral of Lieut.-General Von Brauchitsch, Governor of Berlin, who died on the 19th, took place yesterday, quite privately, according to his own direction. Only an hour before his death, he received the discharge which he had solicited from the King's service.

"ST. PETERSBURG, JAN. 13.—On the 10th of this month the Royal Academy of Sciences celebrated its 100th anniversary in the presence of their Imperial Majesties.

"On the 6th the Gallery of Russian Generals, of which we spoke in our last, was consecrated in the following manner:—The subalterns and privates of the regiments of the Guards who served in 1812, 13, and 14, were assembled, with their standards, in the Hall of St. George, and the White Saloon; during the liturgy, thanksgivings were recited in both the halls. When their Majesties and their Imperial Family came out of the church, they proceeded to the new gallery, where only those Officers and Generals were assembled who had the medals of 1812 and 1814. After the performance of the hymn for the late Emperor Alexander, and prayers for the welfare and long life of the present Emperor, the gallery was sprinkled with holy water. Henceforward the standards of the Guards are to be preserved in it, the places for which were fixed by the Emperor, under the inscription 'Borodino Tarutino Klastzi Krasmoje.' After the ceremony was over, the subalterns and privates were admitted into the gallery; it was pleasing to hear these veterans, as they recognised the features of the Generals who had shared their hardships and dangers, repeat their names, and relate to each other their great actions in the field."

We understand that the Count de Ofalia comes forthwith to London, to occupy the post of Spanish Ambassador at this Court.

We understand that several Gentlemen of the Bar aspire to the honour of filling the office of Counsel to the City of London, upon the next vacancy. Mr. A. Ryland, Mr. Robert Scarlett, son of the King's Counsel, and Mr. Jardine, are amongst the number.

The health of the celebrated composer Beethoven appears, by the most recent letters from Vienna, to be in a most deplorable state. He is laid up with a dropsy in the abdomen; and though the operation of tapping has been performed, the physicians have pronounced him to be in extreme danger.

Monday being the Anniversary of the Accession of his Majesty to the Throne, the morning was ushered in with the ringing of bells. The Standard of England was hoisted on the steeples of several of the Churches and public buildings. The Park and Tower guns fired a double royal salute upon the occasion. The Judges at Westminster Hall appeared in scarlet robes—the King's Sergeants were attired in purple. The bells continued ringing until a late hour at night.

Mr. Williams Wynn has given one of the Writerships, which have devolved upon him as President of the Board of Controul, as a prize to be contended for by the boys at the Westminster School. The competition is to be open to all, whether King's scholars or town boys, in the two upper forms, who may be disposed to enter the lists; and the boy who passes the best examination, is to bear away the prize. The election will take place in the course of the ensuing week. Dr. Goodenough (the head master of the School), has, with great propriety, declined to decide on the merits of the respective candidates; and the examinations are to be conducted by scholars of eminence, selected from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, with whom the Principal of the East India College at Hayleybury is to be associated. This donation of Mr. Williams Wynn will speak for itself—it appears eminently to combine gratitude towards the seat of his own education, and munificence, in the disposal of his patronage, with very enlarged views of policy towards British India.

EXTRAORDINARY WILL.—The late Mr. Ellerby, the surgeon, who died at his house in Broad-street, on Monday, has left a will, the contents of which have created much conversation in the medical world. He has directed that his body should be conveyed immediately after his decease to the new Anatomical Theatre, in Aldersgate-street, erected for the use of Messrs. Lawrence, Tyrrell, and Wardrop, and dissected, in order that the cause of his protracted illness (supposed to have been some affection of the heart) should be ascertained. He then bequeaths his heart to one anatomist, his lungs to another, and his brains to a third, to be preserved by them, and concludes by saying, that unless this part of his will is faithfully executed, he will, if possible, come and torment those deputed to the perfomance of the duty imposed on them. Mr. Ellerby was a man of some acquirements, and did not turn his thoughts to the profession until at an advanced age. He was an active Member of the Committee appointed by the General Meeting of the Members of the College of Surgeons, held at the Freemasons' Hall, for the purpose of petitioning Parliament for a redress of certain grievances now experienced by the body of Surgeons. He was a Member of the Society of Friends, and a man of singular habits.

IMPROVEMENTS OF LONDON.—One of the most important plans for the improvement of our capital has just been finally sanctioned. A Minute has passed the Treasury Board, authorising the erection of a Terrace from Storey's Gate, up the Bird Cage Walk, along the whole of the south side of the Park, to Pimlico. This will be in unison with the Terrace on the opposite side, from Spring Gardens westward; and thus, with the King's new Palace at one end, and the Horse Guards and other architectural public buildings at the other, form St. James's Park into one Grand Square. In the centre, the canal is to be reduced and diverted into picturesque windings, instead of its present formal and uninteresting shape. The marshy ground is to be drained and disposed into parterres, shrubberies, and other ornamental designs. Thus we shall at last have a delightful promenade in London, vying in size and attractions with the Gardens of the Tuilleries or Luxembourg.

In consequence of many depredations having been recently committed in the neighbourhood of Alresford, Hants, a strong suspicion arose that the various kinds of property stolen, were conveyed to London, and a warrant was therefore obtained to search a road-waggon from Alresford, for turkies taken from the poultry-house of the Rev. F. North, at Old Alresford, which had been broken open. The officers overtook the waggon a little beyond Bagshot, and, on searching the same, discovered a great number of hares and partridges. On being about to relinquish the search, they observed the leg of a hare sticking out of some pea-haum near the spot where the waggon then stood; and, upon removing part of it, the turkies, with a number of hares, were found. The waggoner, who had left his vehicle, and was riding on the coach, having observed the constable at Bagshot, proceeded forward while the coach changed horses, and concealed the game and turkies. He afterwards admitted that the property had been in the waggon, and that he purchased the whole the preceding evening, knowing it to have been stolen, of a man named Walker, who is now in custody with the waggoner, for trial at the next Sessions. The waggoner has carried on similar proceedings for some years, and has recently been twice convicted of offences against the Game Laws.

MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK.

On Friday the Provisional Committee for arranging the Public General Meeting, in aid of the Subscription for the above object, met at the Freemasons' Tavern. The meeting was attended by a number of persons of distinction, among whom there were several General Officers. The business of the day commenced by the reading of numerous letters, containing the strongest assurances of active co-operation from many exalted characters. Among the number, there were communications from his Grace the Duke of Portland, the Right Hon. the Earl of Chatham, Lord George Beresford, Sir William Curtis, &c. who, together with Gen. Maitland, who was present, were added to the Committee.

It was then determined that Messrs. Coutts and Co., and Curtis and Co., should be treasurers to the fund—that his Grace the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Londonderry, the Earls of Harcourt and Chatham, Lords Rolle and George Beresford, and Sir William Curtis, be urgently solicited to become Trustees—that the Bankers in London be requested to receive subscriptions, and that no part thereof should be withdrawn without the sanction of two or more of the said Trustees in writing—and that application should be made to several other distinguished persons to give their names and services to the Committee.

It was then communicated to the meeting, that the Royal Union Association, which had been formed under the patronage of the late Duke of York, as a testimony of its gratitude for his Royal Highness's kindness, begged that the Committee would make use of its Board Rooms during the whole business of the subscription, free of expence.

It was resolved, that the offer of the Association be accepted, and that the Committee in future sit at the Royal Union Office, in Lancaster-place, Waterloo-bridge.

It was further determined, that as it was desirable to concentrate the subscription of the whole kingdom in one grand national object, instead of dividing the public feeling into various testimonials of respect, the numerous counties, towns, and cities, in Great Britain and its dependencies, should be invited to meet in aid of the general subscription, and forward the amount, from time to time, to the Committee in London, the more especially as the present afforded the most eligible opportunity of raising some splendid trophy in honour of the British Army, whose courage, discipline, and success, under the auspices of its late illustrious Commander-in-Chief, had justly gained for it the admiration and respect of the whole world.

General Maitland was solicited to act as Honorary Secretary; and, after some other arrangements, the public general meeting was fixed for Monday, February 26, at the Freemasons' Hall, and the Committee adjourned to Friday next.

A great excitement has been occasioned in the political world by the appearance of a publication under the title of "The Posthumous Letter of His Royal Highness the Duke of York." Sir Herbert Taylor, one of the executors of the Royal deceased, has disavowed it, and many of the Journals have done the same. Mr. Clerc Smith has, however, fulfilled his promise, and put forth the Third Edition, with Observations to establish its indentity.—The Letter relates to—Wardle's Accusations—The late Duke's Speech in Parliament, and his reasons for it—his opinions on Catholic Emancipation and Catholic Consolidation—and the peculiar situation of the Blood Royal in money matters.

On Saturday se'nnight, Mr. Sergeant Vaughan came into the Court of Exchequer to move for a new trial in a cause which was tried at the assizes; his appearance excited some curiosity, as it is generally believed that the Learned Gentleman will succeed Mr. Baron Graham, who retires. On taking his seat at the table, Mr. Jervis said, "Come, come, brother Vaughan, take your seat at the bench, you are but one step from it."

Thursday evening an inquest was held at the Grange, Carey-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, on the body of Mary Gee, who was killed by an accidental fall down a flight of stairs, while in a state of intoxication. Mr. Cosgrove, a surgeon, of Surrey-street, in the Strand, said the deceased had a severe wound on the back part of the head, which produced a depression of the brain. She died about ten hours after the accident. He had subsequently removed the upper part of the skull, in order to ascertain the nature of the injury. Several of the jurors here simultaneously expressed their displeasure of his having done so. They considered it highly improper, as it was one part of their duty to take a view of the body in the state in which it was left by death; and they were rendered unable so to do by his conduct in opening the skull. The witness, in explanation, said he had done it to prepare himself to answer any questions that might be proposed. He was sorry he had thereby incurred their displeasure; he had done it for the best. The Coroner said he certainly was wrong in doing so; it appeared, however, from what he had stated, that he had erred through mistake.—The Jury returned a verdict of Accidental Death; and accompanied their verdict by a resolution, expressive of their disapprobation of the conduct of the medical gentleman in opening the head.

FISTULÆ AND PILES.—The following Case is one of recent occurrence, and an undoubted proof of the abilities of Mr. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur, No. 2, Half Moon-street, Piccadilly, which can be attested by a Gentleman of respectability, on application to him, at Mr. Miller's, No. 3, Little Windmill-street, Golden-square, who is induced to give it this publicity, with the hope that it may be of benefit to many individuals so afflicted, by informing them where to apply for a safe, speedy, and permanent cure:—

"Having been afflicted with those dreadful complaints for more than eighteen years, during which period I was under the care of different eminent surgeons, and underwent five operations without effect, I mentioned the circumstance to a friend, who told me Mr. Van Butchell was particularly distinguished for the cure of these complaints, by a mode of treatment peculiar to himself. I was, therefore, induced to place myself under his care, and, in the short space of six weeks, without cutting, caustic, confinement, or restraint of diet, I have the happiness to acknowledge myself now perfectly cured. "J. P. C."

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 228, Regent-street, and 16, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 21., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

CHOCOLATE of the finest Quality, 3s. per lb.—COCOA-NUTS, the finest Grenada, 2s. per lb.—The Public are respectfully informed they may now purchase the above-mentioned Articles, warranted of the finest quality, at MARSHALL and Co.'s Tea and Coffee Warehouse No. 12, Southampton-street, Strand. Also, Turkey Coffee, warranted of the finest Quality, at 3s. per lb.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of "MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is strongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

Warehouse, 107, Strand, corner of the Savoy Steps.—The Original Fish-Sauce Warehouse.

SORE THROATS, HOARSENESS, &c.

BUTLER'S ACIDULATED CAYENNE LOZENGES, are particularly recommended for habitual sore Throats; relaxation of the Uvula; enlargement of the Tonsils, and that description of hoarseness which arises from relaxation of the membranes of the Throat, and the parts contiguous.

The Cayenne Lozenge has been found of great utility to such Persons as are frequently in the habit of speaking in Public; they may therefore advantageously be used in the Senate, at the Bar, and in the Pulpit, and the highest testimony in the Musical World has been advanced in their favour, especially in those cases, where, from the constant use of the voice, or the influence of a humid atmosphere, the membranes have become relaxed, and diminished in their tone.

These Lozenges are also recommended as a stimulus, during Field Sports: they are refreshing, and prevent sore Throats, Hoarseness, &c. to those who are unaccustomed to exposure in the morning, before the dew has passed off, and in the moist and foggy evenings.

Sold in Boxes, at 2s. and 4s. 6d. by Messrs. BUTLER, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Wilmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom, where may be had BUTLER'S ANTIACID LOZENGES of QUININE, for relieving Heartburn, Flatulence, Indigestion, Gouty Affections, and giving tone to the Stomach. In Boxes at 2s. and 4s. 6d.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhœa, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases, together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author. Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add, as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

BILIOUS AND LIVER COMPLAINTS.

AS a mild and effectual remedy for all those disorders which originate in a morbid action of the Liver and Biliary organs, namely, Indigestion, loss of Appetite, Headache, Heartburn, Flatulencies, Spasms, Costiveness, Affections of the Liver, &c. &c. DIXON'S ANTIBILIOUS PILLS (which do not contain mercury in any shape) have met with more general approval than any other Medicine whatsoever. They unite every recommendation of mild operation with successful effect; and require no restraint or confinement whatever during their use. In tropical climates, where the consequences of redundant and vitiated bile are so prevalent and alarming, they are an invaluable and efficient protection. They are likewise peculiarly calculated to correct disorders arising from excesses at the table, to restore the tone of the stomach, and to remove most complaints occasioned by irregularity of the bowels.

Sold in Boxes at 2s. 9d.; 4s. 6d.; 11s.; and 22s.; by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-st. Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Willmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom.

NEW and FASHIONABLE MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, patronised by the King and the Royal Family.—J. EGAN's Improved Royal Portable Irish Harps (the most graceful and perfect instruments of the kind ever invented) are played on in as many keys as the Pedal, possess its general advantages (the strings, &c. being similar) and are not one third the price or size. They are admirably adapted for performers on the Pedal Harp, for taking abroad, or for accompanying the Voice or Pianoforte. Sold at 2, Wilton-street, Grosvenor Place, London, where the necessary Instructions and Lessons on the Instrument are given. Every appendage for the Harp, also "Egan's Harp Director," price 10s. 6d. and various other new Compositions.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

Warehouse, 107, Strand, corner of the Savoy Steps.—The Original Fish-Sauce Warehouse.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.

C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of

"MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."

C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.

C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is strongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.

To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Borough, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—Feb. 8.

Their Lordships met to-day at four o'clock; and the Bishop of Landaff, the Duke of Richmond, Earl Cathcart, Earl Nelson, Lord Colchester, and several other Peers, took the oaths and their seats.

The Duke of RICHMOND presented a Petition from the Owners and Occupiers of Land in the Western Division of the County of Sussex, complaining, that by the alterations made in the laws relative to wool, large quantities of that article were imported from abroad, so that they could not dispose of their stocks, and that though they were suffering severely from the reduction in the price of wool, the woollen manufacturer was not benefitted, nor the price of woollens reduced: the petitioners therefore prayed that their Lordships would take the state of the laws, which regulated the importation of wool, into their consideration.

The Duke of RICHMOND presented Petitions from the Occupiers of Land in the several Hundreds of Westbourn, Aldwick, Box, and Southwick, and two others, all praying that there might be no alteration in the Corn Laws. The Petitions were all respectably signed. They were, however, signed exclusively by the occupiers of land, who had refused to allow them to be signed by one landowner, because it had been said that nobody but landowners, who were anxious to keep rents high, petitioned against an alteration of the Corn Laws, and these occupiers of land had therefore come forward to express their opinion against any alteration of the law.

Lord REDESDALE presented a similar Petition from Stow-on-the-Wold, Gloucestershire. The petitioners represented to their Lordships, the Noble Lord said, that they had been induced, under the sanction of the law, to expend large sums of money in improving their lands, which, if foreign corn were imported, would be lost to them. The petitioners also complained, like the petitioners whose prayer another Noble Duke had presented to their Lordships, of the importation of wool. They stated that the price of wool had remunerated them for keeping an additional number of sheep, by which, on our present improved system of farming, the quantity of corn grown had been increased; but that the price had now sunk so low that they could no longer keep up large flocks, and their cultivation must be deteriorated. While they regretted this, they observed that the price of woollen cloths had not fallen. The petitioners also complained of the importation of hides, which had beat down the price of their cattle, but they found leather no cheaper.—The Petition was read, and laid on the Table.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL, in rising, wished first, in order to prevent any misunderstanding, to inform their Lordships that public business would always commence in future, as formerly, at five o'clock. The Noble Earl then said, he rose to give notice, that on Monday next he should move an Address of Condolence to his Majesty on his late melancholy loss; and he was sure that every one of their Lordships who heard him would participate in that sentiment. The Noble Earl moved, "That their Lordships be summoned for Monday."—Ordered.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL then gave notice, that he would, on Monday, the 19th instant, or on some day not remote from the 19th, bring under their Lordships' consideration the subject of the Corn Laws.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE said that he had heard no arguments throughout the country, from the Ministers' own friends, against those who opposed the alteration of the Corn Laws; but a declaration that they were ignorant what the Ministers meant to do, and that it would be time enough to petition against their measure when it was known. If the country was only to know what the Ministers' propositions were to be after they were settled in both Houses of Parliament, he would say the country was not dealt fairly by. He thought, after the propositions were made, not only the two Houses should have time to consider them, but the people ought to have time to examine them, and express their opinion on the subject. If they had not time for this, they would be entrapped into suffering a measure to pass without expressing their opinion, which, he would say, was one of the most important to the welfare of the country, both politically and economically, ever agitated.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL felt as much as the Noble Lord the importance of the subject; but he could not suppose that he (the Earl of Liverpool) meant to do any thing so improper as to call on their Lordships to agree to whatever propositions he might make on the day they were submitted to the House. On the day he had already named, or on some early day afterwards, he should bring the subject under the consideration of their Lordships, and should state the opinions entertained by the Government; and he should then be ready to attend to any reasonable suggestion as to the period of the discussion. He had no intention whatever, he could assure the Noble Lord, of proposing Resolutions to their Lordships, and calling on them the same day to agree to them.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE, at the hazard of being thought pertinacious, must repeat that his observations were not directed to the time of passing the measure through the two Houses. He did not suppose that the Noble Earl would ask their Lordships to decide on the day he submitted the propositions to them; but he hoped that a reasonable delay would take place after the propositions were made known, so as to give the public sufficient time to express their opinion. The Noble Earl, he thought, could not have misunderstood him, for he had prefaced his observations by remarking, that the only argument of the adherents of Ministers out of doors was, "wait till you see the propositions, before you decide on them." If the public were not to have time to consider them after they were known, and before they were passed, what use was there in telling them to wait? It reminded him of something which happened to his father-in-law. He had ordered his coach one day, and was just getting in, when his coachman came to advise him that he must get another coachman, for he had been married the day before, and could not serve him any longer. If the two houses were to be wedded to the Resolutions first, they would, before being made known, be placed beyond the influence of public opinion. He wished, therefore, that the Noble Earl should, after the propositions were made known, allow the public a sufficient time to consider them.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL did not know what the Noble Lord meant by a sufficient time; but he would state, that after submitting the propositions to their Lordships, he should allow a reasonable time to elapse before calling on their Lordships to take them into consideration.

The LORD CHANCELLOR gave notice that he should, tomorrow, move to have the order which had been made for hearing an appeal on Monday next discharged, and that he should, at the same time, move that an account of all appeals now depending should be laid before their Lordships.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Lord CLIFDEN presented a petition from the Catholics of Aughagower, in the county of Mayo. He felt it his duty, in presenting this first petition of a great many that would be afterwards laid upon their Lordships' table, to call their attention to a few observations he had to offer upon it. It was now two years since the Catholic question had been discussed. A general election had taken place, and a great change had taken place in Ireland, where the Orange power had greatly fallen, particularly in Waterford, in which, in one week, the Catholics destroyed and crushed the influence of the most opulent family in Ireland. In Louth they defeated the oldest politician in Ireland, Lord Oriel; and in Westmeath, Dublin, and other places, their success had been great. In Armagh, that cradle of Orangeism, their triumph had been still greater. The present Member, Mr. Brownlow, after having voted against the Catholics for two years, had, at length, changed his opinions, and voted for them. The triumph of the Catholic was great in that place. It had been the fashion to abuse the Catholic priests. God save the mark! If he had seen any of the Rev. Bishops present, he should have said more on this subject. However, the parsons brawl without measure. There had been an instance in the late election of one of them attacking a candidate, and clergymen had interfered in different places during the course of the election. The conduct of the Catholic priests, on the other hand, was beyond all praise. The Noble Viscount said he should now read a paragraph from a newspaper, which had been published and circulated for 40 days previous to the election. The paragraph which the Noble Lord read was an appeal to the Catholics to read and reflect upon the laws by which they were excluded from taking a seat in Parliament, or holding an office under Government. It stated that all liberal Protestants, as well as every Catholic, were united in wishing to have those laws by which an invocation to the Virgin Mary, or any other Saint, was decided to be idolatrous, repealed; and that none but Orangemen desired to have them continued. It stated that the question to be decided in the next Parliament was, whether those laws should remain, and reminded the Catholics that if they voted for a candidate who was opposed to their claims being granted them, they voted against themselves. The Noble Lord thought that men who could write what he had just read would not allow themselves to be crushed. Their Lordships all recollected the advice that had been given to his Majesty, to recommend it to Parliament to put down the Catholic Association. Had the project succeeded? No. And what was the reason that Parliament had thus been defeated? It was because the men who composed the Catholic Association spoke the sentiments of millions. The Irish House of Commons could not crush those who spoke the sentiments of the population in the year 1793, and it might be recollected how the Ministers were frightened out of their wits, and how Pitt —— multa gemens, which might be translated, howling and groaning—was struck dead with fear, when he heard of General Humbert's expedition. It would be for ever impossible to crush the Catholic Association. If that body consisted only of 20 or 30 individuals, their Lordships might succeed, but they could not prevent the complaints of millions from being heard. The only way to do that, was to remove the cause of their complaints—to do them justice. As to the complaints against the Catholic priests, he could not see why they should not interfere when our own clergy disgraced themselves by raising the cry of "No popery." That cry had, however, lost its power. The people of this country had now more vital interests affecting them. They were now groaning, in the twelfth year of peace, under a debt of 800,000,000l., and an expenditure of 30,000,000l. He trusted to God that the question of the Catholic claims would come up again this session from the House of Commons. If their Lordships persisted in refusing their concurrence, they would render themselves the laughing-stock of the country. Even the Holy Alliance had not ventured to embark upon religious questions, and there were 100,000,000 of people in Europe free from such exclusive laws. Would their Lordships persist in continuing what the very Holy Allies had refrained from imposing? It should be recollected, too, that a communication with Ireland by the means of steam was now easy, and that France looked with delight upon the spirit of disunion that prevailed in that country. We had told France that it had plenty of discontented subjects. What said Chateaubriand? He replied that we had more. Three hundred and eighty men from Bedlam could not behave worse than their Lordships, if they still persisted in refusing the Catholic claims. He would ask the Noble Lord on the woolsack if it was likely there ever would be an end to the discussion of the question, but by granting the Catholics their rights. He (Lord Clifden) was far on his journey to the other world; but wo to those who came after him if this question should be undecided. He understood that there was to be a prosecution of Mr. Shiel, for the language he had used at a Catholic Meeting. Mr. Shiel had, however, under-stated the danger which attended the expedition of General Humbert. Those days, however, were passed. He would recommend their Lordships to read Mr. Shiel's speech. It would be seen that the speaker had no other motive than the peace and tranquillity of Ireland. The Noble Viscount then moved that the petition be laid on the table.—Ordered.

The Noble Viscount also presented Petitions to the same effect from the parishes of St. James, Tintoug, Rosegarden, and Inch, in the county of Wexford.

FRIDAY, Feb. 9.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN presented Petitions from the Guildry of Dundee, praying for an alteration in the Corn Laws; from Burford, Oxfordshire; from Hendon, Wiltshire; and from Chobham, praying for a mitigation of Negro Slavery in the West Indies. He wished to take that opportunity of giving notice to the House, that he had a number of Petitions to present on the important subject of the state of his Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects. It was not material for their Lordships to be informed on what day he should submit to their consideration the local Petitions which he had in his possession; but he thought it might be convenient for the House to know that it was his intention on Wednesday next to present the general Petition of the Roman Catholics, and also one from the Roman Catholic Bishops. He gave this notice, not because it was his intention to go into the merits of the general question, but because he meant to point out a course which he wished to suggest for the adoption of the House.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE presented Petitions from the Merchants and Traders of Montrose Corn Market; from the Dundee, Brechin, and Arbroath districts of Forfarshire; and from Sherborne, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, against any alteration in the Corn Laws.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Feb. 8.

The Speaker took the Chair at four o'clock.

A considerable number of Members, not previously sworn, took the oaths and their seats.

Mr. HIRST moved for a new writ for the Borough of Horsham, in the room of the Honourable Mr. Fox; who, since his election, has accepted the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.—Ordered.

A new writ was also ordered for the Borough of Cockermouth, in the room of Carus Wilson, Esq.; who, since his election, has accepted the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

An Account of the Number of Causes entered in the Court of Exchequer, with those tried during the last seven years, was brought up, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON PRIVATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER said, before entering upon private business, he felt it necessary to inform the House, that he had ordered fresh lists to be made out of the Members to be called upon to serve on Committees on Private Bills, the former mode of appointing those Committees having been very irregular. The principles upon which he had endeavoured to equalise the Members for the different counties brought the numbers down to 120 for each. The mode in which the lists were made out was this: by the Members of the County from which the Private Bill came, and to their number were added as many from the adjacent Counties as made up 60; to that 60 were added from the more distant Counties, in order to make each Committee as general as possible. He had delivered the lists so made up to the Clerk of the House, and from those lists the Committees on the different Private Bills would be appointed.

BOROUGH OF DENBIGH.

Mr. SPENCE presented a Petition from John Heaton, Esq., and other Electors of the Borough of Denbigh, who had petitioned against the return of the Honourable F. R. West for that borough. The petitioner Heaton stated, that he had, through the omission of his agent, omitted to comply with the forms of the Act of the 53d George III., in consequence of which the time allowed by law, for entering into the necessary securities, had expired. The Honourable Member was proceeding to read the Petition at length, when he was interrupted by cries of "Order, order—Chair, chair."

The SPEAKER informed the Hon. Member, that it was contrary to the forms of the House for any Member to read a Petition at length upon presenting it; a question might arise as to whether a Petition described to the House should be received, and, if read at all, it should be read by the clerk.—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. SPENCE went on to observe, that the petitioner had petitioned the House in the usual form, and that upon attending at the Speaker's office, to comply with the forms of the 28th Geo. III. as he understood he was bound to do, he was informed that that was not sufficient, but that he must comply with the 53d Geo. III., which requires the petitioner to enter into his own recognizances for 1000l. and give two sureties for 500l. each; that the time allowed by law for such purpose being nearly expired, and his place of residence being more than 200 miles distant, he petitioned the House for further time within which to comply with the necessary forms, the prayer of which Petition the House had not thought proper to grant. Petitioner re-stated the circumstances which had caused the delay, and prayed, that as they were merely forms inadvertently passed over by his agent, and from the omission to comply with which no injury had been done or prejudice created, further time might be allowed to him, as otherwise the merits of the case, which he bound himself to establish, could never be entered into.

The SPEAKER said, that the only course in such a case was to have the truth of the statements contained in the Petition verified upon oath, and then the House would deal with it as they should think proper.

Mr. SPENCE said, that the Petition had only been put into his hands a short time before he entered the House, or else he should have taken care to have the truth of its contents properly authenticated. He should therefore move, that the agent should be called to the bar and examined.

Mr. DAWSON did not think the prayer of the Petition could be granted. An important stipulation had been omitted, and that, too, by a person professing to understand and conduct the business of Election Petitions. Besides, the agent had been precisely in the same situation before he had been examined, and the House had decided against the prayer of the Petition. He, therefore, called upon the House to reject the Petition.

The SPEAKER said, that if the Petition were withdrawn, the original Order would be withdrawn, as a matter of course.

The Petition was withdrawn, and the former Order was discharged.

The SPEAKER reported, that Wm. Cobbett, Esq., who had presented a Petition, complaining of an undue election for the Borough of Preston, had not entered into the necessary recognizances to prosecute the same according to the directions of the Act. The Order for taking the Petition into consideration on a future day was of course discharged.

The SPEAKER reported, that James Paul Gee, Esq. had not entered into recognizances to prosecute his Petition, complaining of an undue return for the county of Waterford.

Mr. CROKER said, that he had been entrusted with a Petition from Mr. Gee, praying for further time to complete the recognizances, on the ground that some formality had been accidentally omitted. He should move that the debate on the Petition be deferred to a future day.

The Petition was then read. It stated that the name of one of the sureties had been inserted in an affidavit upon an erasure, which was considered by the proper officer an informality.

Mr. CROKER moved, "That the prayer of the Petition be pro forma complied with."

The SPEAKER remarked, that if the object were to take the discussion on a future day, it would not be necessary that the House should even pro forma consent to the prayer of the Petition.

Mr. WYNN enforced the necessity of uniformity in the practice of the House in cases of this kind. For this reason, previous decisions upon the same question ought to be examined. The general rule certainly was, that the House would not allow further time in cases of inattention or inadvertence.

Mr. BROUGHAM observed, that there could be no doubt as to the construction of the Act of Parliament; the order for taking the Petition into consideration was to be discharged, "unless, on matters specially stated to the satisfaction of the House, and verified on oath, the House shall see cause to enlarge the time for entering into such recognizances."

Mr. WYNN thought that the House had the power to fix the convenient time for examining the party on oath.

Mr. J. P. Gee was called in, and being sworn at the Bar, deposed to the truth of the contents of his Petition.

Mr. CROKER then moved, that the time for entering into recognizances be enlarged to the 1st March.

Mr. ABERCROMBY thought that the opposite party ought to have an opportunity, if they liked to avail themselves of it, of examining Mr. Gee again.

Mr. CROKER added, that he meant to adjourn further proceedings on the Petition to Tuesday next.

It was then ordered that the Petition be printed; and, on the motion of Mr. S. RICE, that the petitioner attend again on Tuesday.

The order for taking into consideration the Petition of Mr. Ogilvie, complaining of an undue return for Sudbury, was discharged for the want of recognizances.—The same Order was made for the same reason with regard to the Petition of John Darcy, Esq., which complained of an undue return for the County of Galway.—The Order on the Petition of C. P. Leslie, Esq. respecting the Monaghan Election, and the return of Mr. Westenra, was also discharged on a similar ground.—William Treweller not having entered into his recognizances, the order on his Petition, complaining of an undue return for the Borough of St. Ives, was discharged.—The Petition of Anthony Marmion, Esq. complaining of an undue return for Dundalk, not having been supported by recognizances, the order made upon it was discharged.

The Orders for the consideration of the Petitions against the Returns for the following places were discharged on account of the petitioners not having entered into the proper recognizances, in terms of the Act of Parliament, viz. the Borough of Denbigh, the Borough of Tregony, the Town of Kingston-upon-Hull, the Borough of Beverley, the County of Kerry, the County of Cavan, the County of Westmeath, and the Town of Galway.

The SPEAKER then stated, that having gone through the list of those cases which were regularly discharged on account of the non-compliance by the petitioners with the terms of the Act of Parliament, he had now to submit to the consideration of the House another class of cases, which might require further deliberation. In these cases, the names of the sureties had been transmitted, and the recognizances had been entered into in proper time, and in the proper manner, with this exception, that the recognizances had been executed, or purported to have been executed, before the expiration of the eight days' previous notice required by the Act of the 53d of the late King. This objection applied to the Petitions against the returns for Leominster, for Stirling, and the boroughs connected with it; for the town of Dover, and for the county of Limerick.—The discussion of these cases was adjourned till Tuesday next.

Mr. Secretary PEEL gave notice, that on Monday next he should move an Address of Condolence to the King, on the demise of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York.

THE CATHOLIC CLAIMS.

Mr. S. RICE presented several Petitions from the Catholic inhabitants of parishes in different parts of Ireland, praying for the concession of the Catholic Claims; one from the county of Mayo; another from the county of Tipperary; and three from the county, and one from the city, of Limerick.—Ordered to be printed.

Sir F. BURDETT then rose to present the general Petition of the Catholics of Ireland. This duty, he said, he was anxious to lose not a moment in performing, but he would not avail himself of that opportunity to make any preliminary remarks with reference to the general question, lest they should hereafter be productive of inconvenience in the debates that would ensue. He would content himself, therefore, with shortly expressing his regret at the absence of the Right Honourable Gentleman, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He was desirous, for his correct guidance in promoting this great question, to have had some communication with that Right Honourable Gentleman. It had become a matter of such pressing necessity—of such hourly growing importance (hear, bear,) that no consideration would induce him to delay bringing it before the House at the earliest period that public convenience would permit. In saying this, however, he felt that he could not then undertake to name any precise day for that purpose, though he would state, that the impression on his mind, as well as that on the minds of the petitioners, was, that no further delay should take place than was absolutely necessary, under all the circumstances that affected the discussion of the question (hear, hear). The Honourable Baronet concluded by declaring, that he earnestly hoped that it would be on a very early day that the Question would be brought forward, but at present he could not venture to fix it positively. He moved that the Petition be brought up.

Lord NUGENT, in seconding the motion, said, that he also had a Petition, with a similar prayer, to present to the House, from a distinguished and very considerable body of British subjects. He would take that opportunity of stating that the Petition to which he alluded was in a course of signature amongst the Catholics of England and Scotland, He would be guilty of injustice towards them, if he did not add, that he entirely concurred in the spirit that animated them, viz.—that of the warmest and deepest sympathy with their fellow-sufferers in Ireland. (Hear, hear.) The only reason why this Petition was not then presented was, that it had not yet received the full amount of expected signatures.

The general Petition of the Catholics of Ireland was then brought up and read. It was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Duncombe presented a Petition from the Owners and Occupiers of Land in the North Riding of Yorkshire, against any alteration in the Corn Laws.—Lord G. Lenox presented similar Petitions from five places in the county of Sussex.—Colonel Torrens presented a Petition from the Inhabitants of London and Westminster, praying for the repeal of the Corn Laws.—Mr. Hume presented a Petition to the same effect from the Magistrates of the Royal Burgh of Arbroath.

Sir G. CLERK brought up the Navy Estimates for the present year. They were ordered to be printed. The Hon. Baronet then gave notice, that he would move for a Supply on Monday.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, Feb. 9.

Mr. HARE rose to present a Petition from the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Listwell, in the county of Kerry, praying for a removal of all those civil disabilities under which persons of their religious persuasion laboured. The Hon. Gentlemen begged leave, although there was no specific question before the House, to make a few observations on this occasion. He had himself witnessed the many evils which resulted from the system of exclusion which was acted on towards his Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. All the disunion, ill-feeling, and animosity, public and private, which prevailed in Ireland, might be traced to that source. (Hear.) And, for his own part, he could not conceive how permanent tranquillity could be secured in Ireland so long as such a penal code was suffered to exist. (Hear.) It was assuredly a matter of infinite moment to conciliate the feelings of the people of Ireland, and by that means to restore peace, order, and unanimity; and he thought that nothing could effect that most desirable object but complete and unqualified eman ipation. (Hear.) Such a measure might truly be said to carry its own security along with it, since (independent of oaths or pledges) it was calculated to excite the warm gratitude, to draw forth the friendly and affectionate feelings, of the millions for whose benefit it was intended. (Hear.) It might be said, as it had been said by the opponents of this measure, that if the Legislature gave more extended civil rights to the Roman Catholics, such a proceeding would destroy the great bulwarks of the Constitution. Now, he was as ardently attached to the Constitution as any man could be; he gloried in it as the proudest boast of the country; and if granting a participation in all its immunities to his Roman Catholic fellow-subjects was likely, in the slightest degree, to impair the Constitution, he certainly would oppose any further concession. But he denied the assertion. Such a measure would strengthen, instead of weakening, the Constitution (hear); and he could not see how it was incompatible with the safety of that Constitution to admit those who bore their full share of the taxes and burdens of the State to a full participation in all civil rights and privileges. (Hear.)—The Petition was then read, and laid on the table.

Mr. LLOYD presented fourteen petitions in favour of Catholic emancipation, from different towns, parishes, and united parishes in the county of Limerick.—Laid on the table.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL presented a petition from Cheltenham against any further concession to the Roman Catholics.

Mr. BROWNLOW presented a petition from the Roman Catholics of the parish of Cammus, county of Tyrone, in favour of Catholic emancipation.—Laid on the table.

Mr. HERRIES presented a petition from Harwich against the Catholic claims.

Sir F. BURDETT gave notice, that he would on Thursday, the 22d instant, submit a motion to the House on the subject of the Roman Catholic claims. And he now moved that on the day which he had named the House should be called over.—The motion was agreed to without observation.

Mr. HUME said, he now rose to present a petition, which was certainly couched in very strong language; but the letter by which it was accompanied expressed a hope that the House would not cavil at strong language when it came from men who were in a starving condition. The petitioners described themselves as "the starving weavers of Blackburn and its neighbourhood;" and the petition set forth, that for the last two years they had not had half the food which was necessary for their subsistence; that hundreds of their wives and children had died of want; that the average earnings of a weaver amounted to no more than 5s. a week; that where two persons had work, in a family of six, they earned but 10s. a week, and even to procure that, they were obliged to toil daily for 16 hours; they therefore called for a repeal of the corn laws, for the reduction of the military establishment, for the abolition of useless places, for the discontinuance of unearned pensions, and for the better application of the enormous revenues of the church. All these desirable objects (and in his view of the matter they were most desirable) could not, the petitioners observed, be effected without a reform in that House; and they besought the House to commence the God-like work of reform before the arrival of that crisis of difficulty and danger which was rapidly approaching. The petitioners observed, that endurance beyond a certain point became a crime, and at that point they had arrived. They were in a state which they could not bear much longer; they were dying daily, and under such circumstances it would be criminal to remain any longer silent.

The petition was then read. In addition to the points which had been noticed by Mr. Hume, the petitioners further alleged that a standing army was kept up "to murder the people if they complained;" that the corn laws were carried while large bodies of soldiers were stationed round the House; that all their evils arose from the want of reform in Parliament; and therefore they called for reform by ballot and universal suffrage.—The petition was laid on the table.

LEOMINSTER ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved that the House in this case should allow the recognizances to have been duly entered into; the spirit of the Act of the 53d George III., which requires eight days' notice between the naming of the sureties and their final acceptance, having, in his opinion, been complied with.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was of opinion, that the real intent of the Act had been satisfied; and that the party petitioned against had sustained no loss or inconvenience by the course pursued.

Sir E LLOYD was of the same opinion.

Mr. BERNAL thought that the spirit of the Act was not sufficient: the petitioner was bound to abide by the strict letter, which had not been done.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL thought that the course taken had been satisfactory.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS differed from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman.

Mr. C. W. WYNN supported the view of the Attorney and Solicitor-General.

Mr. Lockart and Mr. Carter supported the motion, and Mr. Abercromby opposed it.

The House then divided, when the numbers appeared

For the motion, 59 | Against it, 21 | Majority, 38.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PORTUGAL.

The following official bulletins from Oporto contain the military operations of the army as late as the 17th ult. The bulletin of the latter date confirms the report of the complete overthrow of the rebels.

"Head-Quarters of the Oporto District, Jan. 14.

"General Mello, in his despatch of the 11th instant, dated from Villa Pouca, states that, on marching to occupy that place he experienced no resistance, the rebel militia having fled precipitately, some of them leaving even their arms behind them.

"He also states that a column of the squadron commanded by Colonel Zagallo, supported by the 6th and 9th cavalry, posted in Poldorada, had overcome considerable obstacles in advancing to the Boticas, where it, however, arrived, after beating the rebels, who lost 40 killed and 16 prisoners, including 7 wounded. General Mello intended to join the Marquis de Angeja in Villa Real on the 12th, and had marched for that purpose with part of his force.

"Colonel Serrao, commanding the bridge of Amarante, writes, under date of the 13th, that having detached 100 bayonets to occupy the position of Campean, the detachment found already there Captain Anselmo, of the 16th infantry, in command of a detachment from Colonel Vasconcellos's column, which had established itself in Villa Real, the rebel guerrillas on the side of the Regoa being dispersed.

"The Military Governor of Oliveira de Azemeis writes, on the 13th, that the reconnoitring officer on the points of Manhuce and Gralheira confirms the accounts of numbers of militia guerrillas and cavalry having deserted from the rebels to the division of Count Villa Flor, though the same rebels had been beaten in the neighbourhood of the Sierra da Lapa, while endeavouring to retire by Francozo, in the direction of the frontier.

"GERALDO JOSE BRAACAMP, Orderly Lieutenant."

"Head-Quarters, Oporto District, Jan. 15.

"The military Governor of Oliveira de Azameis, writes on the 14th instant, that on the 9th, as he was informed by the officer reconnoitring on the points of Manhuce and Gralheira, the division of Count Villa Flor defeated the rebels commanded by Telles Jordao in the position of Carutas, near the Sierra da Lapa. The rebels, who lost in killed and wounded about 100 men, were completely routed and dispersed.

"It is ascertained that General Mello jointed the Marquis of Angeja in Villa Real on the 12th, and that the remains of the militia of Arouca had fled from Lamego, and abandoned the party of the rebels.

"This day the English troops were to leave Lisbon, and begin their march for different points.

"SAAVEDRA, Orderly Lieutenant."

"Head-Quarters, Oporto District, Jan. 16.

"Marshal Moura (Governor of Valenga, and Provisional Governor of the province of the Minho) announces, under date of the 13th current, the complete route of a corps of rebels 400 strong, consisting of refugee Portuguese, Guerrillas, and two companies of Spaniards. The action occurred on the 11th, in the position of Fiaes. Our troops were commanded by Major Antonio Vincenti de Queiroz, of the Viana Militia, and the rebels by the infamous Don Ignacio Pereira. The rebels fled in disorder to Spain. He besides states, that on the 12th another rebel Guerrilla appeared advancing upon Lindozo, with the intention of descending by the Areos; but that he detached a force sufficient to make the rebels abandon their project. He concludes with stating that not only the frontier towns, but all other parts of the province, are in a state of perfect tranquility.

"Colonel Zagallo has transmitted from Montalegre, under the date of the 12th current, an account of the march of the troops under his command on Chaves. The rebels, from whom he experienced some resistance in the course of his march, sustained great loss. He states that Colonel Brito was in Rotieas, having also beaten the rebels who attempted to obstruct his march.

"General Pinto, Military Governor of Coimbra, writes from Viseu under date of the 12th, that he intended to return on the following day to Coimbra. He adds that the rebels were retreating in the greatest disorder, and that almost all the militia had abandoned that infamous party.

"SAAVEDRA, Orderly Lieutenant."

The Etoile of last Friday contains the following news from Lisbon, 27th of January, and Madrid 2d of February, received at Paris by express:—

Lisbon, Jan. 27.—The insurrection, now concentrated in the province of Tras-os-Montes, can no more threaten the tranquillity of the other provinces. The last letters received from Count Villa Flor were from Trancoso; he is going to join the Marquis d'Angeja near Villa Real. He did not pass the Douro on the 22d., as was said; he wished to assure himself that the insurgents would not throw themselves into Beira behind him.

The pacific resolutions adopted by the Cabinet of Madrid have been announced by a Spanish courier to the Count de Casa Flores, who was ordered at the same time to communicate them to the Portuguese Government.

M. de Casa Flores has obtained leave of absence. The Secretary of Legation will remain Charge D'Affaires, and the title of the mission willbe preserved.

Three of the English ships of the line that were in the Tagus sailed to return to England. The Marshal went on board the Ocean.

The Chamber of Peers has just rejected the law proposed by the Chamber of Deputies, which fixed the number and the salary of the Counsellors of State. It is thought that the law or the donation of the Crown will be also rejected by that Chamber

It appears that both sides are disposed to suffer the mixed committees to fall into disuse. It was a bad institution, for the result of it naturally was, either to place the administration entirely in the Chambers, if they agreed, or to put them in opposition to each other in the contrary case; but in doing away with it, nothing else has been substituted for it.

WAR OFFICE.

Lieutenant-General Marquis d'Angeja writes from Villa Real on the 18th—"I hasten to inform your Excellency that General Mello, having effected the movement which I had ordered him, entered Chaves to-day, after having repulsed the rebels, who to the number of 400, as well veterans as cavalry of the 9th Regiment and disbanded soldiers, made a considerable resistance.

"They at length abandoned the field of battle with several killed and wounded, to retreat towards Lomba and St. Vincent. General Mello, is pursuing them and has already taken some prisoners. As soon as I receive a more detailed account, I shall have the honour to send it to your Excellency, to be presented to the Princess Regent.

"Brigadier-General John de Silveira writes from Guarda, on the 7th, that he entered that town the day before, and that he expects there the orders of the Count de Villa Flor."

There has been no sitting in the Chamber of Peers for these three days. The Chamber of Deputies was engaged yesterday, in revising some articles of its standing orders, and with a project of law on a new mode of election.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs has acknowledged the receipt of the act by which the Chamber votes thanks to the King of England. This act will be transmitted to the Marquis de Palmella, the Minister of Portugal at the English Court, that he may have the honour of presenting it to his Britannic Majesty.

Madrid, Jan. 30.—The King has just ordered a separate list to be made out of all the officers, absent or on unlimited furlough, or retired, who were in the Royalist Volunteers; and that these officers are to be paid as regularly as possible by the local authorities.

News from the Havannah, of the 24th of November, has been received. The colony enjoyed the greatest tranquitlity. The Guerrero ship of the line, respecting which some apprehensions were entertained, arrived there on the 6th. All necessary measures were taken to repair the disasters caused by the hurricane of September.

The accounts from Mexico say, that a change in the present form of Government may be looked for, because it has too many adversaries among the partisans of a more central Government. As for the revolution in the Terra Firma, directed by Paez, though it seems to tend only to overthrow the present Government, the true object of it is to give the people of colour the preponderance over the whites.—Madrid Gazette.

Madrid, Feb. 2.—Several persons have been executed at Velez Malaga, who were arrested in consequence of the revolutionary movements which broke out some weeks ago in the neighbouring villages.

All the roads are so infested by robbers, that we do not remember any thing like it since the civil war. An Austrian courier has been stopped half a league from the capital.

At Alicant (Valencia), the police have made some domiciliary visits.

The Superintendent-General of the Police published, on the 29th of last month, an ordinance against the seditious and calumnious writings which it is attempted to circulate in Spain.*

*It seems that this severe ordinance has a reference to the pamphlet published in England, and of which the Etoile has already spoken, in which the Liberals, taking the mask of Royalism, announce the idea of raising the Infant Don Carlos to the throne.—Note of the Etoile.

CRIMINAL LAWS.

A statement having appeared in the public papers, entitled "The Consolidation of the Criminal Code," from which it would appear, that a gentleman of the name of Hammond has been employed, under the authority of Mr. Peel, in various projects connected with the Criminal and Civil Law of this country, it is thought necessary to give publicity to a communication made to Mr. Hammond, on the 9th of January last, which explains the circumstances under which Mr. Hammond received any authority whatever from Mr. Peel, and the limits within which that authority is restricted.

It seems wholly impossible to reconcile with this communication, the statement above referred to, entitled "Consolidation of the Criminal Code."

(Copy.) WHITEHALL, Jan. 9.

Mr. Peel considers that it would be for the convenience of Mr. Hammond and himself, that Mr. Hammond should distinctly understand the nature and extent of the authority which he has from Mr. Peel, to proceed in the consolidation of a certain branch of the statute law of England.

Some time after Mr. Peel had undertaken, with the assistance of Mr. Hobhouse and Mr. Gregson, to consolidate the laws relating to the trial and punishment of criminal offences, he learnt that Mr. Hammond was employed, under the direction of a Committee of the House of Commons, in preparing drafts of bills, consolidating the law relating to forgery, and some other crimes.

Though Mr. Peel had, previously to the appointment of this Committee, undertaken a similar work, which he proposed to carry on gradually, and with that mature deliberation which is essential to its success, he was unwilling to interfere with the performance of the duty assigned by the Committe to Mr. Hammond, and was ready, as far as his intentions corresponded with those of the Committee, to stand in the same relation to Mr. Hammond in which the Committee stood.

Mr. Peel contemplated, if time and opportunity were permitted to him, the ultimate consolidation of the whole of the statute law relating to crime.

From the first Resolution of the Select Committee on Criminal Law, he presumes the object of the Committee to have been the same as his own. The Resolution is to the following effect:—Resolved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that it is expedient that the statutes relating to criminal law should be consolidated under their several heads."

Mr. Peel is perfectly willing that Mr. Hammond should proceed, under his authority, in completing what remains to be performed by him, within the limits above prescribed.

Mr. Peel understands these limits to be, the collection under one head of the several existing laws in the statute book relating to criminal offences.

Mr. Hammond has sent to Mr. Peel the result of his labours with respect to the laws relating to forgery, to coining, and to offences against property.

The only material heads that remain are the laws relating to offences against the person, and the laws relating to the preservation and destruction of game.

As to the latter, Mr. Peel has to observe, that as the subject is to be brought before Parliament in the present session, by Lord Wharncliffe, Mr. Hammond's labours upon it will probably be thrown away unless they are completed before his Lordship's motion.

Mr. Peel does not feel himself enabled to give Mr. Hammond any authority respecting the reduction of any part of the criminal law to writing, or as to the consolidation of any other portion of the statute law, than that which relates to crime.

Anthony Hammond, Esq. Tanfield-court, Inner Temple.

We understand, that besides Mr. R. Scarlett, Mr. Jardine, Mr. Barstow, Mr. Burnaby, and Mr. Ryland, that also Mr. Robson, Mr. Payne, and several other Gentlemen of the Bar, have declared their intention of becoming Candidates for the honourable distinction of Counsel to the City of London, whenever that important situation shall become vacant.

David Wilkie, R. A.—We are happy in having an opportunity of assuring his friends and the public in general, that our distinguished countryman, Wilkie, was well, at Rome, on the 12th of last month. We have seen a letter of his of that date, addressed to a Reverend Friend in our neighbourhood.—Fife Herald.

THE AGE.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 11.

By the Paris Papers which arrived yesterday, we received intelligence from Lisbon to the 28th ultimo What remained of the rebel force in Portugal, was concentrated in the province of Tras-os-Montes, and all apprehensions were at an end as to its extending its movements southward. The last despatches received from Count VILLA FLOR, were dated Trancoso. On the 18th January, General MELLO entered Chaves, after a rather severe conflict with the Insurgents. On the preceding day General SILVEIRA entered Guarda.

The conduct of the Spanish Government seems, at length, to correspond with its professions. Its pacific intentions had been formerly announced to that of Portugal, by the Count de CASA FLORES; who, subsequently, it appears, obtained leave of absence, the Secretary of Legation remaining as Charge d'Affaires. But if we may credit one piece of news, contained in these Papers, FERDINAND is still susceptible of Quixotic enterprises. "It appears certain," says the Quotidienne, "that the Spanish squadren stationed at Cuba, commanded by Admiral LABORDE, after having repaired the damages it had sustained, was to take troops on board, in order to make a descent either in Mexico or Colombia!" We should say, in both; or rather, on all the points of South America, at once, which heretofore belonged to the Spanish Monarchy.

The Portuguese Minister for Foreign Affairs had officially received the communication of the vote of thanks, passed by the Chambers to the King of England. This was to be transmitted to the Marquis de PALMELLA, in London, that he "might have the honour of presenting it to his Britannic Majesty."

A proportion of our Paper was last week devoted to the insertion of the splendid oration delivered by the LORD CHANCELLOR, in giving judgment in the WELLESLEY cause, and we were consequently denied the opportunity of recording our opinions on the subject. We therefore do so this week—we shall be brief in so doing, and sincerely trust this will be the last time we shall have occasion to revert to so melancholy an affair.

A decision fraught with stricter morality, wisdom, and general evidence of fixed principle, at the same time conveying universal satisfaction to the country, was never pronounced from the seat of justice; and little as the integrity of Lord ELDON needed to enforce on public belief the greatness of his moral and judicial character, this celebrated event has furnished him with that little. There are very few people who do not deride the attempt of such a father as Mr. WELLESLEY to obtain possession of his ill-fated offspring, while every evidence which had been adduced, in support of his claim, has only corroborated the determined prejudice the world had previously imbibed against him. We had hitberto expressed our sentiments pretty freely on this gentleman; and in referring to them now, we are bound to repeat that a much more worthless character, of such elevated rank, seldom has appeared before the public; and the prepossession of that advocate must be singular, indeed, who could presume to imagine that the LORD HIGH CHANCELLOR OF ENGLAND could think, for one moment, of consigning children to the custody, protection, and formation in mind and character, of the violator of all those attributes which render character respectable. The idea which some entertain, that they would not have been placed under the surveillance of Mr. WELLESLEY's renowned courtezan, even if they had been entrusted to him, is absurd—if they really were not, the continual fear would be, that they might, and the prospect for the safety of their morals and education would consequently be equally alarming.

It would be affectation not to express a regret at the view of the case which has been taken by our distinguished contemporary John Bull; but while we refer to that, we must be permitted to scout the nonsensical position maintained in The Times, of Mr. WELLESLEY having become a proprietor of Bull, and thereby influencing the opinions that Paper has given in his case. The idea is absurd—and the defence of Mr. WELLESLEY therein promulgated is produced, we should imagine, by the same means which prompted the genius of the "leading journal" to take up the cudgels of the departed QUEEN CAROLINE," of glorious memory."

THE DUKE OF YORK'S WILL.

His ROYAL HIGHNESS's Will has been proved in Doctors' Commons, and the executors have sworn the effects to be under One Hundred and Eighty Thousand Pounds. The document is interesting in itself; but its publication is rendered much more so at the present moment, as it puts a stop to the reports so extensively propagated respecting the amount of the Duke's debts; and at the same time removes the apprehension so generally entertained that an application would be made to Parliament to discharge the debts of his ROYAL HIGHNESS. It will be seen by its perusal, that so little idea had the DUKE of any such trespass upon the public sentiment, that he directs his debts and funeral expences to be paid, and expresses a confident hope that there will be assets not only to discharge these claims, but that there will be a surplus, which he bequeaths to his sister Princess SOPHIA, with whom and his ROYAL HIGHNESS a great warmth of attachment has ever subsisted. The will is dated on the 26th of December, ten days before the decease of his ROYAL HIGHNESS, and Sir HERBERT TAYLOR and Colonel B. C. STEPHENSON are appointed trustees—two gentlemen long officially attached to the department over which the DUKE presided, and in whom he reposed the most implicit confidence. Dr. MACGREGOR, one of his ROYAL HIGHNESS's medical attendants, F. DIGHTON, Esq., one of his private secretaries, and J. PARKINSON, Esq., his solicitor, are the witnesses. The affectionate attachment of the KING to his ROYAL HIGHNESS, and his universally allowed merits as Commander-in-Chief, called for a public funeral; and not a murmur was heard throughout the nation, save for his loss—all parties uniting in expressions of condolence to the SOVEREIGN, and testifying to the amiable qualifications of the deceased PRINCE. The expences of the funeral will therefore be paid by the public out of the Civil List.—As it may fairly be presumed that his ROYAL HIGHNESS must have had the best knowledge of the state of his affairs, it would be idle and impertinent to suppose that his property is insufficient to discharge all claims upon his estate, or for any persons to doubt the accuracy of the calculation, whose opinions can only be formed upon the surmises of those who have no means of ascertaining the facts. The disposal of the residue, and to a beloved sister, evinces the DUKE's sincerity in believing his property to be more than sufficient to pay all demands upon his estate.—We subjoin a copy of the original document:—

COPY OF THE WILL AND TESTAMENT OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF YORK AND ALBANY.

"This is the last will and testament of me, his Royal Highness Frederick, Duke of York and Albany:—I direct all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expences, to be paid and satisfied with all convenient speed after my decease; and I charge all my real and personal estate with the payment of my debts; and I most sincerely and confidently hope that the produce of my real and personal estate will supply a fund amply sufficient for that purpose. I give, devise, and bequeath, all my freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, and all my personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever (except letters and manuscripts not being contracts, securities, or muniments of title) unto and to the use of Lieutenant-General Sir Herbert Taylor, G.C.H., and Col. Benjamin Charles Stephenson, Surveyor General of his Majesty's Board of Works, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, according to the nature and quality thereof respectively, UPON TRUST, that they, and the survivor of them, and the heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns of such survivors, shall and do with all convenient speed after my decease (but subject and without prejudice to any contracts that may have been entered into by me for the sale of any of my estates), and with full power to carry or join in carrying all or any of such contracts into execution; or to rescind or join in rescinding the same, or any of them, if it shall be deemed advisable so to do, without incurring any loss or resposibility by so rescinding or joining in rescinding the same; and make sale and absolutely dispose of, by public sale or private contract, all and singular my said freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates, and such part of my personal estate as shall be saleable, and collect, get in, and receive such parts of my personal estate as shall not be saleable; and do and shall stand and be possessed of, and interested in the monies to arise by such sales, and to be collected, got in, and received as aforesaid; and the rents, issues, and profits, dividends, interest, and proceed of my said real and personal estates, until the same shall be sold, collected, got in, and received, UPON TRUST thereout to pay all the costs, charges, and expenses whatsoever attending such sales, collection, and getting in, and all other expenses of my said trustees, or any of them in or about the performance of all or any of the trusts hereby in them reposed. And in the next place thereout to pay all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and the interests of such debts as carry interest, and to pay all the residue (if any) of the aforesaid trust monies unto my dear sister, the Princess Sophia, her executors, administrators, and assigns, for her and their own absolute use and benefit. And my will is, that the receipts in writing of my said trustees, or the survivor of them, or the heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns of such survivor, shall be good and effectual discharges to the person or persons purchasing, paying in, or delivering all or any part of my freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or personal estate, for so much of the purchase or other money, or effects, as in such receipts respectively shall be expressed or acknowledged to be received, paid in, or delivered; and that the person or persons to whom such receipts shall be given shall not afterwards be accountable for any loss, misapplication, or nonapplication of the money or effects, which in such receipts respectively shall be expressed or acknowledged to be received, paid in, or delivered; or be bound or concerned to see to the application thereof. I give and bequeath to the said Sir Herbert Taylor all my letters and manuscripts (not being contracts, securities, or muniments of title), and I request him to preserve and dispose of the same respectively, according to such directions as I may have given to him for that purpose. I hereby constitute and appoint the said Sir Herbert Taylor and Benjamin Charles Stephenson, executors of this my will; and, hereby revoking all former wills and testamentary dispositions by me at any time made, I hereby declare this to be my last will and testament. In witness whereof, I, the said Frederick, Duke of York and Albany, the testator, have, to this my last will and testament, and to a duplicate thereof of the same tenor and date, set my hand and seal this 26th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1826.

"FREDERICK." (Seal.)

"Signed, sealed, published, and declared, by the above-named Frederick, Duke of York and Albany, the testator, as and for his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who at his request, in his presence, and in the presence of each other, hereunto subscribe our names as witnesses.

"PATRICK MACGREGOR.
"FRANCIS DIGHTON.
"JOHN PARKINSON."

To this will his ROYAL HIGHNESS added the following codicil:—

"This is a codicil to my will. I desire my executors, in all matters in which they may have occasion for legal aid and advice, to resort to my solicitor, John Parkinson, Esq., of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. Written in my hand, this twenty-sixth day of December, 1826. "FREDERICK."

CARLILE.

We have been hitherto prevented from noticing the following circumstance, which is to us one of the most distinguished examples which the authority of modern days has taken upon itself to set, and one which it would be highly advisable to recommend the furtherance of. This miserable blasphemer, whose name we have affixed at the heading of this article, appeared at the late sessions at the Old Bailey, to give evidence, when the Recorder thus interrogated him:—

Have you been sworn?—I have.

RECORDER.—Have you been sworn on the Holy Scriptures?—I have been sworn in the usual way.

RECORDER.—Do you believe in the book on which you have been sworn?—I do, as a history, believe some parts.

RECORDER.—Do you believe in the Gospels?—In a general way, I do.

RECORDER.—Do you believe in the Gospels on which you have been sworn? If you do not, your oath cannot be taken, for it is not worth a farthing.—I do not believe in the Gospels further than as a matter of history; as a whole, I do not believe in them. I repeat, that, in my opinion, they are only a matter of history.

RECORDER.—Then you do not believe in the Bible.—I do not.

RECORDER.—Then I cannot believe you on your oath. Do you believe in a God? It is a simple question.—I do not think it is a simple question.

RECORDER.—I must insist upon an answer. Do you believe there is a God?—Witness. I do not understand the term.

RECORDER.—There is not a person in this Court who hears me but yourself that does not.—Witness. I cannot understand what is meant by God; there may be such a Being. He is spoken of in the Bible, which I only believe as a history, and nothing further; I claim as much right to have my testimony received as any other person. I have as much respect for the truth as any other person.

RECORDER.—Once more, I ask you, do you believe in a God?—I believe in parts of the history in which that name is mentioned.

RECORDER.—Then, as you do not believe in the Gospel, on which you have been sworn, I will not receive your evidence; I will suffer no man to be accused and tried on the oath of one who dares to revile his Maker. Stand down, Sir.

The hardened wretch shrank to nothing at the rebuke of his earthly Judge, and left the Court, shrouded in the contempt of every spectator—how will he meet his ETERNAL JUDGE, from whose presence there is no retreat, and from whose rebuke there is no appeal?

We lately slightly hinted, under the article on Zoology, at a late occurrence in fashionable life, which has added another to the many flagrant instances of immorality which mark the conduct of the upper orders of society.

Lord SUSSEX LENNOX, youngest son but one of the late Duke of RICHMOND, has eloped, within the last fortnight, with the Baroness ROEBECK, daughter of the Lord and Lady CLONCURRY—a circumstance which, we need hardly say, has involved his Lordship's relations in very considerable distress. It seems as if this family, in its younger branches, were doomed to keep before the public, and in no very enviable light, for almost every day furnishes some instance in which their names and their deeds are recorded, to the mortification and grief of the Nobleman, so universally respected, who wears the family coronet. The last public exhibition of Lord SUSSEX was backing his half-brother, the Cheltenham Douglas! to beat JUDGE, the Editor; and beyond that, we are not aware of any particular service he has "done the State." The family of the Lady is quite on a par for notoriety; for Lady CLONCURRY (the mother of the Baroness) went off with SIR JOHN PIERS, (who by the way, is not dead, but living incog. in a remote part of Ireland) and afterwards became Mrs.

SANDFORD; and the example thus set by the parent was rather in danger of being followed by the child, who, from very early life, was always thought a great flirt. The young Lord is pennyless, the old Lady little better, and although she is certainly handsome, "beauty soon grows familiar to the eye," and love and a continental garret would not find SUSSEX LENNOX even in cigars. It is really a melancholy thing to reflect upon, chiefly on account of the feelings of that estimable and dignified Peer, the present Duke of RICHMOND, and his most virtuous and charming Duchess. The Baron ROEBECK, an Irish Commoner, who took the name and title, for the sake of the fortune, got, we presume, about as much as he bargained for—and having got the money, the sooner he gets rid of the name (considering the peculiarity and application of it) the better—for as to prosecuting SUSSEX LENNOX, he might as well Aldgate pump. If an excuse can be urged for the delinquent, it is his extreme youth, and the fact of the Lady being nearly old enough to be his mother—but, on a general principle, no palliation can be held out; and we leave him, and his Noble compeers in crime (amongst whom he has now enrolled himself), to the common disgust their conduct has excited.

It is gratifying to find, that Mr. PEEL is still proceeding with his desirable reformation, or rather consolidation of the Criminal Code. Mr. HAMMOND, the barrister, is employed by the Right Hon. Gentleman to collect under one head the several existing laws in the statute book relating to criminal offences. He has already completed those relating to forgery, coining, and offences against property. The only material heads which remain, are those which apply to offences against the person, and the laws relating to the preservation and destruction of game. As to the latter, Mr. PEEL has written to Mr. HAMMOND, that as Lord WHARNCLIFFE (late Mr. STUART WORTLEY), intends to bring the subject before the House of Lords, his (Mr. HAMMOND'S) labours are likely to be thrown away, unless they are completed before his Lordship's motion. Mr. PEEL declines giving any authority to Mr. HAMMOND for reducing any part of the common law to writing. We hope, however, that he does not mean to rest his important labours upon the present instructions which he has given his professional assistant.

The principles upon which this Digest has been framed are—First, An abstract is given, which consists of two branches—1. The general rule or exception which the case warrants; and, 2. The reasons of the rule or exception. Secondly, The case is subjoined at length, to afford a medium for verifying the fidelity of the abstract; to afford, too, an illustration of the rule, and to render unnecessary any reference to the Reports.

The distribution of the contents of each article is thus:—1. A table of contents. 2. A table of the names of the cases cited or referred to. 3. A table of the books and opinions cited. 4. A table of the Statutes consolidated or referred to. 5. The Code itself, consisting of so many sections. The first section is entitled the Introduction, and is chiefly historical. The remaining sections, except the last, contain the digest of judicial decisions, and the consolidation of the enactments. The last section contains a summary of the law, as contained in the preceding sections. 6. The verbal index of reference. And, lastly, the Appendix, containing the process by which the enactments have been consolidated, of which process a general explanation is contained in the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Criminal Law of England, dated April 2, 1824.

Besides this Code, there is a series of papers called "The Consolidation of the Criminal Laws; Offences against Property." The distribution of these documents has been the same as of those printed by the Record Commission, with this difference, that a certain number of copies have been allotted for the use of the profession, in the hope that it may occasion suggestions for the improvement of the laws from as many sources as possible. The copies have been placed in the hands of the following gentlemen, to whom each title as it is printed off will be transmitted:—Mr. EDWARD GOULBURN, of the Midland Circuit; Mr. M'MAHON, of the Oxford Circuit; Mr. H. JEREMY, of the Western Circuit; Mr. JOY, of the Northern Circuit; Mr. ABRAHAM, of the Home Circuit; and Mr. HICKS, of the Norfolk Circuit—in all 36 copies of each title.

The printing of the division of the Code, which relates to offences against property, is nearly finished, and contains the following titles:—1. Burglary; 2. Housebreaking; 3. Church Robbing; 4. Simple Larceny; 5. Robbery; 6. Receipt of Stolen Goods; 7. Advertising for Stolen Goods; 8. Taking Reward to help to Stolen Goods; 9. Fraud; 10. Coining; 11. Forgery; 12. Mischief, including Arson; 13. Restitution; 14. Compensation; and 15. The Game Laws. Another division will be sent to the press, entitled Procedure, understanding that term as generical, and applying it to the criminal mode of proceeding. The Law of Procedure is the most important, the most extensive, the most intricate, and as it now stands, the most defective of the whole criminal law. Accordingly, the greatest pains have been taken with this part of the Code, and the most sweeping alterations suggested. It embraces as well the civil as the criminal mode of business, the two being so intimately connected that it is impossible, in a satisfactory manner, to treat of or to reform either by itself.

Besides the two divisions, "offences against property," and "Procedure," there are two others, namely, "offences against the person," and "offences against the State." From the exertions which the King's printers have made, and from the state of the copy at present, it will not be long before the whole is in print. And after the completion of these parts, Mr. HAMMOND intends to proceed with Civil Law, in the same way. In the arrangement a primary object has been not only to bring under view every thing that has been enacted by the Legislature, decided by the Courts, and laid down by authoritative writers, but so to arrange the matter, as to suggest more readily, and more distinctly, the question, whether the law shall remain in its present state, or undergo alteration. To furnish a ready mode of ascertaining the doctrine upon any particular point, a verbal index has been subjoined, referring as well to the body or text of the work as to the notes below. Another object in this arrangement has been to render it useful to those engaged in the administration of justice, by giving a view of the whole doctrine of law, and by rendering any reference to the statutes, reports, or authoritative writers unnecessary, since they will all be found in this Code, and to furnish a document in which the whole body of the law, upon any given subject, may be found, whether the information be sought by the historian, the antiquary, or the lawyer.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN, on Friday night, announced his intention to present the general petition of the Roman Catholics of Ireland on Wednesday next, on which day he proposes to give notice of a motion founded on it, which he has it in contemplation to submit to the House of Lords.

In the House of Commons, Sir F. BURDETT gave notice that he would bring the question of Catholic Emancipation before the House on the 22d instant; and it was ordered, to ensure a full attendance, that the House should be called over on that day.

Though the discussion of this important question is thus fixed for Thursday week, various circumstances make it probable that it will not be brought on so early. The Hon. Baronet, when he gave his notice, was, probably, not aware of the serious indisposition of Mr. CANNING. Before the 22d arrives, we hope it will be our pleasing duty to announce an important improvement in the health of the Foreign Secretary, but we can hardly expect that he will be sufficiently re-established, to permit of his taking part in such a debate with safety. His friends would, therefore, be naturally anxious to prevent his attendance, and Sir FRANCIS would hardly think it well to go on with his motion, in the absence of so powerful and so splendid an advocate. —Courier.

THEATRICALS.

It is but seldom that we omit giving some notice of the important occurrences bearing this title, but as sure as we do so one Sunday, our desk is inundated with complaints and contributions, long before the arrival of the next. Such has been the case this last week, and it would be a fund of no small amusement, for the reader to wade through the quantity, and (with respect be it spoken) the quality, of all which has arrived in that lapse of time. The best part of the business is, that the players consider themselves the most ill-used set of devils in existence, if they are not noticed, and very often a much worse set, if they are.

Miss JARMAN (from almost every theatre in the kingdom), whose trumpet has been so loudly blown for the last few years, appeared at Covent Garden on Wednesday, in the character of Juliet. It would have been desirable if, on this occasion, we had been permitted to enter the house, under the old impression, "blessed is he that expecteth nothing, and he shall not be disappointed:" but we had been led to expect so much, that the disappointment was, comparatively speaking, the greater. Miss JARMAN is, in person, well proportioned, and of an agreeable height, but her countenance is not expressive, nor handsome, and its general character is certainly forbidding. That index to the mind—the eye—is a very indecisive feature in this lady, for it is too sunken, to convey the least animation, and we should imagine the mind of its possessor not sufficiently strong, to give any particular force to its direction. Miss JARMAN is far from the worst Juliet we have seen—she is equally far from the best; and that class of merit we should feel disposed to allot this actress, is a cultivation of other persons' effects, matured by much experience, without any peculiar genius of her own, as to their application. The old trick with the nurse—the hacknied gag on the balcony, "I do forget, &c."—and the masquerade scene, were managed with that dexterity which practice will always supply; but we deem it not heresy to say, that, in the celebrated scene, where Juliet receives the intimation of Romeo's banishment (the absolute test of the representative's powers), Miss JARMAN has not the means of embodying the poet's ideas—it was rant, without distinction, and violence, without the least point. We shall not hastily decide on the talents of this long heralded performer, but await the opportunity of a fuller appreciation, which some other performances may furnish us. At present we entertain a strong conviction that this aspirant's powers would develope themselves more in comedy, than the line of character thus far selected—for certes, Miss JARMAN might be there, but Juliet was "absent without leave."

We will talk to Mr. PEAKE, about his "100l. Note," next week.

We "confess the cape" of inattention to a certain extent, but we have the misfortune to deem the interests of the other part of the nation of far more importance, than those of its dramatic portion—but while we may have appeared to be culpably neglectful, we have made our memoranda, and the following is the result thereof:—

Mem. 1.—We have seen Miss HARGRAVE, and do not like her in what we saw her. She has neither strength of execution, or intensity of conception enough, to depict the majestic sorrows of the Lady Constance. The most effective part of her performance was her reproach of Austria, and hard indeed must be the destiny of any tragedian, who could not render that sublime combination of language, with some degree of point—the other parts of her performance induced us to wish we could see her in a less important character—she has a better face than Miss LACY, but, in other respects, not a fraction of that lady's qualifications.

Mem. 2.—We have seen LAPORTE in £277. 7*s.* 7*d.* and are delighted with his admirable personation of the Bailiff. The piece is in itself exceedingly droll, but the situations in which it places him, and his mode of performing them, are as highly comic as any thing we remember. LAPORTE is, we find, to play in Dublin to-morrow week, and adds this character to the list of those he is about to appear in there—whether he returns to Drury Lane, "this depenent sayeth not," although BALL HUGHES says, Mr. PRICE has closed with him, which he expresses, "il a fermé LA PORTE."

Mem. 3.—We have seen Mr. WALLACE'S new opera of Englishmen in India, and are quite pleased with it—the music is an opera without the dialogue, and the dialogue an excellent comedy without the music—united, they are effective in the extreme. It is seldom that so much talent is congregated, in support of an entertainment, as appeared in support of this, the principals of which had an allotment of character "in their line," as the parties facetiously term it. The Sir Matthew Scraggs of DOWTON is as good a piece of acting as he ever was guilty of, but his eternal patronage of "dammee this," and "dammee that," is highly reprehensible. COLMAN, to a certainty, had cut them all out, and although we laugh at the nicety of the Licenser, we know the extent of his power, and the actor ought not to infringe upon his fiat—but DOWTON would do the same in Hamlet, were he playing it—and perhaps we ought not to be over scrupulous, when we remember that if he damned himself, he did not damn the play. Mr. BRAHAM was in admirable voice, and rendered the music entrusted to him most effective, and if a regret once arose in our minds, it was from his having so little to do. Mr. HARLEY'S "bit" of Tape was well measured—a performance not to be surpassed. GATTIE thinks he can act a Frenchman,—we don't—and nobody else would, that saw him play Glorieux on this interesting occasion. The prettiest part of the music is given to Miss STEPHENS, who did it every justice, but several fine passages are scattered throughout the work, and bear evident traces of the master hand of their composer. BISHOP was bound to time in the production of Englishmen in India, and, what is a rara avis in terra with him, he was ready a day before his "bond" expired.—We would rather never see genius fettered, if it is to be the cause of cramping its exertions. There were Mrs. DAVISON, Miss KELLY, Mr. WALLACK, and Mr. COOPER, each strenuously supporting the opera, but we regret we have not space, to give them separate notice—for their exertions deserved it, in the most unlimited sense of the word. In which ever point of view we regard this opera, we have no hesitation in saying that we have derived as much gratification from these Englishmen in India, as we ever did from any Indiamen in England!

Mem. 4.—We have seen the "Dead Shot" at the Adelphi, and we think it "a dead hit."

Mem. 5.—We find that ELLISTON has been playing to about 7*s.* 6*d.*, before the iron and coal miners at Wolverhampton—that Mr. JONES is to join the English Opera House, and Mr. W. FARREN is to supersede his brother PERCY, in the management of the Haymarket—a choice which cannot possibly be of the slightest utility to any party concerned—that Colonel BERKELEY has been figuring in Douglas at Cheltenham, and Major DAWKINS playing—the fool at Bath, for BARTLEY'S benefit—that there will never be an end to the mummeries of these precocious amateurs—that Mrs. BARTLEY has taken to the comic old women, commencing a few nights since in Mrs. Malaprop, at the Bath theatre—that Miss GRADDON has had the absurdity to throw away a few pounds per week (her salary at Drury Lane) because she can't have it all her own way, the result of her making a considerable impression in an indelicate song, by WADE, the other day. "Give these players a good thing," but the proverb is somewhat musty—that Sir JOSEPH COPLEY calls MATHEWS "an old file," for buying the collection of play bills, which were sold a few days since by SOTHEBY in the Strand.

Mem. 6.—That Mr. YATES has removed his dancing academy to No. 33, Soho-square. We always thought YATES lived at 29 in that said square; and that is all we think upon the subject at this present writing;—"and that Mrs. MONTE CORRI (as SAM SPRING called her, when he told ELLISTON she was past her work) died the other day at Liverpool, and that Miss PATON sings in the same town on Wednesday next."

Lord Harrowby, Lord Melville, Mr. Secretary Peel, Mr. Buller, and Lord St. Helens, all left the Palace, to return to town this morning.

The Duke of Wellington, on a visit to the King, is remaining. Sir Herbert Taylor arrived at the Palace this morning, and, with the Commander-in-Chief, had the honour of dining with his Majesty; but no tickets to invite additional company have been issued.

The Duke of Wellington, Lord Melville, and Mr. Secretary Peel, directly after the Council, were honoured by his Majesty with separate audiences.

Lord Egremont, Lieut.-Colonel and Mrs. Fitzclarence, Lord Calthorpe, Lady Copley, and Lady Keith, with others of the Nobility, left their names at the Palace this morning.

Lord Bathurst left us, for town, on Sunday; the Countess is gone on a visit to the Duchess of Richmond, at Goodwood.

The Royal Band have orders to be in attendance in the Concert-room of the Palace this evening.

The Duke of Wellington, Mr. Secretary Peel, &c. paid visits to the Chain Pier and Saloon this day. His Grace, in the earlier part of the morning, was walking on the Cliff Parades with the Princess Lieven. The Duke, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, seems to enjoy good health.

The Dowager Marchioness of Downshire, with her son, Lord G. Hill, and a select and brilliant party of nobility, dined with Mrs. Fitzherbert yesterday.

The Third Edition of the new novel of "Almacks" is now published, and may be had of the booksellers in town or country.

THE NATCHEZ.—Chateaubriand's beautiful episode of Rene, which now appears for the first time in an English dress in the Tale of the Natchez, promises, like its predecessor Atala, to attract extraordinary attention. The fatal amour which forms the subject of "René," is a warning to those young persons, who, deluded by the pernicious sentiment of Goethe's Werter, and the reveries of Rousseau, think that a disregard of the institutions of society, is a proof of genius.

A correspondent of an evening paper observes, that the account which appeared in a Liverpool paper, stating that Sir Francis Burdett was laid up at his country seat, with a severe attack of the gout, must have been incorrect, for on Tuesday afternoon he was seen walking in the Bird-cage Walk, St. James's Park, accompanied by a friend, and then appeared in good health, and looked remarkably well.

A translation of a notice posted up by order of the Bishop who at present superintends the education of the young Duke de Bordeaux, in the Cathedral of Strasburgh, a few days previous to the anniversary of the birth of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits:—"Forty days' indulgence will be granted to all those who, after having fully confessed and communed, shall visit this Cathedral on the anniversary of the birth of the Holy Father Ignatius Loyola, and shall there pray for the union of Christian Princes, the extirpation of heresy (l'extirpation des heresies), and the exaltation of the holy and true religion."

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.—It is now well understood, that on the resignation of Mr. Baron Graham being accepted by his Majesty, Mr. Sergeant Vaughan, who is the brother of Sir Henry Halford, will be elevated to the Bench, and occupy the Baron's vacant seat in the Exchequer.

RAPIDITY OF INTERCOURSE.—We see in the lists of imports at Liverpool from New York, among other articles, a saddle of venison. The "New World" seems a great distance to send to market for fresh provisions, but the ordinary term of a voyage across the Atlantic is no more than that during which a saddle of venison or mutton "ought to hang."

The fishing vessel which foundered off Hastings on the 21st ult. was discovered by a French boat on the 27th, and towed into that port in a dismasted state. Four pounds were given to the Frenchmen for their exertions. The boat is worth about 15l. We regret to add, that the men who are lost have left together fifteen children, who, with the widows have a strong claim upon the benevolence and compassion of the public.—Kentish Gazette.

While the Lord Wellington Leith smack, on her passage from London, was lying at anchor in Harwich Roads, where she had taken shelter during the gale on Saturday (3d), one of the passengers came on deck in the night, and asked the seaman on watch to go below and get him some drink, who, on his return, discovered that the man had leaped overboard. The hands were instantly called up to endeavour to save the unfortunate person, but he had sunk to rise no more. We understand he was from Fife.

The subscriptions by the Members of the United Service Club, for a Statute to perpetuate to posterity the profound respect and esteem in which they hold his late Royal Highness's memory, are rapidly filling up, and will, no doubt, soon be completed.

Since the decision was given in a late case in the Court of Chancery, Mr. Wellesley has been very much indisposed. The knocker of the house (belonging to Mrs. Baligh), No. 35, Baker-street, is muffled; and, from the unremitted attention paid to Mr. Wellesley by his physicians, it is supposed that his disorder is of a serious nature.

The unexpected vacancy in the See of Lincoln, has excited, as might be expected, a strong sensation among the aspirants for lawn sleeves, and conjecture is already alive as to the future possessor of this fine preferment.

Mr. J. George, a farmer at Mill-hill, Hendon, gave information at Queen-square police-office, that no less than 71 Welsh sheep had been stolen out of his flock, which consisted of 100, of which he could gain no tidings. Upwards of 20 informations were laid against various tradesmen at the above office, for serving their customers on the Sabbath-day, contrary to the late circular issued by the Magistrates.

Another week of steady progressive improvement has been experienced by most of our manufacturers of cotton goods. Some houses, that six months ago had dismissed nearly their whole establishment of workers, have, during the last fortnight, been so pushed to complete orders, that their full complement of hands have been employed both night and day. We earnestly hope that this will not prove what is usually called a mere spirt; but that the demand for goods will be so steadily continued, as ultimately to operate on the wages of labour favourably for our unfortunate weavers.—Scotch Times.

It has been ascertained from the Almanacks of the different departments and of Paris, that there are in France no less than seventeen hundred thousand eight hundred and forty-three medical men. There are, according to another calculation, fourteen hundred thousand six hundred and fifty-one patients. Turning to another class of public men, we find that there are nineteen hundred thousand four hundred and three pleaders, and upon the rolls there are only nine hundred and ninety-eight thousand causes; so that unless the nine hundred and two thousand four hundred and three superfluous lawyers see fit to fall sick of a lack of fees and employment, there must remain three hundred thousand one hundred and ninety-two doctors, with nothing to do but to sit with their arms across.—Le Furet.

Thursday morning, Mr. Agar, the Governor of the county gaol at Maidstone, received a letter from the Secretary of State, signifying that the execution of the sentence of death, passed upon the 14 smugglers, should be respited until the further signification of his Majesty's pleasure. Agreeably to further orders, all 14 prisoners were yesterday removed from the gaol, to be put on board ship, for the purpose of transportation for life. It was supposed by many people that some of them would be executed on Monday morning; accordingly, an immense concourse of persons from all parts of the county assembled here, for the purpose of witnessing the execution.—Maidstone Journal.

IRELAND.

NEW CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION, FEB. 3.

PROSECUTION OF MR. SHIEL.

Mr. Nicholas Mahon requested to know to what day the meeting would be adjourned, as he wished to make a few observations on a subject which interested, not only every person in that room, but every person in the Empire.—(Hear, hear.)—he meant the intention on the part of the Government to prosecute, or rather to persecute, a certain gentleman.

Mr. O'Connell said, though it was too late to enter on the discussion of the notice which stood on the books for that day, he was sure there was no person present who would not be glad to hear any observations Mr. Mahon might wish to make; he was entitled to this mark of respect from them for his many years of service in their cause; Mr. Mahon might justly be termed the father of the Catholic Body.—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. Mahon said he wished to make a few observations on the subject of this prosecution. He hoped it would not be carried on with that detestable plan and pretence which instigated former prosecutions of this nature. He trusted their illustrious Chief Governor would interfere to prevent a measure so unpopular, and one which was calculated to increase the discontent that prevailed in this already discontented country. As a fellow-soldier, he had reason to know the liberality of the Nobleman at the head of the Government: and with respect to the individual who was to be the subject of this prosecution, he had the honour and the pleasure to call him his particular friend. He (Mr. Mahon) trusted that gentleman had not transgressed the law or the statute; but if he had done so, "the love he bore his country was his fault." (Cheers.) He hoped that Mr. Shiel would receive the support of the country, and of that body on the present occasion—(great cheering)—and that he would not suffer for his patriotic efforts in the service of his country, adorned as they were by his brilliant genius, which was known, not only to these countries, but to France and the rest of Europe.

Mr. O'Connell said, he was fully aware that, in a case which might hereafter come before a tribunal of his country, his respected friend, Mr. Mahon, would not make use of any unguarded or improper observations. Every man, even when put on his trial, was held to be innocent until he was convicted; and, of course, the man against whom no proceedings had, as yet, been taken, must be equally considered innocent. He trusted this prosecution was merely a malignant rumour to calumniate Lord Wellesley and Mr. Plunkett; he trusted that some of their hated enemies had resorted to this means, to render Lord Wellesley and Mr. Plunkett unpopular, and to embarrass them with the other part of the Government. Mr. O'Connell then pronounced an eloquent eulogium on Mr. Shiel, whose head and heart, he said, were both right, and whose speech was a splendid exertion to save madmen from their destruction.

Mr. Lawless said, he rose to mention a report in circulation, that the notice served on some of the parties in this business was a fabrication; that it was only an attempt to unpopularise Wm. Conyngham Plunkett. For his own part, he did not believe one word of this prosecution; he could not think that the able Senator, who had made so many eloquent speeches in favour of Ireland, would assail the ablest advocate of her rights.

[From a Morning Paper.]

DUBLIN, Feb. 4.—The chief topic of conversation at present is the expected trial of Mr. Shiel. It seems that the Attorney-General will not proceed against him by an ex-officio in the King's Bench, but by an information, the trial to take place at the Commission, on the 17th of this month, in Green-street. It is confidently stated that this step has been preferred in consequence of instructions from London. The accusation is for publishing language of a seditious nature, calculated to withdraw his Majesty's liege subjects from their allegiance, by exciting and encouraging an attempt to invade and revolutionize this country.

Mr. Shiel has not been arrested. A report to that effect prevailed in town at a late hour last night, and it was even said that a Magistrate of the Head Office, and Mr. Farrell, the chief peace officer of Dublin, had waited on and apprehended the Barrister at his own house, in Holles-street. It is not likely that any arrest will take place, or if so, it will only be a mere matter of form. He was last night officially told that he is to take his trial in Green-street. Imprisonment for twelve or eighteen months, and a fine to the King, will be the heaviest penalty inflicted. The Catholic Association was well attended yesterday; it was expected that Mr. Shiel would speak on the subject most interesting to himself, at this juncture, but he said not one word.

Mr. SHIEL.—(Extract of a letter.)—Dublin, Monday, Feb. 5, 1827.—Informations were lodged at the Head Office on Saturday, and notice sent to Mr. Shiel to attend. He called yesterday at the police-office, to say he had got a notice to give bail, and that he would attend for the purpose at ten o'clock this morning. Of course, I cannot tell by whom the informations have been lodged: but the manuscript given by Mr. Shiel of his speech to the Morning Register has been applied for, and will be given up. He, I hear, has been in consultation with his lawyers all day; at all events, up to the hour of post, he has not come, according to his undertaking, to the Head Office to give bail.

We understand that a very singular work is about to appear under the title of "Napoleon in the other World." The adventures of the Ex-Emperor in the Region of Shades, (of which dolorous place a new idea is given) are reported to be sketched by a powerful imagination. Personages, are treated with little ceremony, and are brought into the most ludicrous juxtaposition, while the secret transactions of their lives are disclosed by the truth-compelling situation in which they are placed.

The late robbery of the mail from Dover to London has caused a great deal of annoyance at the Post-office, to which some blame is attributed, there being no doubt that if the necessary precautions had been taken, no loss would have been sustained. The strictest silence is observed at the Post-office on the subject, and there are some errors, we are informed, in the accounts which have appeared in the newspapers, in consequence of the strict injunctions of secrecy which have been issued. A regular gang, who have been for a long time on the town, and have generally engaged in robberies of bankers' parcels and other respectable depredations, as the thieves call all serious plunder, learned through the medium of their agents, that a large quantity of diamonds had been expected from Paris, and they set to work accordingly. They endeavoured to secure all the places inside and outside of the mail, but there were two inside places otherwise engaged. They, however, placed some of the most active of the gang outside, and at Canterbury the best opportunity of getting hold of the diamonds presented itself. The Paris bag was, as is the custom, on the top of the coach, and it contained the expected diamonds, which are said to be of very great value. There was, however, another bag, the Neapolitan bag, which contained no diamonds, and upon this occasion the ingenuity of the thieves did not meet with its accustomed luck. They pitched upon the wrong bag, and became masters of 1,600 letters from Naples and its neighbourhood. Some of the letters contained acceptances, and other securities, the absence of which may no doubt produce much inconvenience, but we believe that the thieves have not laid their hands upon a single paper which was convertible into cash. They had even gone to France for the purpose of getting hold of the property, but they found that there was infinitely more chance of facilities in this country for obtaining the desired reward of their hazardous and expensive labours. The bills are, we believe, redeemable by a sum of money but little exceeding the amount expended in attempting to put the intention into execution. We are assured that the robbery was contrived with the greatest possible skill.—Morning Paper.

ST. OLAVE'S, HART-STREET.

A Meeting of the parishioners of Dr. Owen, of St. Olave's Hart-street, took place yesterday, to take into consideration the propriety of continuing to assess Dr. Owen for the poor-rate, and all other matters connected therewith. It was very numerously and respectably attended. Mr. Churchwarden Frisby, in the absence of Dr. Owen, took the chair.

Mr. Davey said, that Dr. Owen had given him the most solemn assurance that, if exempted from paying poor-rate, he would never increase his tithe beyond two shillings in the pound. He (Mr. Davey) thought that Dr. Owen was quite sincere in his intentions of not advancing any fresh demands on his parishioners, and he therefore implored the parish to yield, in order that peace and quietness might once more exist throughout the parish.—(Cheers.)

Mr. Hill perfectly coincided in the remarks of Mr. Davey, and thought that the scenes of contention which had distracted the parish during the last two years, should be put an end to.

Mr. Nodin thought it was quite obvious that Dr. Owen must be compelled to pay the last poor-rate; and that it was the most proper course to adopt, that the Churchwardens should be instructed to take the necessary measures to collect the same.

Mr. Nelson moved the resolution.

Mr. Drinkald perfectly concurred in the suggestions thrown out, and was satisfied no other plan could be adopted.

Mr. King said, it appeared to him rather a singular mode of conciliation, to propose that Dr. Owen should be compelled to pay his arrears. If the parish were desirous of living in peace with their Rector, they should consent to forego their claims.

Mr. Rolfe said he had heard much that day of conciliation, and of the propriety of conciliation; but why did not Dr. Owen come himself, and manifest a desire to promote it? Was his opposition to contribute towards the maintenance of the poor a mark of conciliation? Was compelling the parish to borrow money at interest a proof of his conciliation? Were the repeated law-suits, in which he had been so constantly engaged with his parishioners, a sign of conciliation? Did his threat, that he would appeal against every poor-rate, if the parish continued to assess him, manifest a spirit of conciliation? Dr. Owen, not content with exacting his tithe from his parishioners, under the obsolete and unenrolled Act of Henry VIII., expects to obtain relief from contribution to the Poor Laws, which were not framed till the period of Queen Elizabeth. One gentleman had informed them, that he had Dr. Owen's solemn assurance, that if he was exempt from any payment of the poor-rate, he would never augment his tithe beyond 2s. in the pound. This, to be sure, was very modest, and very forbearing considering that Dr. Owen only received 2,000l. per annum, at the levy of 2s. in the pound. Consider the time Dr. Owen had chosen to object against contributing towards maintaining the poor—the very period when the Head of the Church had directed the Bishops to instruct the Clergy to ask of the people alms for their support. (Hear.) "Yes, gentlemen," exclaimed Mr. Rolfe, "we have Dr. Owen going round, in obedience to the mandate of his superior, soliciting alms for the poor, and the very same Dr. Owen setting himself up in hostile array against the whole parish, with a view to get exempted from bearing any portion of the expense attendant on the support of the poor." Mr. Rolfe, who has always been the most strenuous in opposing the Doctor, concluded by saying, that in dealing with him, the memorable words of St. Peter should always be before them—"Through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandize of you." (Cheers.)

Mr. Nodin observed, that the law made it imperative, not only to assess the Rector, but also to receive the rate from him after being so assessed; and gentlemen must be quite aware that, unless the Rector did pay his quota to the poor-rate, it would form good, valid, and sufficient reason, for any individual to appeal against the rate. The parish had no alternative, but to do that which the law directed them to do; and they should do that fearlessly, regardless of the threats of the Rector. It was his bounden duty to share with the parishioners the expenses incidental to the relief of the poor.

Mr. Davey—Dr. Owen has stated, that if he is rated, he shall appeal against every poor-rate.

Mr. Baker, the Vestry-Clerk—I apprehend that a rate can be made out, which Dr. Owen could not successfully make an appeal against.

Mr. Hill—Dr. Owen has declared, that he will appeal against every rate, if he be assessed. Could not the parish, in order to render the assessment proper, continue still to rate Dr. Owen, though they need not call upon him for the payment of the rate?

Mr. Nodin agreed, that no other plan could be devised, than that of granting the Doctor a gratuity; and it would be for the parish to determine, when the proper time came, how far that would be expedient or just. It was quite evident that the Rector must pay the poor-rate, as the only valid plea for exemption was poverty, and it was not very likely that Dr. Owen should set up that plea.

It was at last agreed, without a dissentient voice, that Dr. Owen should not only be compelled to pay the two poor-rates, which were due, but that he should still continue to be assessed for the future. The Meeting then dissolved.

The sum for which the stud of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York sold at Tattersall's was 8,800l. This includes a few chaises and dogs. Two or three of the horses were not sold.

THE INFIDEL TAYLOR.—This notorious person was the occasion of creating considerable disturbance, on Thursday night, at a Dissenters' Meeting-house, in Barbican. An Anniversary Meeting of a Society, called "The Christian Instruction Society," was held there, at six o'clock in the evening. It was attended by Dr. Styles, and several other popular Dissenting Ministers, and the Chapel was crowded to excess. Soon after the business of the evening had commenced, it was buzzed about the Chapel that "the infidel Taylor was present, with some of his colleagues." This produced great excitation in a considerable portion of the congregation, but, we believe, the rumour did not reach the ears of the Ministers present for some time. As soon, however, as it was generally known that this person was in the Chapel, the notice of all was attracted. The speakers, and particularly Dr. Styles, took occasion to advert to some of the doctrines promulgated by the celebrated Deistical writers, such as Shattesbury, Bolingbroke, Voltaire, Hume, Tom Paine, &c. and to defend the doctrines of the Christian Religion against the attacks of these writers. This they did in an eloquent and powerful manner. Taylor, who had before attempted some interruption, now increased his efforts, and the whole congregation became considerably excited. They applauded the several speakers with great vehemence, while Taylor, or a party of his, who were understood to be in the Chapel, occasionally hissed, and offered other interruptions. At the conclusion of the proceedings, Taylor stood on the seat he occupied, at the back of the Chapel, and, with a paper in his hand, attempted to address the Meeting, but was prevented from doing so by the disturbance which then prevailed. One of the Ministers, from a temporary platform erected at the other end of the Chapel, addressed him, and intimated that the business of the Meeting was then over, and that if he did not immediately take his departure, the consequence to him would be serious, adding, that that place was not a debating club. Taylor, who now appeared much irritated, renewed his efforts to address the Meeting, but in vain, and at length, finding that he was likely to be forcibly expelled from the Chapel, he precipitately made his way out, followed by a great crowd. The rest of the congregation then separated. Shortly after Taylor had quitted, some of the glass of the windows of the Chapel was broken, but we did not hear that any further mischief occurred. Taylor, who was dressed in his usual dandified style, took written notes of some of the speakers' addresses during the evening.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.—Feb. 6.

THE KING v. WILLIAM AND EDWARD GIBBON WAKEFIELD.

Mr. Sergeant Cross moved for a rule, calling upon the defendants to show cause why a writ of procedendo should not issue for the trial of the defendants (in the county of Lancaster), against whom a bill of indictment, for a misdemeanour, had been found at the last Assizes for Lancaster. The alleged misdemeanour was committed in March, 1826, and the defendants appeared at the last Assizes for Lancaster. One of the defendants was bound to take his trial at that Assizes; but the other defendant, Edward Gibbon Wakefield, had by law a right to traverse until the following Assizes, and he having availed himself of that right, the other defendant, William Wakefield, absconded on the day of trial. On the 22d of last month, E. G. Wakefield obtained a writ of certiorari for the removal of his trial into this Court, and entered into recognizances to try the indictment at the next Assizes; but the recognizances did not state that the defendant would appear at that Assizes. The other defendant did not enter into any recognizances, but pleaded to the indictment by his attorney. The application of the defendant was granted upon two grounds; first, that there were difficulties in the case which rendered it necessary that it ought to be brought into this Court in order to receive the collective consideration of their Lordships; and secondly, that the cause could not be fairly and impartially tried by a Lancashire jury, in consequence of various publications in the Macclesfield Courier, a newspaper published in the adjoining county, (Cheshire.) The defendant's affidavit particularly alluded to two paragraphs which had appeared in that newspaper; and it was further stated, that the said newspaper had a very extensive circulation in the Northern Counties. In answer to this affidavit he (Mr. Sergeant Cross) had an affidavit, stating, that not more than 40 copies of that newspaper were sent into the county of Lancaster, which contained a population amounting to nearly a million—and that the two paragraphs in question were merely observations upon a statement published by the defendants, reflecting upon the character of the prosecutor; that those paragraphs were re-published in the various other newspapers throughout the kingdom, and if those paragraphs could have produced any prejudice in the minds of the Jurors of Lancashire, they must have produced a similar prejudice in the minds of the Jurors of every county in England, and therefore, the cause could not be impartially tried in any other county. The consequence of removing this indictment into this Court, even if it should be tried in the county of Lancaster, would be, that the defendant need not appear in person at the Assizes. The affidavit on the part of the prosecution stated that it was necessary the defendants should appear in person at the Assizes, in order that they may be identified.

Lord Chief Justice.—Take the rule.

Mr. Justice Bayley.—Do you apply in one case only?

Mr. Sergeant Cross.—No, my Lord, there is another indictment, in which Mrs. Frances Wakefield, and Edward Gibbon Wakefield, the defendants, and in which, upon their affidavit, a writ of certiorari has been also granted. I therefore pray for the rule in both cases.

Rule granted, and service of the rule upon the defendants' attornies to be sufficient.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—Lord Teynham waited upon the Lord Mayor, to deny the general truth of the statement made to his Lordship by the female who was brought before him from the Refuge for the Houseless.

The Lord Mayor referred the Noble Peer to the gentlemen of the committee for the management of the refuge, who had given her relief, and inquired into the circumstances of the case, and who could better satisfy his Lordship as to the evidence which had been received as to the truth of her statement.

Lord Teynham then went in search of the gentlemen of the committee, but we believe did not succeed in finding them. His Lordship, we understand, complained, where he went, that such a liberty should be taken by the press as to mention the name of a peer of the realm in such a manner as to reflect upon him. His Lordship stated, that he buried his brother in 1814. The latter, he declared, married, in 1802, Anne Smollet, at the church of St. Anne, Soho; they disagreed and separated, and she was living at the time of his death, and has since (his Lordship was told) married again. Therefore, "Mary Rivitt" could not be his widow. She was not the daughter of a captain in the navy, but of some "low man" in Norwich, where his Lordship believed she had a sister married to a manufacturer. Until 1824, he declared that he never heard or saw this woman, nor did he ever know of her connexion with his brother, Mr. E. Roper, before then. She then, he presumed, thought she could extort money from him by threatening to expose in the newspapers the follies of his late brother. His Lordship, who seemed to have minute information, said his brother's connexion with her began about 1810, consequently she could not have had seven children by him, nor did he believe that she had any. His Lordship declined from the first any intercourse with her, as she had no reasonable claim upon his family for support, whatever might be her misfortunes. His Lordship denied that her statement had any foundation whatever. He added, moreover, that supposing her to have any just claim, he had ten children, and his fortune was not sufficient to meet it. He denied that he had any disagreement with his brother, or that the latter had any other income than that which he derived from his Lordship's bounty. His Lordship succeeded to his title from his first cousin, and not from his father. Mr. Edward Roper, being his Lordship's younger brother, could not, of course, be the Hon. Mr. Roper

It is requisite to state, that the circumstances under which the female in question was received at the Refuge for the Houseless, and brought before the Lord Mayor, were—first, that she was undoubtedly in a state of extreme distress; secondly, that she produced a certificate of marriage between her and Mr. E. Roper, at Marylebone Church, in 1800; so that, according to his Lordship's statement, it must be a forgery, or his brother must have contracted the marriage criminally. Then she produced letters and documents from other persons, from Mr. Fenton, the music-seller, and others; and Messrs. Smith, Payne, and Smith, when referred to, declared they knew her, and had opened a subscription, and were ready to receive subscriptions again in her behalf.

These circumstances, together with the fact of a subscription having been opened before, which his Lordship had not, it is understood, in any way noticed, led to the conclusion that her case was one which might be depended upon. Impostors never can do any thing more fatal to their career than to allow the public statement of their cases at such a place as the Mansion-house, since it is sure to elicit the best existing evidence for or against them. A further enquiry will, we understand, be made into the authenticity of the marriage certificate produced by the applicant, and also into other parts of her case, to prove whether or not she may be considered deserving of the relief sent to her, or any additional aid. Several small sums of money have been received for her.

MARYLEBONE.—Wednesday the lady of Mr. C. T. Hall, a respectable riding-master in the New-road, was brought up from Marylebone watchhouse, to which place she had been consigned for the night, on the charge of an alleged assault upon her husband.

Mr. Hall stated that it was impossible for him to live with his lady, because of her ungovernable temper; the night before "she worked herself up into a fit of exasperation," under the influence of which she struck him and pushed him down stairs.

Mr. Rawlinson.—And did you give her no provocation?

Mr. Hall.—It was because I was going to the Opera; a friend gave me a ticket, and I was going.

"Without her, I suppose," said Mr. Rawlinson?

Mr. Hall.—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Rawlinson.—Which put her in an ill humour, and she pushed you down stairs?

Mr. Hall.—Yes, Sir.

Mr. Rawlinson.—It is a disgraceful thing in your situation to send your wife to a watchhouse: probably there are faults on both sides, and when disagreements arise, why do you not call in your mutual friends to settle the matter between you?

Mr. Hall.—Our friends have interfered repeatedly, and I have had her several times before Mr. Griffiths to no purpose, her conduct is as violent as ever; she follows me, I assure you, Sir, from room to room, and even into the stables, for the purpose of striking me.

Mr. Rawlinson, (to Mrs. Hall.)—I am sorry, madam, to see you here under this charge; have you any answer to give?

Mrs. Hall.—I do not wish to justify myself, or expose him. I have a family of small children, and I do not wish to say any thing.

Mr. Rawlinson—I think your being sent to a watchhouse is an unjustifiable step. (To Mr. Hall)—What is to be done—do you wish her to find bail?

Mr. Hall.—Yes, Sir, for I do not think myself safe; my character is not safe, and my respectability is not safe.

Mr. Rawlinson.—I do not knew what you mean by your "respectability is not safe."

Mr. Hall.—In consequence of the mob she collects round the house.

Mrs. Hall.—If you require bail, Sir, I must go to prison. I cannot give bail: he is as much in fault as I am.

Mr. Rawlinson.—I do not wish to enter into your disputes; if you cannot agree, had you not better part?

Mr. Hall.—We have been acting for some time past under Mr. Griffiths's advice; we entered into an agreement, which she has broken. Mr. Hall went on to complain of Mr. Rawlinson's not letting the case be heard in private, an indulgence which he stated the other worthy magistrate had on former occasions granted.

Mr. Rawlinson said if it would be more satisfactory to Mr. Hall to bring the matter before Mr. Griffith, it might stand over till the following day, when that gentleman would be on the bench: the lady in the mean time must be liberated, upon a promise to attend.

This proposition was accepted, and on the following day Mr. Hall repeated his former statement, and Mr. Griffith addressed Mrs. Hall: I am sorry to see you here again, Madam; what will be the end of all this?

Mrs. Hall.—I really do not know.

Mr. Hall.—Is it your fault, or is it my fault?

Mrs. Hall.—I do not wish to justify myself.

Mr. Hall.—And I do not wish to expose you; I only wish to have protection.

Mr. Griffith—And protection he must have, Madam; this is the same thing over and ever again. I was almost under the necessity of signing a warrant before; indeed, I believe I did sign one, and unless you can govern your temper, he must have security.

Mr. Hall proposed an arrangement for their separation, to which Mrs. Hall said she would accede, and the case was dismissed.

W. Pole was brought before Mr. Griffith, on a warrant granted to his wife, for that he did, on the 4th instant, threaten to cut her down. The disparity of this couple, when they presented themselves before the bench, occasioned much surprise. The defendant is an effeminate and very little man of 25. Mrs. Susanna Frances Pole, the complainant, is a tall robust woman of 70, who, if ever she did possess personal charms, has now to regret the loss of them. As soon as Mrs. Pole had taken her proper station, She pronounced her life in danger, and said she had brought her landlady to prove the truth of her assertion. "Your worship," said she, "my husband locks me out, and locks me in, and threatens to cut me down."

Mr. Griffith (looking at all but the right person, for he stood surrounded by his friends) said, "Which is your husband?"

Mrs. Pole—That man, your Worship.

Mr. Griffith.—What, the little man?

Mrs. Pole.—Yes, your Worship.

Mr. Griffith.—Well, go on with your story.

Mrs. Pole.—When I married him, your Worship, I had a pretty school of four-and-twenty children, and they all left me in consequence of his bad conduct. I lived in Cleveland-street, and since I removed into Spring-street, I had two other boarders, and they have now left me. One day he threatened to thrust a case knife down my throat, and he has poisoned himself twice—

Mr. Griffith.—Poisoned himself?

Mrs. Pole.—The last time he poisoned himself was on Christmas-day, and he had two doctors with him from ten in the morning till eight at night.

Mr. Griffith—You have made a strange choice of a husband, and you are telling a very strange story. What did he do last night?

Mrs. Pole—He did nothing last night, for he was in the watchhouse; but on Sunday he took up the poker, and threatened to cleave me down.

Mr. Griffith (to the defendant).—Have you any thing to say?

Mr. Pole (casting a significant look at his wife).—After the lady has done.

Mrs. Pole.—I could say a great deal more.

Mr. Griffith.—No, it is his turn now.

Mr. Pole.—Five months ago, that is two months after we were married, she began her tricks with me, for she took boiling hot water off the fire, and threw it in my face. Afterwards, when I was ill in bed, she took the —— I do not know how to express myself, your worship.

Mr. Griffith wished him to proceed, and he stated that on that occasion she threw the candle and the candlestick, with every thing else in the chamber, and all their contents, upon him. It is her, added the defendant, that assaults me, and not me her.

"I have a witness to prove to the contrary," cried out Mrs. Pole, "and I can tell your worship a great deal more myself."

Mr. Griffith.—Don't let her talk again; let her stand down.

The landlady then stood up and gave her evidence:—The first I knew of it, your worship, was on Christmas-day, when Mrs. Pole came down to me, and said she hoped I would not be alarmed if I heard a noise upstairs, for Mr. Pole was come home groggy, and had begun his old tricks; this was early in the morning, and to complete himself he borrowed some money, with which he bought three glasses more of brandy, and a quantity of laudanum. After he had drunk it, we could not see any life in him, and it took two or three doctors the whole day to recover him. Last Sunday, one of the boarders came down stairs screaming, for Mr. Pole was breaking every thing in the room of her governess to pieces; on Monday he locked himself into the room, and his wife out; he tied the door also with cords, and fastened the window with gimlets.

Mr. Griffith (to Mrs. Pole).—What trade is this husband of your's?

Mrs. Pole.—He is a tailor; but earns nothing. He brought me nothing but a few crockery, which he has broken to pieces, and all I want of him is peace.

Mr. Griffith (to the defendant).—If I hear any more complaint from your wife, I will send you to Bridewell.

Mrs. Pole.—He went last night, your worship, to all the shops in the neighbourhood, left his card, and ordered all manner of things which were not wanted.

Mr. Griffith.—Hear me, woman: if he plays these tricks again, I'll send him to Bridewell.—Case dismissed.

HATTON-GARDEN.—Novel Application.—A singular visaged native of the sister isle, was, at his own earnest entreaty, introduced to the presence of W. L. Rogers, Esq., the Sitting Magistrate, to request, as he said, "his Wortchip's interfarance in the recovery of his child, of which he had been robbed."

When asked to state his grievance, he began—"Och, its no grievance then, in the world, its downright robbery, your wortchip, for they have kilt and murdered my child."

Magistrate.—In what way can I assist you? Who killed your child?

Complainant.—The mother, your wortchip, and no soul else, but two or three more women.

He was then told that it was impossible for the Magistrate to understand him, unless he told his tale straight forward.

Complainant.—That's what I'll do, then; my name's Tim Flannigan, and I lodge in Saffron-hill; but I've not lived there this two years. My wife does thoughts, and so does the child that's dead, and was buried last Tuesday week. Sure, she has another child of her own, that's not mine, and that crature had the falling sickness, saving your Wortchip's presence, which the undutiful mother, bad luck attend her, charmed out of her other urchin, and puts it all upon my poor cratur, which was her's as well, for we were lawfully married at Kilkenny, eight years agone. They've kilt the child and buried it, your Wortchip; but I don't believe its dead, only spell-bound, and I know you can break the spell.

It was with considerable difficulty poor Tim was convinced that the magistrate had no power to break charms of that description, and he returned, declaring that he would apply to the "clargy."

UNION-HALL.—Two young men, named John Vaux and Charles Goring, of respectable appearance, were brought before M. Swabey, Esq., from the Camberwell watchhouse, where they had been confined during the preceding night, charged with uttering two counterfeit sovereigns.

Baxter, a constable of Camberwell, shortly stated the circumstances under which he apprehended the accused persons. He said, that on the previous evening, as he was passing along Camberwell, he observed Vaux in a shop making some purchase, in payment for which he tendered a sovereign, which on being sounded on the counter by the shopkeeper, did not appear to him to "ring" as a genuine one should; he therefore refused to take it, observing that he thought it was a counterfeit; upon which Vaux produced another sovereign, which was also refused upon the supposition that it was a bad one; the latter then left the shop, and proceeded to another, within a few doors, followed by the constable, who made his appearance just as Vaux had handed one of the sovereigns which had been pronounced as counterfeit coin in the first instance, to the person within the counter. Both the sovereigns were also rejected here, upon which Baxter immediately took him into custody on a charge of uttering counterfeit sovereigns, and locked him up in the watchhouse. It appeared that Vaux had repeatedly declared them in his judgment to be genuine sovereigns, and recollecting that he had taken them a short time previously from an individual named Goring, he sent for that person to the watchhouse, who at once admitted that he had paid them to Vaux, and expressed his surprise and astonishment that the sovereigns should have been rejected, as he was convinced they were gold. The constable, however, instead of placing any reliance on Mr. Goring's statement, locked him up also in the watchhouse along with Mr. Vaux, where they were detained during the night. Baxter now produced the two sovereigns which were described as counterfeit ones; he said that he had tried them, and was convinced they were composed of spurious metal.

The magistrate, on looking at them, observed that they appeared to have been filed a good deal.

The constable said that he cut them in order to discover what they were made of.

Magistrate.—And can you now positively swear that they are counterfeit.

Baxter.—No, Sir, I should not like to do that; but I firmly believe them to be base metal.

The magistrate here directed the sovereigns to be rung on the table, in order to discover whether they were good or bad; but that plan failed, as the constable had been exercising his ingenuity on them with the file, by which he took all sound out of them, and rendered it impossible to arrive at the merits of the case by that method.

It was here suggested that Mr. Phillimore, the pawnbroker, should be sent for, in order that he might be enabled to state positively whether the suspected money was genuine or otherwise.

In the interim, the case against the accused persons seemed, in the view of the Magistrate, to be so pregnant with suspicion, that he actually directed their commitments to be made out. Mr. Phillimore, however, soon entered the office, prepared with the usual test for trying gold, viz.—aquafortis; and on applying it to the sovereigns, he at once pronounced them to be genuine; they were afterwards placed in the scales, but were a little deficient in weight, and this was accounted for from the operation of filing they underwent in the hands of Baxter, the constable, who cut into near the centre of one of them during the experiment. Upon hearing the decision of the pawnbroker, the constable, more than any body else, appeared to be astounded. "What," said he, "the sovereigns not bad? why this has been a dreadful mistake, indeed. Well, I could have almost sworn they were counterfeit before the trial with the aquafortis."

Vaux complained of the hardship of having been locked up on such a charge, and said that his committal to gaol (had not this investigation taken place) would have brought utter ruin upon him. His associate in trouble also inveighed against the constable, for having locked them up without more minutely examining the money which he charged them with having uttered as counterfeit, but which now, after they had been confined a whole night, turned out to be genuine.

The Magistrate expressed his regret that they should have been put to the serious inconvenience alluded to, and observed that they were now perfectly exonerated from the charge, and therefore left that office without the slightest imputation upon their characters.

Escape of the Convict, Bishop.—Portsmouth, Feb. 8.—As the affair at Bethnal Green, in which Bishop and Brighton were concerned, has occasioned much noise in the world, I write you to say that they were both sent here after their respective, as convicts for life, probably to await the muster of a ship load for Botany. When here, they are at the Government Works.—Bishop was among the gang, working on shore daily at Fort Monckton, on the Gosport side; and last evening he contrived to make his escape, in which he must have been well assisted, as from his disguise, he evaded the vigilance of the keepers, as well as the numerous centinels posted round them. His convict clothes were found in one of the embrasures of the Fort; and from this, it is imagined, his friends had secreted a complete disguise for him the day before, and by some means made him acquainted with it.

M. Cesar Moreau.—This very ingenious gentleman, whose numerous and important, and most laborious works on commerce have deservedly obtained the frequent notice and praise of the public, has, we have been given to understand, been unanimously elected a Member of the Royal Society.

National Tales.—We were the earliest, and we think, the warmest panegyrists of Hood's clever Whims and Oddities, and can barely express our satisfaction at the thought of meeting him under the form of two new volumes of tales. We are told that some of the forthcoming stories are grave, but we confess a sneaking fondness for the humorous, and are not displeased to learn that a large proportion of the books consists of decidedly comic narrative.

THE ARMY.

The 2d Division of the 21st (Royal North British Fuzileers) Regiment, arrived on Wednesday on board the Indian Trader, transport, at Cowes, from the Leeward Islands.

Detachments belonging to the 80th and 85th Regiments of Infantry, embarked on Wednesday, on board the Heydon transport, at Gosport, for Malta.

A Detachment of the 6th Regiment of Dragoon Guards, marched on Friday, from Westminster, for Nottingham.

A Detachment belonging to the 57th Regiment of Infantry, marched on Friday, from Westminster, for Baraley.

A Detachment belonging to the East India Company's Service, embarked yesterday, on board a Steam-vessel in the River, for Gravesend, on route to Chatham.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL THE HON. SIR W. STEWART.

The late Lieutenant-General Sir W. Stewart entered the service on the 8th March, 1786, as an Ensign in the 42d (Royal Highland) Regiment of Foot; obtained on the 24th October, 1827, a Lieutenantcy in the 67th Regiment of Infantry; was promoted on the 24th January, 1791, to a Company of Independents; was transferred on the 31st October, 1792, to the 22d Regiment of Foot; and advanced on the 28th December, 1794, to a Majority in the 31st Regiment of Infantry.

The Hon. Sir William Stewart was appointed on the 14th January, 1795, Lieutenant-Colonel of Independents; was transferred on the 1st September, 1795, to the 67th Regiment; and on the 25th Augnst, 1800, to the Rifle Brigade. He was appointed on the 2d April, 1801, Colonel in the Army; was raised on the 25th April, 1800, to the rank of Major-General; on the 4th June, 1813, to that of Lieutenant-General; and made on the 31st Aug. 1809, Colonel-Commandant of the Rifle Brigade.

Deal Barracks, Feb. 6, 1827.

This day the Depots of the 44th, and 48th regiments were inspected by Major-General Sir H. Torrens, who expressed himself highly pleased with the regularity and soldier-like appearance of the men under the command of Captain Duke, 48th regiment, an officer in high estimation here, and considered an excellent drill under the Adjutant-General's new system. The General seemed much pleased with the school establishment for the privates and non-commissioned officers of the Depots here, and the extreme regularity of the Hospital Department, under the direction of Assistant-Surgeon Marshall, of the 87th regiment.

We are happy in being enabled to announce that the accounts from Brighton yesterday evening state Mr. Canning to be decidedly better.

The Allgemeine Zietung has been received to the 4th instant. Under date of Rome, Dec. 26, is mentioned that a great sensation had been created in "the eternal city," by the shield of Achilles, of which we some time ago translated a minute description, and the other splendid presents sent by the King of France to the Pope, which however, at that date, had not been seen by any one.

We received yesterday, the Austrian Observer to the 29th ult. The Marquis de Ribeaupiere, the Russian Ambassador to the Porte, left Jassy on the 14th January, to proceed Bucharest and Constantinople.

Baron Stierneld, the Swedish Minister, transacted business on Wednesday at the office of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Count de Survilliers (Joseph Buonaparte) has just commissioned one of his friends in France to subscribe 1,000 francs towards the monument to be erected to Talma, and 1,000 francs to the monument of David.

In consequence of the late alarm in Portugal, we understand that the principal merchants of Oporto have made large shipments of the oldest Wines to Mr. Charles Wright of the Opera Colonade.

A file of papers from Port-au-Prince (Hayti) to the 17th December have been received. They contain no news, but seem to establish the fact, which has been so much disputed lately, of the existence of a Rural Code in Hayti, as the Telegraphe of the 12th of November contains a notice from the office of the Chief Secretary to the Government, fixing the amount of stamp duty to be paid on certain contracts prescribed by the law No. 3, of the Rural Code. It appears also by the address to the Chamber of Deputies in Hayti, at the close of the session on the 10th of May last, that a Rural Code is mentioned as one of the measures completed during its continuance. No copy of such a Code has, however, reached England by the present arrival.

HASTINGS.—A melancholy and fatal accident happened on Monday evening last, at Government-house, the residence of the Hon. Mrs. Theophilus Jones, who was suddenly seized with a paralytic stroke, and fell from her chair, and fractured both her legs. Mr. Dick, surgeon, and Dr. M'Cave, were immediately called in, and Admiral Jones was sent for express, and arrived on Wednesday morning. Mrs. Jones lingered till Thursday afternoon, when she expired; she continued insensible, and neither spoke nor opened her eyes from the time the fatal accident occurred; she was in her 86th year, and her name will long be remembered with gratitude by the poor of this place, who have in her lost a good and warm-hearted friend.—Brighton Gazette.

A Supplement to the Gazette, which was published on Monday, contains Addresses of Condolence to his Majesty on the death of his late lamented Royal Brother, from St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, St. James's, and a number of places in various parts of England and Scotland; all of them couched in terms most devotedly affectionate towards his Majesty's person and Government.

THE LATE DUKE OF YORK.—It has been stated that till within the last three years, his late Royal Highness the Duke of York was a remarkably healthy and strong man, fond of parties, but very attentive to business, and undergoing much fatigue in order to attend to his public duties. The following anecdote, while it serves to confirm this statement, furnishes a remarkable instance of his Royal Highness's extraordinary success in one of his shooting parties:—In the season of 1823, his Royal Highness was extremely fortunate in all his shooting parties; in fact, his Royal Highness had been what is called the best shot of the company, particularly on Saturday, the 24th January, 1824, at the seat of the Earl of Verulam, in Hertfordshire, when his Royal Highness killed 98 pheasants, besides other game. The Royal Duke continued the pursuit of his sport till dark, as was his Royal Highness's custom, and afterwards dined with the Earl and Countess, stopped to an evening party, and left between one and two o'clock for London, where he arrived on Sunday morning about four o'clock, and attended Divine Service at the Chapel Royal, at 12 o'clock.

DREADFUL FIRE, AND LOSS OF LIFE.—BIRMINGHAM, FEB. 8.—On Monday morning, a fire broke out in the Aston Junction steam-mill, Aston Road, occupied by Mr. Badam, which gained such complete possession of the upper part of the mill before it was discovered, that the men who were at work below, had scarcely time to escape, from the flames breaking through the ceiling with such rapidity. A single young man was at work in the uppermost story, and, being in a bad state of health, it is thought he had fallen asleep, and while in that state the candle set fire to the room, and he was suffocated. When the upper floor fell, his body fell with it into the burning mass of ruins. So rapid was the progress of the flames, that in a very few minutes the whole range of building, a hundred and twenty feet in length, was an entire blaze. By the timely arrival of the engines, and a good supply of water from the canal, a great deal of property was saved. The most meritorious order was preserved by the soldiers, who came from the barracks. Yesterday afternoon an Inquest was held on the body, when the Jury, without the least hesitation, returned a verdict of—Accidental Death.

MADEMOISELLE SONTAG.

This lady is one of the loveliest and sweetest singers that has appeared for a long time. She is said to have been born in France. She is at present engaged at Berlin. In four months the King's Theatre, in London, will enjoy her presence, and in a year she will appear for the second time at the Italian Theatre of Paris. Now, can you guess, ladies and gentlemen, to what cause you owe the pleasure of hearing this singer, and to what you may probably owe the pain of never hearing her on the stage again? To a passion—a passion the most lively in its nature, the most profound—in fact, absolutely German. The young gentleman whom Mademoiselle Sontag has inspired with such tender feelings, Lady Fame, hitherto the most discreet of Females, has informed us is a German, heir of one of the first families in Prussia, the Prince de Hardemberg. We have not learned whether the fair object of his love returns it. The following is the story that has been given to us:—The young Prince had no sooner beheld Mademoiselle Sontag in the theatre at Berlin, than he became distractedly in love with her. He offered her his heart—his fortune—his hand; but she would accept of none of them, without the consent of his family. The Prince having received a formal refusal from his father, fell into a deep melancholy, from which nothing could rouse him. He renewed his entreaties, but with the same success, and finished at length by writing to his father, that he would never act against his will, but that, not being able to exist without the woman he loved, he was determined to put an end to his sufferings by ridding himself of his life. If the recital that has been made to us be not unfaithful, the father, who is much attached to his only son, but who partakes of those prejudices which are united in the ancient German nobility with great simplicity of manners, answered him, in a very affecting letter, that nothing in the world would make him consent, whilst he lived, to the dishonour of his name, by a mesalliance—that it was he who ought to quit a life, the termination of which was approaching, and that if the Prince persisted in his project, he would speedily by that means place him at liberty to attain it. The son, without renouncing his love, sacrificed it to a more sacred duty. The affair came to the ears of the King of Prussia, of whom the father is one of the most faithful servants. His Majesty summoned him to his presence—spoke to him with kindness—and, without participating in his prejudices of birth, he requested him to observe, that if, as every thing announced, the conduct of Malle. Sontag was irreproachable, and even exemplary, there could be no dishonour in his son marrying her, since his passion was so violent; that it would not be the first time that the heir of a great name had raised an actress to a level with himself; but it was proper to submit the one to a trial of absence, and the other to a trial of the allurements of life. It appears that the King of Prussia is exactly informed of the allurements that are to be met with in Paris and London, for he resolved that Malle. Sontag should enter upon her trials in France, and finish them in England; and hitherto admirers have, doubtless, not been wanting. This is the reason why Malle. Sontag was heard at Paris, and this is the reason why you are to hear her at London. We have heard it added, that emissaries charged to watch over her conduct, and to render a faithful account of all her doings, watched her day and night during her sojourn in France, and that no imprudence, no levity on her part, has yet furnished a pretext for the slightest doubtful report; so that in a very short time she will be seen no more on those boards of which she might one day be the brightest ornament.—Le Furet.

MADAME VESTRIS is again delighting the town with the Bavarian Broom Girl's Song, introduced in Peake's new farce of the "1001. Note."

It is stated, that since the year 1824, no fewer than 21,421,985 acres of land have been ceded by the Indians to the United States.

The Almanack of Spectacles gives the following account of the state of the Paris theatres:—They support 15,000 families; the number of actors, dancers, &c. is 2,994; 100 directors, 100 managers, 100 leaders of bands, and 15,000 musicians!

CLERICAL RECUSANT.—The Rev. Roger Hitchcock, who has for several years been a most worthy clergyman of the Church of England, performing his clerical duties with the utmost zeal, and in return possessing the esteem and affection of his flock, has for the last few months seceded from the Establishment, and become a convert to the necessity of adult baptism. The venerable Bishop of the diocese used every means, by way of argument, to retain the Rev. Gentleman in the Church, but without effect; and on Sunday week he underwent the ceremony of immersion at the Baptist Chapel in Devizes.—Chester Courant.

DUBLIN, FEB. 5.—Mr. Shiel has just entered into recognizances, himself in 400l., and two sureties in 200l. each, to abide his trial at the next commission, for a seditious speech. Daniel O'Connel and Stephen Woulfe, Esqrs. are his bail. We understand that the prosecution is grounded on the speech made by that gentleman wherein reference was made to Theobald Wolfe Tone.

On Sunday last, four inhabitants of Bandon, county of Cork, publicly read their recantation, abjuring the errors of Popery, in Kilbeogan church, in presence of a numerous and highly respectable congregation.—Belfast Commercial Chronicle.

THE LATE DUKE OF YORK.—An emergency or special general meeting of the Grand Masonic Lodge of England was convened for Wednesday, at the Freemasons' Tavern, for the purpose of preparing an address to be presented to their brother, the King, on the death of the Duke of York. Precisely at high noon, the hour appointed, the R. W. D. G. M. took the chair on the Throne, when an address, couched in terms of sympathy and true masonic feeling, was unanimously adopted, and the Lodge separated without having entered into any other business whatever.

In the late Duke of York's wardrobe, the robes, &c. worn by his Royal Highness when a boy, were found, which are understood to be the only robes remaining belonging to any of the Royal Family, which they wore in their juvenile days.

As a proof of his late lamented Royal Highness the Duke of York's attention to the offspring of old Officers—there is an Officer now quartered at Chatham who laid before his Royal Highness the Commissions of his ancestors, signed by King Charles I. and II., King William III., Queen Anne, King George I. and II., and one given to his great-grandfather on the field at the battle of Aughrim, signed by General de Ginckell, dated 1691. His Royal Highness immediately appointed him to an Ensigncy. This Officer joined his Regiment in Spain, and was severely wounded at the battles of the Pyrenees and Toulouse.

MONUMENT TO THE MEMORY OF HIS LATE ROYAL HIGHNESS THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF.—We have the greatest pleasure in communicating to the public, that the Committee of Management for carrying into execution the patriotic object of the Meeting, held on Wednesday, for erecting a Monument in the metropolis of Scotland, to perpetuate the memory of the late Commander-in-Chief, his Royal Highness the late Duke of York and Albany, have, in compliance with a very general feeling, expressed to them from High Authority, agreed that no limitation shall take place in the amount of individual subscriptions.

COLDS CAUGHT AT THE DUKE OF YORK'S FUNERAL.—The Bishop of Lincoln died on Wednesday morning, in consequence of cold his Lordship took while attending the funeral of the Duke of York, in the Royal vault in St. George's Chapel. The Duke of Sussex is at present suffering severely from the same cause, and his medical attendants are in daily waiting on his Royal Highness. Mr. Canning labours under a similar indisposition. It has been asked how the Lord Chancellor, whose years, it might be supposed, would have rendered him as susceptible of cold as any of these individuals, escaped? His Lordship very wisely placed his hat under his feet during the funeral solemnities, and thus avoided the danger which was to be dreaded from standing upwards of an hour and a half on the cold stones of the Royal cemetery.

Sir J. G. Cotterell has received an answer to the petition from the Maltsters of Herefordshire, praying for an alteration in the time of wetting malt, and we regret to learn, that the Lords of the Treasury have found it "impossible" to comply with the wishes of the petitioners.—Worcester Journal.

On Wednesday last, as one of the turnkeys belonging to Preston Gaol was removing a convict, named George Waddington, to the Hulks, he contrived to elude the vigilance of his keeper and escape. Waddington, it appears, was placed on the roof of one of the Woolwich stages, where he was secured as such subjects commonly are under such circumstances. By some means or other, though in the middle of the day, he contrived, when the coach arrived at the Canal Bridge, Deptford, to slip his hand through the handcuff which fastened him to the roof, whence he jumped down and ran off, although double-ironed, and his legs much swollen in consequence of the fetters he wore.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which fire opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 22a, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 21., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

COLDS, COUGHS, ASTHMAS, &c.

BUTLER'S PECTORAL ELIXIR. Experience during a very long period has incontestably proved the superior efficacy of this Medicine, in all cases of Colds, Coughs, and Asthmatic Affections. By promoting gentle expectoration, it very shortly relieves the Patient of a slight or recent Cold, and a few doses are generally sufficient to remove those which neglect has rendered more confirmed and obstinate, and which are accompanied with Cough, Spitting of Blood, and other serious symptoms. Its peculiar balsamic powers tend to heal soreness, and allay the irritation of the lungs, in cases of Cough; and in Asthmatic Affections it assists and gives freedom to the Breath.

Sold in Bottles, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Prince's-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 135, New Bond-street; Willmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom may be had, BUTLER'S BALSAMIC LOZENGES, used in recent Coughs, Hoarseness, &c. and for rendering the Voice clear and flexible, and protecting its organs from the effects of exertion. In Boxes, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. N.B. Be careful to ask for Butler's Pectoral Elixir.

IMPOSTURE UNMASKED.—The progress of Merit, although frequently assailed, is not impeded by Envy and Detraction. The aggression of ambuscade terminates in defeat; and conscious rectitude ultimately triumphs in the attainment of the grand object—public approbation. The test of experience is the guarantee of favour, and has established WARREN'S BLACKING in general estimation; of which there exists not a stronger proof than the tacit acknowledgment of a host of servile imitators, who surreptitiously obtrude on the unwary a spurious preparation as the genuine article, to the great disappointment of the unguarded purchaser, and manifest injury of WARREN, whose character and interest by this iniquitous system are equally subject to detriment. It becomes therefore an indispensable duty to CAUTION THE PUBLIC against the manœuvres of Unprincipled Venders, who having no character to lose, and stimulated by avarice in their nefarious pursuits, aim at the acquisition of money through any medium than that of honour! The original and matchless BLACKING bears on each bottle a short direction, with the signature

ROBERT WARREN.

All others are counterfeits; and in many instances the imposition labels are artfully interlined with a different address, in very small characters, between the more conspicuous ones of "No. 30," and "STRAND." It is earnestly recommended to Shopkeepers and others who are deceived by base fabrications of WARREN'S BLACKING, to return the detected trash to the source whence it came, and expose the machinations of rascality to merited obloquy.

WARREN'S BLACKING is surpassingly brilliant;—it excludes damp; gives pliancy to the leather; retains its pristine virtue in all climates; and, combining elegance with comfort, is an article equally of indispensable fashion and utility. Sold by every respectable Vender in Town and Country, in bottles at 6d. 10d. 12d. and 18d. each.

DR. COURTENAY'S NEW WORK, Price 4s.

AN HISTORICAL and PRACTICAL TREATISE on SYPHILIS, Gonorrhœa, Gleets, Seminal Weakness, Strictures, Eruptions, Nodes, and Nocturnal Pains, so frequently mistaken for Rheumatism. These subjects are illustrated by a variety of highly-interesting cases, together with the miseries of a secret vice, so long and so unhappily pursued by the youth of both sexes. In the one it will be found the unfailing source of barrenness; the other have ravages fatally developed by a distressing state of debility, which, if not timely remedied, terminates in impotence; these are its remote and ultimate effects, while consumptions, loss of muscular power, and various nervous complaints, usually characterise the earlier stages of this most destructive and insidious habit, for the cure of which, a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author. With concluding remarks on the evils resulting from attempts at Self-cure.

By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. Robert-street, Adelphi.—Printed for the Author. Published and sold by Sutherland, No. 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; Jones and Co. Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell and Son, Cornhill; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Chapple, Pall-mall; and may be had of all Booksellers in town and country.

"Amongst the numerous medical and surgical works of the day, we consider that written by Dr. Courtenay, on Syphilis, and other frequently fatal complaints, to be worthy of the highest encomiums, and justly deserving the serious attention of all those persons who may unfortunately happen to be afflicted with the maladies which form the subject of this very interesting publication. The luminous view taken of these diseases, together with important warnings against excesses, entitle this work to great praise; and we may add as a further recommendation, that it is written with much delicacy and morality."—Inspector and Literary Review.

A Letter from W. Drayton, Esq. Sion-Hill, Bath.

TO Mrs. VINCENT, SOLE PROPRIETOR of GOWLAND'S LOTION.

MADAM—I should think myself deficient in duty to society and you, were I to withhold my public testimony to the great efficacy of your GOWLAND'S LOTION, which I have seen performed by the administration of it in a case under my own roof.

A young gentleman, aged about seven years, son of a Colonel in the army was afflicted with a virulent and sore eruption, accompanied with an intolerable itching in the wrists and insteps, the only places of attack of the complaint and that to so violent a degree as to make it necessary to confine his hands in bags, particularly at night: the complaint resisted various applications from the united consultation of three physicians of eminence, and continued to grow worse under the regimen prescribed, when a lady, who had received the cure of a very bad case of Scurvy in the face, of several years standing, by your Gowland's Lotion, recommended a trial of the same remedy. It was applied under my own inspection—the disease gave way—and three quarts of your Lotion performed a radical cure of a disorder, which had been of about four years duration, and had baffled the skill of several physicians eminent in their profession.

From my conviction of the above cure I recommended your Gowland's Lotion to a lady whose face exhibited a very disagreeable eruption, (even large pustules, and as one died away another appeared,) so much as to prohibit her going into company: a Quart of your Gowland's Lotion effected a cure, and she is now free from eruption. I am, Madam, &c.

CHILBLAINS, RHEUMATISM, SPRAINS, &c.

BUTLER'S CAJEPUT OPODELDOC.—Cajeput Oil, which is the basis of this Opodeldoc, has been long esteemed on the Continent, as a remedy for Chronic Rheumatism, Spasmodic Affections, Chilblains, Palsy, Stiffness, and Enlargement of the Joints, Sprains, Bruises, and Deafness; and the experience of late years, in England, proves that it merits the high character given of it by the most eminent in the profession, in those obstinate complaints. Being combined in the form of Opodeldoc, it is rendered more penetrating, and consequently much more efficacious as an external application. Rubbed upon the skin, by means of flannel, or the warm hand, it allays morbid irritation of nerves, invigorates the absorbents, and accelerates the circulation.
Sold in Bottles, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. by Butlers, Chemists, Cheapside, corner of St. Paul's; 73, Princes-street, Edinburgh; and 54, Sackville-street, Dublin; Savory and Co. 136, New Bond-street; Willmott, 83, High-street, Borough; and the principal Medicine Venders in the United Kingdom. Of whom also may be had MARSHALL'S UNIVERSAL CERATE, an excellent Remedy for Chilblains when broken; used also in Scalds, Burns, &c.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—Feb. 12.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL moved, that an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to assure his Majesty that the House of Lords fully participates in the deep regret so generally manifested by all his Majesty's subjects on the death of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, and to convey to his Majesty the expression of their Lordshtps' sincere regret on the loss of his beloved brother. To assure his Majesty also, that they take this opportunity of again expressing their sense of the great services of his Royal Highness as Commander-in-Chief ;that their Lordships have borne witness, with the utmost satisfaction, to the conduct of his Royal Highness in paying, to the last period of his life, that unremitted attention to the duties of his office, and to that impartiality in the exercise of all its functions, which has so essentially contributed to the public advantage, and to exalt the character of the British army—and that to the expression of these feelings of their sense of his public services and of their sincere sympathy, their Lordships add their dutiful assurances of their loyalty and attachment to his Majesty.

The Address was agreed to nem. diss.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.

The Earl of Lauderdale presented petitions from Forfar, Fife, and the Bamftshire Farmers' Club, against alteration of the Corn Laws; also one, having the same object, from Preston, in the County Palatine of Lancaster.

Lord Redesdale presented a Petition from Darlington, in the County of Durham, for protecting duties in the corn trade, and against alteration of the existing Corn Laws.

The above Petitions were read, and laid on the table.

THURSDAY, Feb. 15.

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF CLARENCE.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL brought down a Message from the King, which was read by the Lord Chancellor, and subsequently by the Reading Clerk:—

" G. Rex.

" His Majesty being desirous of making such further provision for the maintenance of the Duke and Duchess of Clarence, as may be suitable for their present high station, relies on the House of Lords for their concurrence, in assisting him to make such provision as the circumstances of the case may require. G. R."

The Earl of LIVERPOOL, after the above had been read, moved, that his Majesty's most Gracious Message be taken into consideration to-morrow, and the Lords summoned.—Ordered.

FRIDAY, Feb. 16.

ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY begged to inform their Lordships that his Majesty had been waited upon with the Address of Condolence, to which he had been pleased to return the following answer:—

"I thank you for your dutiful address, and the assurances of your sympathy with me in my present affliction; and the respect paid by you to the memory of my beloved brother, which is most consolatory to my feelings."

DUKE AND DUCHESS OF CLARENCE.

The Earl of LIVERPOOL then said, it was not his intention to take up their Lordships' time by making many observations on the subject of the address he should have the honour to move, because he certainly did think, after the melancholy event of the demise of the Duke of York, and the situation in which the illustrious Duke, then the subject of the address, stood, there could be no objection to a reasonable provision for that illustrious person. Their Lordships knew, however, that no pecuniary measure could originate in that House; but they, no doubt, expected to know how the provision was to be made. In consequence of the death of the Duke of York, 3,0001. a year fell to his Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence, as well as the other Noble Dukes, by right of survivorship. It was proposed to add to that sum 3,0001., and 6,0001. for the Duchess of Clarence, making an addition in the whole to his Royal Highness's income of 12,0001. a year. With respect to the Duchess of Clarence, any person who had witnessed her conduct, must know she was a most deserving object. The Noble Earl was unwilling to occupy more time than was absolutely necessary, and concluded by moving an address, to assure his Majesty that the House of Lords concurred in making provision suitable to the situation of the illustrious Duke, who was the subject of his most gracious message.

The address was then put and carried nem. dis.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Feb. 12.

Mr. C. W. WYNN hoped that the indisposition of Mr. Canning would induce the Hon. Baronet opposite (Sir F. Burdett) to postpone the important motion of which he had given notice (respecting the Catholic Claims). Perhaps he would postpone it to the 1st of March.

Sir F. BURDETT acceded to the suggestion of the Right Hon. Gentleman; and, on his motion, the order for the 22d instant was discharged, and fixed for the 1st of March.

Mr. PEEL gave notice, that as the 22d instant would now be an open day, he would then move for leave to bring in a bill for the consolidation of the criminal laws.

The MASTER of the ROLLS gave notice, that he would on Tuesday next (as we understood) move for leave to bring in a bill for the regulation of the Court of Chancery. (Hear, hear.)

ADDRESS TO THE KING.

Mr. PEEL commenced by observing, that in the interval which had elapsed between the period of the present re-assembling of Parliament, and its late separation, the country had, by death, sustained the loss of the first Prince of the realm—a Prince who, if he had lived, would in the probable course of nature have filled the Throne. Under such circumstances, the House would have been induced at any time, and without any extraordinary qualifications, to have respectfully addressed the Throne in terms expressive of sympathy and distress, from those feelings which arose from a conviction that no other form of Government than that which at present existed was congenial to the genius and character of the people, and to the preservation and continuance of their happiness. He could not, however, help feeling, that the circumstances under which he felt himself called upon to move this address, in consequence of the death of the Duke of York, were peculiar. This address, if acquiesced in by the House, would be presented to one who had associated with the lamented Prince in early life, who had lived in constant habits of affectionate intimacy with him, and who had watched over his dying hours with tenderness and affection, and he (Mr. Peel) was convinced that no consolation was better calculated to assuage the affliction of his Majesty, than the assurances of that House that they were sharers in the general respect of the country for the memory of the Duke of York, and in the general regret for his decease. Those feelings of regret which must have existed under any circumstances were not a little increased by the retrospect of the past services of his late Royal Highness. On a domestic score they must also be great: the benevolence and kindness which characterized the late Duke would have graced the life of a person in any situation, but they threw a peculiar lustre on that of a Prince. He (Mr. Peel) did not stand there to pronounce a studied eulogium upon the Duke of York. It had been well observed by an Honourable Gentleman opposite, upon a somewhat similar occasion, that laboured panegyrics on the dead were better suited to despotic countries than to those which enjoyed the freedom of discussion; and nothing could be more unlike the manly character of the Duke of York, than to ascribe to him qualities which he did not possess. The truth, however, he trusted that he should be permitted to express; and he was convinced that he did not transgress the truth, when he said, that as Commander-in-Chief, his late Royal Highness had improved the discipline and considerably raised the moral character of the army. He did not transgress the truth, when he said that the Duke of York possessed qualities which eminently fitted him for the discharge of his high duty, and that he had lost no opportunity of turning them to advantage in the discharge of that duty. He had been a soldier for 46 years, and with the exception of a very short interval, he had held the post of Commander-in-Chief for a space of 32 years. He (Mr. Peel) very well knew that no man was capable of appreciating what the Duke of York had effected in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief, except that man had made himself acquainted with the state, the discipline, and the constitution of the army, when the Duke entered upon his office, and was likewise acquainted with its state, when he, through death, relinquished his command. He could never forget the last words which he (Mr. Peel) had from the Royal Prince only nine days before his death. When he (the Duke) received the news of a part of our troops having landed at Lisbon, he exclaimed in a faint, but triumphant voice, " I wish that the country could compare the state of the brigade which has landed at Lisbon in 1827, with the state of the brigade which landed at Ostend in 1794." These were the last words which he (Mr. Peel) heard from the living lips of the Duke of York. As he had before observed, the Duke had been for many years a soldier, and he must not forget to add, that when he came to office, he declared that no man should for the future labour under the disadvantages which he had to contend with. Professional men, he would again say, were alone able to understand all the benefits which the Duke had conferred upon the army. If they were enumerated, it would be necessary to go through many details of various regulations connected with religious duties, with military schools, with points of discipline, and with the security of fair hopes of promotion to every man in the service. But it was unnecessary to enter into such details. It was sufficient to recollect, that upon the Duke of York's assuming the office of Commander-in-Chief, every man knew that justice would be done him, and it was by this, and not by the minute regulations of discipline, that the English army had obtained that plastic energy which distinguished the free soldier from another. During the long period, during the 10,000 days in which the Duke of York had been in office, he (Mr. Peel) did not think that one of those days had passed without his devoting some portion of it to the business of his official situation. No letter ever came to the office which, if it had a signature, was not read and attended to. Individuals might frequently have mistaken the proper quarter to which their applications should be addressed, but even in these cases a civil answer was always returned, accompanied by a direction to the applicant respecting the department to which he ought to apply. In the case of no signature being attached to letters, the Duke nevertheless made inquiries as to the truth of their contents, and endeavoured to ascertain the names of the authors of them. Whenever the subject of promotions in the army had been brought before that House, justice had always been done to the strict impartiality of the Duke of York, and there had been every disposition on the part of the Hon. Gentlemen opposite to allow this. It was beyond all doubt that the strictest impartiality had invariably characterized the conduct of the late Commander in-Chief; and he (Mr. Peel) could not give a better proof of this than by reading a statement which he held in his hand. On the augmentation of the army in 1825, the only Lieutenants who were promoted were senior Lieutenants: no interest was allowed to interfere in this, and the only exception to the rule which the Duke here laid down, was one which reflected any thing but dishonour. It was in the case of a Lieutenant of the year 1814, who was promoted on account of his conduct at the battle of Waterloo, where the command of his regiment devolved upon him, all the other officers of the regiment having been disabled or slain. In the year 1825, twenty-two Captains were promoted to the rank of Majors without purchase. The power of conferring promotion, without purchase, was certainly a means of conferring favour; but the average service of these twenty-two Captains, who had thus obtained Majorities without purchase, was twenty-six years. Sixteen Majors were also raised to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonels, and the average service of these was fifteen years. During the whole of the time in which the Duke of York was in office, there had never been an instance of an officer being raised by purchase over the head of another, without the offer being previously made to that officer, or unless he had for some reason forfeited his claims to promotion. Three-fourths of the commissions which had been given away in the year 1825 without purchase, were conferred upon the sons or relatives of old officers. The Duke of York possessed extraordinary advantages from having been in the army for forty-six years, and having filled the office of Commander-in-Chief for thirty-six years; and he (Mr. Peel) must be allowed to add, that it was no slight encouragement to a soldier to know that an experienced eye observed him, and he knew of no greater advantage in a Commander-in-Chief than that he knew who had seen service. He thought that the House would feel no difficulty in representing to his Majesty their satisfaction for the military services of the Duke of York, which they had more than once acknowledged. He did not know if it were necessary to say any thing more upon the Address, but he thought that no man could read the history of the monarchy of this country without observing the influence of Royalty upon morals, and he thought that it would be difficult to find an instance of a more ready disposition to charity, and the promotion of the object of charitable institutions, than that of the Duke of York, as well as of every other branch of the Royal Family; and here he thought that they might all find an example worthy of imitation. Every Hon. Gentleman knew, when he had been occupied all day in business, how unpleasant it was to attend public meetings of the nature to which he had alluded; but wherever there was any good purpose to be effected, the Duke of York had never been known to refuse the application of any one to contribute by his presence to forward it. He would here close the few observations which he had thought it necessary to make. He trusted that he had strictly adhered to his intention of confining himself to truth, and of abstaining from all exaggeration. He had studiously abstained from any point that could possibly excite angry feelings—from every topic that could induce reluctance to an acquiescence. He was confident that every Hon. Gentleman, whatever might be his political sentiments, would be anxious to join in this Address, which merely expressed deep sorrow for the death of an illustrious Prince, who had executed a high office, and fulfilled an important trust with impartiality and with great talents—who had raised the condition and the character of the army, and whose name would be associated with that of the army for ever. He was convinced that every man would sympathize with his Majesty for the loss of a Prince, who could console himself on his death-bed with the reflection, that he had never abandoned a friend, and never resented an injury. The Right Hon. Gentleman then moved the Address, amidst loud cheers from both sides of the House.

Mr. BROUGHAM rose, and, in a voice scarcely audible, seconded the motion. He agreed entirely with the opinion which the Right Hon. Gentleman had expressed upon the sentiment which had been uttered by an Hon. Member on that side of the House on a former occasion—namely, that laboured panegyrics on the dead were better suited to despotic countries than to those which enjoyed the freedom of discussion. He considered it as no small praise to the Duke of York, that having for so long a time held the office of Commander-in-Chief, he had never allowed his political principles—by which he (Mr. Brougham) meant party principles—to interfere in the discharge of the duties of his office. The best testimony of the sincerity and honesty with which the late Duke entertained those strong political sentiments which he was known to hold upon some subjects, was, that he entertained them free from all asperity towards the persons who differed from him.

Sir R. WILSON said, that the Right Hon. Gentleman had omitted to observe, that the improvement which the Duke of York had effected in the discipline of the army was maintained without any exaggerated severity. When his Royal Highness came into office, corporeal punishment, which had been carried to so great an extent that it was become a matter of opprobrium in the eyes of foreigners, was considerably reduced by him, and he (Sir R. Wilson) called upon the House to complete that which the late Commander-in-Chief had begun. The kindness, the benevolence, and the impartiality of the Duke of York were well known; and although parties, upon whose cases he judged, might sometimes think his decisions harsh, yet in no case had any one impeached the motives upon which he had determined.

An Hon. Member under the gallery (whose name we could not learn) also bore testimony to the benevolence of the Duke of York, and to his conduct as Commander-in-Chief.

The Address was then agreed to, and ordered to be presented by such Members of the House as are of the Privy Council.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

Sir GEORGE CLERK moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee, to consider of the supply to be granted to his Majesty for the Navy for the present year. The estimates differ little from those of the preceding session. The following is an abstract:—The wages of 30,000 men, at 2l. 9s. per man per month, 955,5001., and their victuals, at 1l. 12s., 624,0001., make, for 13 lunar months, 1,579,5001. The civil salaries paid to various ranks and classes amount to 1,092,5001.; the half-pay, superannuations, hospitals, &c. 1,546,0001.; the victuals for the 30,000 seamen and marines fall short this year of the last year's estimate by 58,0001., or about nine and a half per cent. The breakwater at Plymouth, 50,000 per annum; and the works at Sheerness, the sum of 589,1011. towards their final completion; the demands of the Admiralty for that purpose last year were 150,0001., and now 100,0001. Altogether the estimate for 1827 is 6,125,8501. 7s.

After some objections by Mr. Hume and others, the grant was agreed to.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.

Mr. Herries brought up the Report of the Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates.

Sir JOHN NEWPORT said he would take that occasion to bear his testimony against the abominable oppression of impressing seamen for the navy, which he was convinced was not a source of strength but of weakness, and had driven many of our best seamen out of the navy, as might be seen by the manner in which the American vessels were manned and fought during the late contest. He was confident that there existed a power in this country of supplying our navy with seamen without having recourse to such a violation of the subjects' rights.

Mr. WARBURTON said the practice was so odious in the sight of all classes of the people, that he was confident, if it were necessary, they would submit to additional taxation to deliver the country from so great a reproach.

Sir GEORGE CLERK said it was only in cases of great necessity that press warrants were ever issued. The navy service was so popular that an ample supply of seamen was obtained in time of peace at much less wages than was given by the merchants; and, even during the war, the greater number of seamen were volunteers; but there were cases of emergency, when impressment was absolutely necessary for the defence of the country.

Mr. LOWE said the American service was so much preferred to the British, that Government had removed their packets from New York, in consequence of the great desertions that took place.

Sir GEORGE CLERK said the cause of desertion was not a preference of the American service, but the high wages given for loading and unloading vessels in the port of New York.

Mr. HUME said he had conversed with numbers of seamen on the cause of their dislike to the service of the royal navy, and they all said it was not wages, and their living was much better than in the merchants' service; but the powerful and only cause of their dislike was the severity of the discipline—the degrading punishment to which they were subject at the will of an individual. At present the seamen in the navy were prisoners, and were constantly guarded by marines to prevent their desertion. The tyrannical conduct of officers on board ship deterred the seamen from entering the service; for a naval officer on shipboard, and on shore, was as different as creatures of a different species.

Sir BYHAM MARTIN denied that the naval service was unpopular. As a proof, the last 80-gun ship that was put in commission, the Asia, had 370 volunteers on board in three weeks.

Sir CHARLES FORBES said, that so great was the preference of the royal navy service, that the East India Company were obliged to apply to the Admiralty to prevent volunteers being taken from the Company's ships in the East Indies. He knew there had been cruel punishments practised on board men of war, but he believed the practice was nearly discontinued, and that more punishments now took place in the merchants' service.—There was no instance of an Indiaman making her voyage without some punishments taking place, not unfrequently some dozens.—The man of war service was now generally preferred. He would prefer, in case of necessity, to give double, or even treble bounties, to induce seamen to enter the navy, rather than have recourse to the oppression of impressment. If seamen were to be had, money would obtain them, and if they were not to be had, of course impressment could not be useful.

Mr. Alderman WOOD said he had, in early life, often witnessed the misery and degradation of impressment, and was confident there could not be one man in the country who would not wish to get rid of it. By an Act of Parliament passed some time ago, in case of war, a certain number of watermen were to be taken from the river Thames for the service of the navy. Why should not that regulation be extended to other descriptions of men fit for the navy, and in that way the greatest evils of impressment avoided.

Sir EDWARD OWEN said it was necessary to have punishments on shipboard as well as on shore; but every man who walked the streets was not subject to punishment, neither was every man who entered on shipboard, and every charge was inquired into before punishment was inflicted. He was afraid that no extent of bounty could entirely remove the necessity for impressment in cases of emergency. He did not believe the fact of desertion from the British navy to the American navy. He had, in his own case, known impressed men become volunteers; when they had been brought on board, they had said to him, " Now you have us, we'll enter voluntarily."—(A great laugh.)

The Report was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 14.

Mr. HUME moved for all the papers referred to in the papers already laid before the House regarding Colonel Arthur and Colonel Bradley; the case could then be urged on documentary evidence. He moved only for papers referred to in other papers—to the evidence complete, the Duke of Manchester's proclamation, &c. By these it would appear, whether the authority exercised had been possessed. He moved for 14 different documents.

Mr. WARBURTON seconded the motion.

Lord PALMERSTON (who had just entered the House) said that some of the papers were not in existence. He had before observed that Major Bradley had questioned the authority of Colonel Arthur; and that the King had been advised to dismiss Major Bradley, from Mr. B.'s own representations as well as from Col. Arthur. Major Bradley had appealed to the law, and the Court was satisfied that the arrest was illegal, but that the duration of the arrest was excessive, which was the ground of damages. He followed his former statements with producing the documents to show that Colonel Arthur had the authority which he exercised. He produced also documents to show that Colonel Arthur was aware of the existence of such power. He thought, from looking over the list of documents, that the Hon. Member had a confusion in his mind.

Mr. HUME said he wished for the documents to remove that jumble which the Noble Lord seemed to think still existed in his mind. The question did not concern Major Bradley only, it affected the whole army, therefore he deemed it important. He only desired that justice should be done to Major Bradley.

Mr. Secretary PEEL said that some end ought to be put to this case—they had not time to pursue it day after day—and he thought that the justice of the case had been satisfied. The question was, whether the commission existed or not giving Colonel Arthur command? It was before hinted that it was fabricated; it had been produced. Then what could the House do more? Had not the justice of the case been satisfied? General Fuller's commission to Col. Arthur did give that power—that was the opinion on the commission also of the Judges of the King's Bench. They also held that the disbanding of Col. Arthur's regiment made no difference in the qualification of Colonel Arthur to hold the commission. Then he trusted that the House would agree with him, that it was unnecessary to have further papers produced.—(Hear.)

Mr. BERNAL said, the Judges ought manfully to have stated whether by statutes or otherwise the Crown had the power to delegate to Commandants power to grant commissions. The question had been "blinked" by the Judges, and he thought the Right Hon. Gentleman ought to have such question set at rest. He thought the case appeared to have borne most oppressively, most hardly on Major Bradly: and though they had not time to investigate such cases, if one of hardship were made out, he thought they ought to consider it, and to recommend that some redress be afforded.

Sir H. VIVIAN said, in what a strange state would the Colonies be, if, on deaths, or otherwise, there was no local power to grant commissions and fill up vacancies. Colonel Fuller had been duly appointed; half-pay officers could hold military rank; it was frequently done; at this time, a half-pay officer was the Town Captain at the Tower of London, and exercised military rank. He did not desire to say any thing harsh towards an old but unfortunate officer like Colonel Bradley, but he thought the exercise of the power by the Commander-in-Chief towards Major Bradley was most proper. The conduct of Colonel Bradley was of most dangerous tendency.

Motion for first paper negatived—as were the motions for the other papers.

Mr. HUME having remarked that there were two Commissioners,

Lord PALMERSTON said there was but one.

Mr. HUME wished to look at the documents, he did not think it safe to rely on the word.

Lord PALMERSTON asked whether it was intended to say he had uttered what was not correct.

Mr. HUME said, after the Noble Lord's conduct towards him, he did not consider him entitled to any courtesy.

The SPEAKER said, courtesy was due to the House, but he had understood the Hon. Member to imply that documentary evidence was the safer course.

Mr. HUME replied that he had always desired to avoid giving personal offence, and had not intended to do so now; his intention was to intimate that documents were most to be relied on. This explanation he readily made to the House.

The conversation here dropped.

Mr. SHADWELL moved for leave to bring in a Bill regarding the Writ of Right. As the law stood, titles to property were required to be made out for 60 years, which frequently worked great injustice; and half the property of the country was in such a state that titles in fee could not be made out without the assistance of a Court of Equity. In the Cholmondely case, the House of Lords decided that applications regarding disputed property could be made within 20 years; his bill would fix the time to 20 years without any restrictions. Secondly, it would prevent persons who had no right whatever instituting vexatious suits, and fixing costs of defence on those who defended the property possessed. The costs of such injurious suits to be on the persons instituting them. A like Bill had been brought in by Lord Kenyon in 1788; but it then failed; however, there was now a spirit of improvement, and therefore it did not follow that it would fail now. He concluded with moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law regarding the Writ of Right, Claim of Power, &c.

Mr LOCKHART thought the Bill would be most useful.—There were many other grievances that required remedy. He hoped this Bill was only the beginning of measures to provide a remedy.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY trusted that the Bill would go further and strike at the root of the evil. He should move for a Committee to enquire into the laws regarding property.

Mr. HUME said there ought to be included in the Bill a bar to claims for tithes after a certain time. An enlightened and comprehensive remedy was required. This Bill was mere patchwork.

Mr. SHADWELL said he desired to remove certain and known evils; deeming it better than to wait for (what was almost hopeless) a complete remedy.

Motion agreed to.

Lord PALMERSTON presented Returns of Officers dismissed without trials by Courts Martial.

THURSDAY, Feb. 15.

THE DUKE OF CLARENCE.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer appeared at the Bar with a message from the King, which was read by the Speaker. It recommended to the Commons, to make further provision for support and maintenance of the Duke and Duches of Clarence, suitable to their situation, and such as circumstances may require.

On motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was ordered that the Message be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Mr. W. HORTON rose to move for the revival of the Committee on Emigration. He did so as its former Chairman, and not as connected with the Government, or as holding out any hope that the Government would hereafter propose any definite measures on the subject. In 1823 it was deemed advisable to make trial of an experiment, by affording facilities for the transfer of persons from the South of Ireland to the colonies in North America. In 1826 a Committee was named. The evidence adduced before that Committee in particular. had been much misunderstood and much misrepresented; but it afforded much most valuable information, especially regarding the state of Ireland. There were immense numbers of the Irish population wholly unemployed, wandering about, and depending on charity or plunder for their living. Under Mr. Robinson, 120 families had been taken thence, and located or planted in Upper Canada; and they were happy, having property in 1826 worth 7,000l., and which, in seven years, would be worth 30,000l. Further, they were satisfied with their locations. The minutest particulars on these heads would be laid before the Committee about to be appointed. They were so satisfied that they had addressed the Governor, stating, that should an enemy approach the soil, they would lend him all possible aid to reject such enemy; and, if they had no other persons, they would mow down their opponents with their native shellelahs! That was a genuine address, and gave utterance to feelings that deserved encouragement. They were not only happy, but were most usefully employed. All the evidence, especially from the Colonists, spoke of the value to be derived from such emigrants; and it was considered that they might return in money, or money's worth, the expense of sending them out. The Committee truly thought that the wants of the Colonies might afford useful occupation to the superfluities of the mother country. It was a mistake to suppose that transferring the emigrants, and landing them, would be sufficient; the emigration of 1823 or 1825, proceeded on different principles—that of planting the emigrants, not leaving them to chance. It was better to place them in such a situation that they might soon want labourers. By such conduct they were identified with the soil. In their own country they were in hopeless poverty: in the Colonies they saw their means and wealth increase. He had no doubt that a great part of the transport expenses of locating the emigrants, might be repaid by instalments for the land allotted to them. The more details that were afforded, the more would the House be acquainted with the subject, and be satisfied with the value of emigration. The advantage of emigration, under peculiar circumstances, had been admitted, and only resisted from an idea of the immense and incalculable expense of sending out a number of emigrants adequate to afford relief to Ireland. In Ireland labourers could not get work, or if they could, the pay was insufficient; poverty, like a destructive mildew, spreading over the whole country. But he thought it would transpire that parishes in Ireland would contribute to the expense, and the emigrants be answerable for the remainder; so that he expected the ground of expense might be answerable. To show to what a state the labourers had come in particular places, he would astonish the House by mentioning the case of Shipley, Sussex (communicated by a Member, Mr. Curteis, we believe). The rental was 2550l.; the poor rates were 2300l.; there were 67 cottagers without work; there were 147 persons unable to procure hard work, and 70 in the poor-house. There were 273 labourers, and the occupiers were obliged to employ them, after certain rates, in turn; but three out of every nine were useless. Thus was expended 33 per cent. or 1300l. more than was necessary—413l. was the total expense of the labouring poor. The poor must be kept belonging to the parish; now they were ready, if the law would allow them, to supply 50l. for each family to emigrate. A saving of 75 per cent. on the poor rates would be effected. Why object to it, for the labourers were useless here? by their removal, that of able-bodied persons, their comforts would be promoted, and the rates materially relieved. He repeated, that the emigrants were satisfied, for how could they be otherwise, when their situation in Ireland and in North America was contrasted? Why was not the system to be pursued, if it could be shown that it was a legitimate outlay of capital? There was an illimitable extent of land to be cultivated, and the expense would not wholly fall on the country. The necessity of the system was obvious, but he believed measures might also be necessary to prevent a recurrence of the evil. But how could capital be expected to flow into a country like Ireland, where the poor was in such a condition as was proved by the report of the last emigration Committee, Petitions had been presented from Glasgow complaining of the distress there. The subject would be investigated before the Committee, when it would be ascertained how far emigration could be applied to a manufacturing population. The opinion against such emigration ought not to be too hastily adopted, for portions of manufacturing population sent from Scotland some years ago, were now amongst the most flourishing of agriculturists of Upper Canada, &c. However tedious these details might be, the subject was of the greatest consequence to the prosperity of the country. The advanced civilization of the country, in some degree, accounted for the difficulty; but to satisfy adequate remedies, it was important correctly to trace the causes. To give an idea of the changes that had taken place, he instanced Blackburn, where, in 1814, they had 9s. 6d. a piece for weaving, now the price was 1s. 9d. each piece—ruinous changes to the poor that had resulted from improved machinery, &c. To lead them to destroy machines, would only mislead and indulge the gratification of foollsh passion; was it not better to make the causes of such changes known, and that the effects were inevitable. In Manchester, where there was a population of 20,000, there were between 3,000 and 4,000 families wholly out of employ: then, was it not worth while to see whether there was not any chance of change for the better to them; if not, what remedies ought to be applied? Machinery was an advantage to any country, especially to a country like this; and much valuable machinery for manufactures and agriculture was now in abeyance in consequence of the state of the country. He considered that the colonization was feasible, and at 20l. a head, with the prospect of it being chiefly returned, or paid by the parishes; and that such colonization would be most advantageous to this country, especially to agricultural, perhaps to manufacturing, districts. He thought there was no remedy but that of grappling with the subject, that the inquiries might be usefully pursued, and that colonization would afford a remedy to the country. He concluded with moving, the revival of the Committee on Emigration.

Mr. GRATTAN said that the re-appointment of this Committee was calculated to lead the country astray, especially to practise a delusion on his country (Ireland). This was a particular hobby of the Hon. Gentleman, and he thought there had been sufficient experiment already. The expense would be 20l. a head; could that be borne? Let them begin to attempt to make the people comfortable first. (Hear.) He wanted to see some law which would compel Irish landlords to employ their peasantry; there was work enough, if the landlords were only compelled to give it. If there were to be an Irish rate, let it be to employ the Irish in their bogs, rivers, &c. not to send them out and make them comfortable abroad. If Irishmen were sent to the colonies, they might in time become our most dangerous enemies; besides, one witness said, that eight out of every ten emigrants sent out went over to the States. He hoped the delusion would not be continued. He concluded with moving an amendment, declaratory that the distress in this country and Ireland required a more prompt remedy that what was now proposed.

Mr. LOMBE seconded the amendment. The scheme now talked of would do no good for Ireland. No; they must grant Catholic emancipation. The civil and religious differences were the sources of Ireland's evils. He hoped Ireland would obtain her civil rights and religious freedom.

Col. TORRENS said the objections that had been urged had only strengthened his opinions as to the benefit calculated to be produced by emigration, to England, as well as Ireland. There was a redundancy of population in Ireland; the Irish paupers were knocked backwards and forwards between the two countries, like so many miserable shuttlecocks; but this system would afford the remedy. There were redundant capital and population in England and Ireland, and in the Canadas there were redundant lands; here was the remedy for the evil, and to check the destructive progress of the poor rates, which threatened to swallow the rental, aristocracy, gentry, and all. He thought the expense of a million emigrating could be well borne to occupy 20 millions of acres.

Mr. BRIGHT said, the question was one of a practical nature to be decided by facts. It appeared by the evidence taken before the Committee, that the emigrations in 1823 and 1825 were any thing but prosperous. Was there not sufficient time to bring home correct information of the state of the emigrants who went out in 1823? but instead of information that could be depended on, Mr. Robinson, who conducted the emigration, could only write home respecting them, that they were in as good a state as could be expected. But though he thought the emigration contemplated was a hopeless scheme, he still thought that a better plan of emigration could be devised, and that it was a national question of the greatest moment; and that a large sum of money from the public purse would be well expended in giving facility to emigration, which might be done by laying out roads, and encouraging those who could to emigrate on their own account. The propositions made for bearing the expence by parishes were fanatical. It involved in it the destruction of the cottages of the poor. For if the cottages were to remain, there would the poor harbour, and there would the children be born; and if there was any man in that House who would legislate to deprive the poor of their cottages, he was not the man. It had been said in that House, that Ireland was benefitted by the want of poor-laws he never thought so; but by the present report it was intended to introduce a new species of poor laws into that country; it was expected that the Irish landlords would burthen their estates with a poor-rate for the purpose of transporting the people, an opinion which he was certain would be disappointed. He was surprised that no enquiries had been made by the Committee respecting sending emigrants to the West Indies, where he was certain a white population could be established with success. He would recommend to the Government to give assistance to the Institution in Quebec, that encouraged emigrants by putting them into the best way of getting employment, and in this way they could confer a benefit on the poor of Ireland and of Scotland.

Mr. BARING said, the subject was one of immense importance to both Ireland and England. He had seen the settlers in all parts of the United States and Upper Canada, and a more healthy or happy peasantry he never saw.—(Hear.) The fertility of the new soil in those countries could scarcely be conceived by the farmers of this country. The life of a settler while clearing his land of wood was a life of labour, but after that was effected, it was one of great comfort; and to whatever extent emigration to Canada was promoted good would be done. He should support the motion for a Committee.

Mr. PEEL said, he thought a plan of emigration, would be of great benefit to this country, as in a state of the greatest manufacturing prosperity, there must be particular districts in which there would be numbers, for whose labour there would be no demand. Such must be the result of the improvements of mechanical skill, which ultimately conferred the greatest benefit on the country. Such had been the effect of the power loom, and would it not be desirable, if the want of employment caused by that great invention could be relieved by emigration.

Amendment negatived, and Committee appointed.

Mr. HUME having moved for some Naval returns, &c.,

The House adjourned at twelve o'clock.

FRIDAY, Feb. 16.

Admiral SOUTHERON presented the Report of the Leominster Election Committee, which stated that Mr. Bish was not duly returned—that Mr. R. Stephenson was duly returned, and that the double return of Messrs. Bish and Stephenson was not frivolous. The Clerk of the Crown was ordered to attend on Monday next to amend the return by striking out the name of Mr. Bish.

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS OF CLARENCE.

The House having resolved into a Committee on the King's Message,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the proximity of the different branches of the Royal Family to the Throne was an ingredient in considering their incomes. The Duke of York had his additional before he was so near the Throne by the death of the Princess Charlotte. The late Duke had 26,000l. and 7,000l. Irish, making 33,000l. The Duchess, while living, had 4,000l. separate income. The Duke of Clarence now had 26,500l., which amounts were provided by different Acts of Parliament at various periods. On the Duke of Clarence's marriage, it was proposed to give him an additional 10,000l., but the House reduced it to 1,000l. which sum the Duke declined, but the grant was renewed on the least arrangements respecting the Royal Family—that making the 26,500l. By the death of the Duke of York he had 3000l. by benefit of survivorship; that made the sum to which the Duke was now entitled 29,500l. The Duchess had no separate allowance; he proposed for the Duke 30001., making 32,500l.; and for the Duchess of Clarence 6000l. Grants of this kind were not made from personal consideration, but on account of the station of the parties, and the proximity to the throne. He concluded with moving a resolution for the additions to the income.

Lord ALTHORP bore testimony to the exemplary and domestic conduct of the Duke of Clarence; but in the present state of our finances, there being a deficiency of 4,000,000l., he regretted this application.

Mr. HUME also regretted that this application was made. The Duchess, as he had understood, had already 6000l. fixed on her.—These enormous expenses of Royalty were not calculated to make the people in love with Monarchy. Upwards of 1,200,000l. were expended for the Civil List, most of which went to support monarchy and its appendages. And what enormous sums were paid directly to the several branches of the Royal Family! When their table was overwhelmed with petitions complaining of distress, and when there was a deficiency of nearly 5,000,000l. no country in the world would think, at such a time, to make extra demands on the people. He could not believe that the King was made duly acquainted with the distresses of the country. It was the Ministers who had advised these grants, to pay court to the "rising sun," as was the case with the profligate grant to Prince Leopold of Coburg. If they had money to spare, let it be given to the starving people of those countries, for whom our church and parish officers were going about from door to door to collect pence.

Mr. CURWEN admitted that the sums were not large, but, under the circumstances of the country, he wanted no time to persuade him that he ought to oppose the grant.

Mr. MONCK spoke to the like effect, and said he could not support the grant.

Mr. BROUGHAM said, if there had been any new exigency he would have supported this proposition. But what new circumstances had arisen? none, to warrant this application. When millions were deficient, and when there was so much distress, they ought to save every possible amount. He considered this question without any reference to the public or private conduct of the Duke of Clarence; and he had no other feelings than those of pain, that this proposition should have been made.

Mr. Secretary PEEL said, such a question as this, was far from being pleasant to have to propose, but he had thought the sums now proposed could not be deemed unreasonable. He denied that the vote was proposed to pay worship to the "rising sun;" it was from a sense of duty. (Hear.) He believed there would be great extra expense, to maintain the station of heir presumptive; there would be additional demands on the Duke of Clarence's benevolence, from which he could not so well escape, on account of his proximity to the throne.

Mr. ABERCROMBY was against the additional grants; he saw no reason for them. There was nothing so new in the Duke of Clarence's situation as to require him to alter his mode of life; the Royal Duke could not do better than to continue to pursue a quiet and retired course of life. By rejecting the proposition he should be the better courtier than the Ministers; by such course the monarchy would be strengthened.

Mr. HUME had proposed an adjournment, instead of a direct negative, hoping the ministers would withdraw it; that would be a less reproach than a direct negative.

Strangers were then ordered to withdraw. The numbers were:
For the Adjournment, 167 | Against it, 75 | Majority, 92.

The Money Market has experienced some fluctuations this week, but on the whole Stocks have advanced. The Bank of England still continues to have under its consideration the question of lowering its rate of discount on bills, which is now nearly two per cent. above the market price, bankers and private individuals discounting at 3 to 3½. Money is a complete glut in the City, from the difficulty of finding any safe and advantageous channel for its investment, the uncertainty which prevails as to the Budget, and the effect of the forthcoming measures on the Corn Laws.

Yesterday the Market was in a feverish state all day; numerous unfavourable reports were in circulation, among others we regret that the illness of Lord Liverpool was founded in truth.

The attention of the Foreign Market has been particularly directed towards Spanish Bonds, on which a considerable improvement may be quoted. Colombian and Mexican are heavy, with scarcely any thing doing in them. There is not much variation in the remaining Securities.

SIX O'CLOCK YESTERDAY EVENING.

THE EARL OF LIVERPOOL.—It is with the deepest grief we announce that the Earl of Liverpool has been seized with a most alarming illness, which excites the utmost apprehension for his life, and which, at all events, will, it is feared, render him incapable of ever resuming public business.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We would recommend A. B. C. to learn his initials, before he again takes the liberty of submitting his genius to the tribunal it is now before.

JOHN BULL has been received, and we beg to assure him that we perfectly agree with him as to the humbug practised by the absurd puffs which have appeared in the papers, respecting the all-lamented DUKE OF YORK—they insult, instead of exalt, his memory—and none of them has assumed so impudent a front as that of Mr. STEVENSON, which can only be looked upon as an attempt of a quack to puff himself into notice.

Mr. BERKELEY DRUMMOND had much better keep his opinion of us to himself; or, at least, confine it to his PETTICOAT ESTABLISHMENT at Limerick!!

The WOLVERHAMPTON MANAGER will find his letter (which speaks for itself) in its proper department.

JOCOSO NEMO has been received, and he is requested to accept our sincere acknowledgments for a contribution so talented and agreeable. If he has any desire to oblige us—(and we are induced to surmise that he has)—he will favour us with another contribution this ensuing week. If we knew where to send him a line, we could tell him an excellent joke—a gentleman and scholar, like himself, is ever an acceptable correspondent.

DRAMATICUS informs us, that the new opera of Englishmen in India is written by Mr. DIMOND, and not by Mr. WALLACE; and observes "that we ought to have known that before"—we can only say, that, according to all accounts, very few people "know any thing before" of Mr. DIMOND.

THE AGE.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 18.

It was moved in the House of Commons on Friday, by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, that, on his MAJESTY'S Message an additional sum of 9,000l. per annum be granted to their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of CLARENCE, in consequence of the proximity to the throne in which the demise of the Duke of YORK had placed his Royal Highness; and the motion for this grant was carried by a majority of 102.

It is not to be supposed that, under any circumstances, a proposal for the slightest increase to the sums, already voted for the dignity of the Crown, could be made, without exciting all the bilious malevolence of Whiggery; but it was really hardly to be expected, that such a fine handle should be made of so trifling a subject, as was indulged in, on this particular occasion. By the lamented death of the HEIR PRESUMPTIVE, the Civil List is disincumbered of the sum of 37,000l. per annum, out of which it has been properly suggested to Parliament to extend a grant of less THAN ONE-FOURTH, to place the ROYAL DUKE, who is now in this exalted station, in the same light, in point of income, in which his predecessor stood—a suggestion equally essential and considerate, whether as it respects the dignity, the consequence, or the exposure to increased expense which naturally attend such elevation of rank. It is, however, a matter of satisfaction, to witness the comparatively respectful tone in which the opposition to this proposal of Ministers has been conducted, with the exception of the language of Mr. HUME, which, as usual, betrayed the very perfection of low life vulgarity, unmeaning abuse, and most determined ignorance. To us it has ever been a matter of surprise, that some decisive step is not, on all such occasions, adopted by the House, for the protection of its own dignity, and for the carrying on its important duties. Not a single measure is agitated in the Senate without the absurd interference of this Scotch ideot, whose existence seems to depend upon throwing every possible obstacle in the furtherance of public business. If Mr. HUME had any pretensions to the name of scholar, politician, historian, or man of any acquirement—if he possessed courtesy of manner, or pleasantry of address, or, in short, any of those qualifications which command respect, in God's name let him speak, and let him be heard; but when he has not one claim to a solitary particle of one of them, the idea of his speaking at all is laughable. By experience, and a degree of obstinacy that has no connexion with patience, Mr. HUME has brought the thickness of his skull to that perfection of impenetrability, that all the anvils of opposition could not make an incision in it; but it does not follow that the time and study of our first statesmen is to be taken up by the presumptuous interference of a man like this, who has not an ounce of ability to compete with them. It is a source of much regret that we feel ourselves compelled to speak in this unmeasured manner of any person, permitted by circumstances, to occupy a seat in Parliament, but we feel that we could do no otherwise, and do our duty with so determined a blockhead as HUME.

The grant of his Royal Highness the Duke of CLARENCE was carried in a manner highly satisfactory to the country, and in a way which testifies the sense entertained by Parliament of that PRINCE'S character, and of the illustrious situation in which he now stands; and the trifling opposition raised against it, must be laughed to scorn, when it is recollected that, by the mournful event through which this additional grant is asked, the country (even when it is granted) will be 28,000l. in pocket.

One of the most absurd errors imaginable crept into last Sunday's AGE, respecting the Baroness ROEBECK. A memorandum concerning the parties was sent late on Saturday, to be inserted in the body of an article previously written; which one of the clerks had the presumption to alter, for the sake of amusement, at the expense of truth. The BARONESS, instead of being "old enough to be the mother of Lady SUSSEX LENNOX," is (as most people know) two years younger than his LORDSHIP!

We have, of course, said to this fellow, "never more be officer of mine;" and can only plead his inebriation, as an apology to our readers, for the monstrous mistake.

THE PROSECUTION OF MR. SHIEL.

We have always thought the first post of safety was to stand by the Constitution, and the second post of safety was to stand by the Constitution, and the third post of safety was to stand by the Constitution—so has his MAJESTY'S ATTORNEY-GENERAL for Ireland—and we emphatically repeat it, that if ever the first law officer of the CROWN was loudly called upon to exercise the power with which the Constitution has invested him for the protection of its rights and the due execution of its laws, it is in this particular instance—we beg it may be distinctly understood, that the whole tenor and import of our observations on this question may be considered not personally pointed against the individual whose fanatick zeal has exposed him to the painful ordeal of a criminal prosecution. No: it is the measure, and not the man, whose impolicy we arraign: it is the rash and infuriated conduct of the body styling itself the Catholic Association; a kind of imperium in imperio: an intolerant, audacious, impolitic, and brainless set of demagogues, whose object and whose aim is to excite the popular feelings; and, when the torch of discord is flickering in the atmosphere, to hurl destruction on the misguided victims of their impolicy.

We believe Mr. SHIEL in private life to be possessed of every virtue that can adorn a gentleman, and as a man of superior talents we think him highly deserving of praise—but as a politician, we consider him a fool, and the veriest of fools—vain, empty, rash—without reflection, indiscreet—grasping at what he never will obtain, and losing advantages which might otherwise prove more certain.

We warn Mr. SHIEL to beware of the fatal rock upon which so many of his countrymen have been wrecked—the rock of political profligacy and want of individual principle—the total abandonment of every tie by which men are united for a common purpose—the complete violation of every pledge to secure a unity of object and a community of purpose—for all those sacred ties of party have been hitherto broken, and the man who freely offered himself a martyr to the cause in which he had engaged, generally found himself a victim to the delinquency of its betrayers. We therefore, in the language of pure and unsophisticated admonition, tell Mr. SHIEL to take care of the party with which he has identified himself—he cannot forget, neither do we, the melancholy fate that befel the unfortunate FITZPATRICK, the bookseller; he was made the vehicle of libel and calumny upon an illustrious and worthy Chief Governor, now no more, and suffered as a proxy for the delinquency of another, the painful and distressing punishment of two years' imprisonment. His incarceration was followed by his bankruptcy, and ere a few months had followed his emancipation, his aged and persecuted body was committed to the grave, "unwept, unhonoured, and unsung."

We remember the trial of this unfortunate and ill-fated man: we shall never forget the offer made by the then ATTORNEY-GENERAL to forego the prosecution against FITZPATRICK, if he would give up the author of the libel. No: the wretched victim had been made so drunk with the deleterious poison of the Catholic Board of that day; his senses were so completely infuriated by the maddening draught, that he said, "No; I will not give up the name of the author; I will abide all the consequences of this prosecution, because I have been promised by the Catholic Board a general indemnity." Now what was the first act of indemnity he experienced from the Catholic Board?—A refusal to discharge his bill for printing the several publications connected with Catholic affairs, of which he had been the authorised printer. Shall we not introduce the case of the unfortunate but faithful servant of the Irish Roman Catholics, poor EDWARD HAY—this man had discharged the duties of chief secretary to the Irish Catholics for a series of years; and, in order to give eclat to his official station, had dealt more profusely with his finances than otherwise he might have done, till at last his petition for compensation was presented, and, after meeting with protraction almost unexampled, delay had converted that which was originally a right into an unheeded claim, and poor petitioner HAY would have been delighted to change the legitimacy of his demand into an eleemosynary request, provided it were attended with success. Thus, even a mendicant on their generosity, he was suffered to go away naked and hungry, whilst his meritorious services, as their officer, went unrequited.

We could enumerate others whose melancholy fate ought to serve as an example to caution the hirelings of popular approbation not to put any trust or confidence in the Leaders of the Catholic Association—by inheritance they are faithless, in principle delinquents, and in practice criminal to the good order and constitution of the country. Even poor Counsellor BRIC, the very latest of the martyrs, who, according to Mr. O'CONNELL's account, possessed every virtue that render private life estimable—even he, who fell by the hand of an attorney, has not to this hour been honoured with a solitary mark of respect: his vaunting dying declaration—"For God and my country," has not up to this hour awakened the gratitude of his Roman Catholic countrymen, and convinced them of the justice of erecting a common grave-stone to his memory!—How can Mr. SHIEL expect they will purchase an estate for him?

We would implore Mr. SHIEL to look back at the case of the unfortunate EMMETT, it comes nearer to his own time: he was distinguished by genius of the highest class, and would have been one of the brightest stars that ever glittered in the political hemisphere of his native country; nature to him had been most prodigal; fate most disastrous—the glory of his ambition, to use his own language, consisted in an attempt to give freedom to his countrymen—but the ill-fated and fanatic demagogue soon discovered, that the road to freedom is not through the waste which revolution has depopulated, and he expiated his offences by an ignominious and untimely death upon the scaffold—one of the accusations preferred against him was his connection with the imperial power of France: and his determination to render that power auxiliary to the destruction of the government of Ireland—this he considered so foreign to his principles, and so disgraceful to his character as an Irishman, that in language the most eloquent, and with argument the most persuasive, he disclaimed so foul an imputation: he said, if a French force should land upon the shores of his native country, he would meet them at the beach with a sword in one hand and a torch in the other, and dispute every inch of ground till they arrived at the citadel, and if his resistance proved unavailing, his last effort to save his country from the French yoke would be to set fire to her capital.

Mr. SHIEL has said, "in rising to address you upon a subject by which the national sympathy has been in a great degree awakened, I do not intend to express myself with a vindictive virulence in regard to Mr. PLUNKETT. I contemplate this proceeding with more sorrow than resentment." We desire Mr. SHIEL distinctly to understand, that our conduct towards him is actuated by similar motives—we despise vindictive virulence: we look upon the proceeding with more sorrow than exultation: we cannot but deplore the folly of any man who uses the brilliant talents that nature has bestowed on him to disturb the tranquillity and good order of society: we regret that he should consider it necessary to stimulate the friends of Catholic Emancipation by depicting a state of things which must be taken to be little short of revolution: that the Legislature should be tauntingly threatened with such an alternative if they should reject the measure; and that the tranquillity of Ireland was only to be purchased by violating the sacred rights of the British Constitution.

Mr. SHIEL in another part of his speech has said, "I do not presume to blame him (Mr. PLUNKETT) for bringing me before a grand jury of my fellow citizens, and trying another experiment upon their complaisance"—neither do we blame the Right Honourable Gentleman: on the contrary, it is our opinion that his Majesty's Attorney-General of Ireland would have been guilty of the grossest dereliction of public duty if he had permitted the speech in question to pass unprosecuted. We beg it may be distinctly understood, that in saying thus much, we mean not to prejudice Mr. SHIEL in the public eye—we speak generally: we care not who may be the orator: it is the measure, not the man, we here arraign. In another part of his speech, Mr. SHIEL charges the Attorney-General with inconsistency in his politics, and apostacy in his principles. He says, "I can turn his own weapons against himself—I can cut down this Goliah with his own sword."—Now really this is one of the most unfounded charges ever made against an individual; for, if ever there was one man whose political career has been characterised for consistency of principle and fidelity to party, Mr. PLUNKETT is that man. Does Mr. SHIEL forget that Mr. PLUNKETT is now, for the second time, holding an office which he formerly resigned—that he might have retained it from that period up to this hour, had he been inclined to sacrifice his politics to his interest; but, with a tone of dignity, for which he must ever be admired, retired from office with the GRENVILLE Administration?

We would recommend the advocates of the Catholic Association to be a little more consistent in their conduct, when they impute inconsistency to others. We shall only remind them of their ingratitude to the most intrepid and virtuous champion of their rights—the late Mr. GRATTAN. At one time he was their idol—from idolatry they changed to distrust—and when the virtuous and enlightened statesman thought the tranquillity of his country could only be secured through the continuance of a coerciye enactment, he was declared no longer entitled to the confidence of Irish Roman Catholics, because he voted for the measure by which their lives and properties were protected. If we recollect rightly, Mr. O'CONNELL was the person who moved the resolution.

For the present we shall conclude our observations, by presenting our readers with an extract from the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed, in 1798, to examine the evidence touching the then state of Ireland, by which it will appear to what extent Mr. THEOBALD WOLFE TONE had been engaged in fomenting that rebellion:—

"The society, under the name of United Irishmen, it appears, was established in 1791; its founders held forth what they termed Catholic Emancipation and parliamentary reform, as the ostensible objects of their union: but it clearly appeared, from the Letter of Theobald Wolf Tone, accompanying their original constitution, as transmitted to Belfast for their adoption, that, from its commencement, the real purpose of those who were at the head of the institution, was to separate Ireland from Great Britain, and to subvert the established constitution of this kingdom: in corroboration of which, your committee have annexed to this report several of their early publications, particularly a prospectus of the society, which appeared in the beginning of the year 1791; as also the plan of reform they recommended to the people."

"For the first three years their attention was entirely directed to the engaging in their society persons of activity and talents, in every quarter of the kingdom; and in preparing the public mind for their future purposes, by the circulation of the most seditious publications, particularly the works of Mr. Thomas Paine. At this time, however, the leaders were rather cautious of alarming minds not sufficiently ripe for the adoption of their principles, by the too open disclosure of the real objects which they had in view. In 1795, the test of the society underwent a striking revision; the words in the amended test stand, 'a full representation of the people,' omitting the words, 'in the Commons House of Parliament;' the reason for which has been admitted by three members of the executive, examined before your committee, to be the better to reconcile reformers and republicans in a common exertion to overthrow the state."

And now let the voice of every man, who wishes the Constitution to remain in all its present purity and justice, say, whether or not his MAJESTY'S Attorney-General for Ireland was not fully justified in adopting the course he has taken.

When BALL HUGHES was first informed that Sir JOHN COPLEY was to be Master of the Rolls, he observed, "Then I presume Lady COPLEY will be called Lady ROLLS."

TO DANIEL O'CONNELL, ESQ.

SIR,—Having been repeatedly asked the question, and unable to answer it, I shall be obliged to you to inform me, what you do with the CATHOLIC RENT weekly received as the result of your brilliant oratory.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Feb. 17, 1827. THE EDITOR OF THE AGE.

P.S. To prevent the possibility of a mistake, I send you a copy of the paper in which this letter appears.

LIES OF THE DAY.

LOT. I.

We hear ESTERHAZY has been trying the arts of persuasion with the pretty Brighton pastry-cook—she makes a good stand—more than can be said of him.

Report says that Lords ELLENBOROUGH and TULLAMORE are the new Lords in waiting.

It is supposed Lady COPLEY will be better bred, now Sir JOHN is MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

Lord SUSSEX LENNOX has applied to the Duke of RICHMOND for permission to reside at Aubigny—hoping by borrowing his brother's manors, to make up for his own total want of good ones.

Little PARKER, of the Life Guards, hunting lately, swaggered, and like the frog in the fable, tried to look big, at "a snob" and his dolly, who were hunting likewise—the lady fell, PARKER offered his assistance, and got a good horse-whipping by way of thanks.

Found, by VILLIERS STUART, Esq. M.P. for Waterford, the remainder of his speech—vulgo, latter end—and some assurance: and lucky enough for him, for he could never again have met his constituents, if he had forgotten to say ALL they HAD told HIM.

We were happy to see Lord BINGHAM, looking so well, at the Opera, last Tuesday.

We are sorry to announce the speedy departure of W. LOCKE for Portugal—his last attempt was unsuccessful, but he hopes to become one of the body guard to the PRINCESS ROYAL.

The lovers of fox-hunting will learn with regret, that the HONOURABLE GEORGE FORRESTER is prevented by his Parliamentary duties from going to cover of a morning, being engaged on an Election Committee.

The Army Estimates, which are to be submitted to Parliament to-morrow, are full and explanatory of the amount and descriptions of the public force. The cavalry in the United Kingdom and Portugal, exclusive of four regiments in India, consist, 1st, of three household regiments, amounting to 1,305 officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of which 1,032 are rank and file; and of the rank and file 822 are mounted: the expense of this body guard is 92,399l. for 1,095 mounted cavaliers, officers included, and 210 dismounted—about 90l. a-year each. Each of the regiments of Life Guards contain 274 mounted rank and file, the charge of which is 31,117l.; the 1st Dragoon Guards, having 337 privates mounted, costs 22,481l. 2d. The remainder of the cavalry in Europe comprises nineteen regiments of 5,909 mounted men and officers, besides of dismounted privates, 1,005; the total expense of these nineteen regiments is 340,399l. per annum. Of the infantry, besides 20 battalions in India, consisting each of 1,000 rank and file, and paid by the India Company, there are at home, and on garrison, foreign and colonial service, 7 battalions of Foot Guards, containing bayonets, 5,101; 66 battalions of Infantry of the Line; 3 Fusileer battalions; 5 Highland ditto; 7 Light Infantry ditto: 4 Rifle ditto; in the whole, of the Line, 61,420: Infantry, rank and file, exclusive of officers and non-commissioned officers, 66,524. The cost of this body of Infantry is something more than 1,650,000*l.*

THEATRICALS.

Our predictions respecting Miss JARMAN were realised—her performance of Lady Townly having proved that her powers lie much more in the comic, than in the tragic department. We were much pleased with her representation of this character, which only wanted a little easier carriage, so exclusively the property of high life, to have rendered it nearly perfect. Mr. C. KEMBLE is by far the best Lord Townly now on the London Stage—Mr. SERLE the very worst Manly—Mr. C. KEMBLE is the best Lewson that ever perhaps was on the stage—Mr. SERLE we should conclude to be the worst—what can induce Mr KEMBLE to resign a character, he rendered quite as conspicuous, as the Beverley and Mrs. Beverley of his brother and sister—but Mr. YOUNG is, as Mr. MACREADY was, the thorn that prickles "the aspiring blood of Lancaster." Mr. KEMBLE by this time ought to know the vast difference between—making a secondary character-FIRST RATE; and a first rate character—SECONDARY!

Our notice of ELLISTON's exhibitions in Staffordshire, in our last Sunday's imprint, have drawn upon us the displeasure of a Mr. BENNETT, manager of the Wolverhampton Theatre, in that district, whose expostulation, per post, runs thus:—

"SIR,—I shall feel obliged by your rectifying a mistake in your Paper of this week, wherein you state—'We find Elliston has been playing to about 7s. 6d. before the iron and coal miners at Wolverhampton.' As it is void of TRUTH, and highly injurious to my interest, as Manager, not only in Wolverhampton, but throughout my circuit; likewise as regards my treaty with other Stars.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant.
"Theatre, Wolverhampton, "H. BENNETT.
Feb. 14, 1827.

"P. S. The lowest receipt during Mr. Elliston's performance at Wolverhampton was twenty-three pounds odd. He performed at Bilston, which is three miles from Wolverhampton, on the off nights, but cannot say what his receipts were.

"I consider Wolverhampton as good a theatrical town as any out of London, and as well attended."

We certainly admit there is some difference between 7s. 6d. and 23l. odd!" as Mr. BENNETT facetiously terms it, and right happy are we to find that our old friend, the EX-LESSEE, has been so fortunate. As Mr. BENNETT considers Wolverhampton "as good a theatrical town as any out of London, and as well attended," and as HIS EXCELLENCY Mr. ELLISTON proved it by attracting "23l. odd!" we think that provincial theatres must be in a most flourishing condition, and hold out a great inducement to "other Stars." We could recommend Mr. BENNETT a few from London, who are receiving here as much per night, and do not draw as many shillings. To this letter Mr. BENNETT politely puts "post paid," which the post office crosses out, and writes, above, the word "not," by which we presume the receipts (since Mr. ELLISTON's departure) have been "odd," without the 23l.; but we do not begrudge the 10d. for the information derived.

We perceive by the papers the distressing situation in which Mr. YATES has been placed in at Paris—his residence has been beset by every person in that city, to induce him to give his Reminiscences. No—it would not do: the KING sent him a letter, beginning "Dear YATES," but that was "no go!"—then, the Chambers of Peers and Deputies moved an address, which was presented to him "on bended knee," but it moved him "not a jot!"—then, all the municipal authorities exerted their influence—they might as well have tried to poke the fire in Mount Ætna: however, it seems that Lord GRANVILLE was the fortunate man to do for France what France could not do for herself—voilà.

"YATES, the comic actor, could NOT, after all, withstand the pressing solicitations of Lord GRANVILLE, to give his Reminiscences in Paris, on Tuesday evening, to one of the most distinguished audiences, in point of rank, that ever assembled in that gay capital. Nearly all the Ambassadors, several Members of the Chambers of Peers and Deputies, besides most of the respectable English residents, were present, and unequivocally expressed their admiration of the versatility of YATES' comic talents, and the closeness of his imitations. The rapid change of costume and character, peculiar to YATES, excited astonishment amongst his distinguished visitors. The place was crowded to excess."—Daily Papers.

As YATES, of course, did not not go prepared with dresses, the French Government testified the gratitude of the nation, by providing them at the public expence.

Mr. FAWCETT and Sir SNUFFLE SNUFFLE have had a difference of opinion, respecting the former's refusal of a part to Miss CAWSE, pupil of the latter. However, on Sir SNUFFLE's remonstrance, Mr. FAWCETT, who had just been looking over the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE'S remark on the motion for a new trial in SINCLAIR'S case, gruffly exclaimed, "Well, take a rule to shew CAUSE."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

THE FRENCH PRESS.

The following is an outline of the new law relative to the liberty of the press in France, and was presented to the Chamber of Deputies on the 9th instant, by M. Bonnet. The French Papers have been filled with the discussions on this obnoxious measure.

"Art. 1. No writing of 20 sheets, or under, can be sold, published, or distributed in any manner whatever during the five days which shall follow the deposit prescribed by art. 14 of the law of the 21st of October 1814, and by art. 29 of the law of the 26th May, 1819.

"The contravention of this law shall expose the printer to the penalty of being fined in 3,000 francs.

"Art. 2. The provisions of art. 1 do not apply to the speeches of Members of the two Chambers, to the publications prescribed by public authority, to pastoral charges or letters, or consistorial instructions, to memoirs written in the progress of trials and signed by an advocate, to memoirs of literary or philosophical societies established under the authority of the King, to catalogues, prospectuses, or dramatic works, published after the representation of the pieces, to journals and periodical works which appear oftener than twice a month, and which shall be obliged, in consequence, to give security, to writings on projects of laws presented to the Chambers from the time in which such projects are presented, until the final deliberation of the Chambers, to notices or advertisements, the publication of which shall be permitted by the municipal authority, to printed papers relative to private interests, and destined to be exposed to sale.

"Art. 3. Every printer who shall print a greater number of sheets than that announced in the declaration which he makes in execution of article 14 of the law of the 21st of October, 1814, shall be visited with the penalties enacted in article 15 and 16 of the same law. The sheets which shall exceed that number shall be suppressed and destroyed.

"Art. 4. Every removal or transfer of a part of an edition, from the workshop of the printer, and before the expiration of the delay fixed by Article 1, shall be considered as an attempt at publication. Under the denomination of printing-offices are comprehended those of the workmen employed in collecting, folding, and stitching the sheets.

"Art. 5. No publication of five sheets and under, in a form below 18mo. shall be published without the authority of Government, delivered at Paris by the directors of the bookselling-trade, and in the departments by the prefects and sub-prefects.

"Art. 6. The penalties enacted by article 1 and 3 of the present law are independent of those which the authors of the publication shall incur for other crimes or offences committed by the said publication.

"Art. 7. The provisions of the present title are indiscriminately applicable to all printed works, whatever be the mode and process of their impression.

"Art. 8. No journal or periodical work whatever shall be allowed to be published till a declaration has been previously made, stating the name of the proprietors, their abode, the share of each in the enterprise, and the licensed printing-house in which the journal or periodical work is to be printed.

"Art. 9. In case a journal or periodical work shall belong to several co-proprietors, they shall be bound to choose one, two, or three among them, who shall be responsible for its conduct. These proprietors, redacteurs, must unite the following conditions: first, they must have the qualities prescribed by article 980 of the Civil Code; secondly, they must possess among them, at least, a third part of the property, and of the security required, or a half, if it is a periodical work.

"Art. 10. In case of the death of any of these responsible proprietors, redacteurs, the partners shall be bound, within the interval of one month, to find a substitute for them, and another responsible proprietor, who shall fulfil the conditions required by the preceding article. In case of dispute, the matters shall be settled by the competent tribunals; and, notwithstanding the decision of the directors of bookselling, or of the prefect, shall not receive its execution till the judgment of the tribunal of the First Instance, which shall be carried into execution, notwithstanding an appeal. If a prosecution takes place before the tribunals, the proprietors, redacteurs, shall be liable to all the penalties, with the exception of pecuniary condemnations, which shall be borne jointly by the other proprietors.

"Art. 11. The declaration of the journals actually existing shall be made or renewed, in the form prescribed by article 8, within the 30 days that shall follow the promulgation of the present law. The name of the proprietors (redacteurs) shall be printed at the head of every copy, under the penalty of 500 francs to the printer.

"Art. 12. No partnership relative to the property of journals or periodical writings shall be contracted, except in their collective name, and according to the forms established for that kind of partnership by the code of commerce.

"Art. 13. All acts, conventions, or dispositions relative to a journal or periodical writing, made by the author or authors of the declaration, shall be valid, notwithstanding any contre-lettre or contrary stipulation.

"Art. 14. No journal or periodical writing shall appear till the proprietors have furnished the security fixed by the law of the 9th of June, 1819. This security shall be the personal property of the parties interested, whether supplied in money or in funds inscribed in their name. (The Commission proposed the suppression of the articles relative to the increase of the stamp duty, and to modify the scale of fines.)

"Art. 20. Every publication respecting the acts of private life of any Frenchman living, or of any stranger residing in France, may be prosecuted by the public Ministry, and punished with a fine of 500 francs.

"Art. 21. Every offence of defamation committed towards individuals may be prosecuted ex officio on the demand, and by the assent, of the parties.

"Art. 22. Every printer of any work published and condemned shall be responsible civilly for the fines, and damages, and expenses of the condemnation.

"The tribunals, however, shall have the power, according to circumstances, of discharging printers from all responsibility."

GERMAN PAPERS.

Augsburg, Feb. 3.—The following cabinet letter, addressed by his Majesty the King of Prussia to his Serene Highness the Prince of Salm-Salm, is sent to us for insertion:—

"The reasons assigned in the letter which you have sent me, and which have induced you to quit the Roman Catholic for the Protestant Church, are so pure in their source, so firm in their principles, and so laudable in their views, that We have only to congratulate you on the resolution which you have taken with mature deliberation, and carried into effect with conscientious piety. You have hereby given an important counterpoise to many melancholy occurrences of our times; and in the pure scriptural religion which you profess you will find entire consolation for the sufferings and mortifications which you have experienced. Accept the assurances of my especial esteem, with which I remain your Highness's well affected.

"Berlin, Dec. 9, 1826. "FREDERICK WILLIAM.

"To his Highness Prince Constantine of Salm-Salm, at Baden."

Allgemeine Zeitung, Feb. 4.

We understand that the names of the stories which Mr. Hood has added to his National Tales are, "The Venetian Countess" and "A Tale of the Harem." Both promise well. We trust the work will not be long delayed in the publication.

MISCELLANEOUS.

William Gifford, Esq.—The will of this gentleman has just been proved by his sole executor, and steady friend, Dr. Ireland, Dean of Westminster. The probate is taken out under 25,000l. personal property. He gained very little by his Baviad and Mæviad; and for his editions of Ben Jonson and Massinger the booksellers gave him less than 800l. Gifford has left the bulk of his fortune to the Rev. Mr. Cookesley, who is likewise his residuary legatee. He leaves his house in James-street, for the remainder of the term, nearly thirty years, and a legacy, to Mrs. Hoppner, widow of the eminent portrait-painter, and legacies of a few hundreds each to her daughters. He leaves a sum of money, the interest of which is to be distributed annually amongst the poor of Ashburton. He likewise leaves to Exeter College another sum, the foundation of an annual scholarship. Three thousand pounds are left to the relatives of his beloved maid-servant, who was buried in South Audley Chapel, where the poet himself intended to repose, but for the pressing request of his grateful executor, who was anxious that Gifford's remains should be mingled with the great and good in Poet's-corner, Westminster-abbey. He has left to Mr. Heber his edition of Mattaire's Classics, and any other books Mr. Heber may choose to fancy. To Mr. Murray, the bookseller, he leaves 100l as a memorial; likewise 500 guineas, to enable him to reimburse a military gentleman, to whom he appears to have become jointly bound for the advance of that sum for Mr. Cookesley, at a former period. He leaves to his executor, Dr. Ireland, 50 guineas, and any of his books the Dean may select. He requests his executors to destroy all confidential papers, especially those relating to the Review, so that the illustrated Quarterly, mentioned in all the journals, in which the names of the authors, and the prices paid for each article, were inserted, will never see the light. Other legacies to obscure individuals are likewise left. There are various codicils to the will. The whole is in the hand-writing of Mr. Gifford.

The codicil to the will of the Duke of York, although so expressed by his Royal Highness, is not in the Duke's hand writing, but written by one of his executors. The signature by the Duke is very feeble, and barely legible, resembling the signature, to his testamentary paper, of the late Right Hon. William Pitt.

The Duke of Wellington has been prevented from holding a levee, since his appointment to the office of Commander-in-Chief, by indisposition. On Friday week last, his Grace was so much recovered, both in health and strength, that he announced his intention to hold a levee on the following Thursday, which took place at the Commander-in-Chief's office in the Horse Guards, and whs very numerously attended. There were no less than thirty-four General Officers present; the other Officers attending the levee amounted to upwards of sixty. They were introduced to the presence of the Duke, not according to their rank, but agreeably to the numerical order in which their names stood on the list, by his Grace's Aide-de-Camp in waiting. The company were received in undress. The levee was conducted in every respect the same as that of the late lamented Duke of York, except that the Duke of Wellington and his Aide-de-Camp appeared in regimentals, whilst the Duke of York used only to appear in his morning dress.

In a moderate-sized pamphlet which has been handed to us, entitled A Complete View of Joint Stock Companies, there is presented a summary, and the most frightful summary that ever was printed, of the modes, the means, and pretences through which our profit-loving countrymen, whether cheaters or cheatees, contrived to waste, and be wasted out of, some dozen millions of good solid money. It appears, if this account of the matter be true, that the years 1824 and 1825 gave rise to no less than 624 new money-taking projects, requiring towards their completion the reasonable sum of rather more than 372 millions sterling, and this exclusive of many provincial, Scotch, and Irish companies. Upon the above projected capital, there was actually paid, not including premiums, 17,600,000l.; which, at the present price of the several stocks, is worth in the market about 9,000,000l. sterling. Mr. English, the compiler of these statements, has been for a long time familiar with the subject, and has had access to useful sources of information.

A public subscription has been opened for M. Villemain, in Paris. Four thousand pounds were collected directly the subscriptions were opened—a large sum in France, and which would be equivalent to at least three times its amount in this country. One contribution of 100l. was sent by an Englishman from this side the Channel.

In the vicinity of Ulverstone there resides an elderly and eccentric bachelor, who keeps no fewer than seventy cats, which he feeds and attends with great regularity. In this harmonious society, instead of that of a wife and children, his happiness seems to consist; and their delightful caterwauling, which by others would be deemed rather unmusical, is by him esteemed a "concord of sweet sounds."—Carlisle Journal.

Sour milk is esteemed as nectar among the Laplanders, who drink it greedily, by quarts at a time. They speak of it as other nations do of wine, saying that it gladdens and strengthens the heart, refreshes the spirits, and fortifies them for labour.

We have to announce the death of two General Officers on Saturday week—namely, General W. Cartwright, Colonel of the 1st Dragoon Guards; and Lieutenant-General Ramsay, of the Royal Artillery.

On Saturday evening, about half-past five o'clock, the boiler belonging to an engine erected at the United Hills Mines burst with a tremendous explosion. At the time there were two enginemen, one of the captains, and some sump-men near the place, but happily they escaped without serious injury, though the boiler, composed of the thickest plate iron, was rent in pieces; the roof and walls of the boiler-house were blown to an amazing distance, and the boiling water, &c. showered into the valley in a manner that for some secoads exhibited the appearance of a dense cloud, which hid the objects over which it rested, from the eye of those who saw it from a distance. Had the accident happened a few seconds before it took place, there is every reason to believe that between thirty and forty persons would have lost their lives by it; but it being a general settling day, the persons at work in the mine had but just left when the explosion took place. We understaud the damage will be repaired by Sunday next, as the neighbouring mines have generously lent assistance to effect this desirable object, by which upwards of 100 miners will be enabled to resume their labour, which has been suspended by the accident. The cause of the accident has not been ascertained, though every possible inquiry has been made.—West Briton.

Burghley Papers.—From the repeated inquiries made respecting the publication of The Life of Lord Burghley, by the Rev. Dr. Nares, it has been thought requisite, in justice to the author, to apprize the public that the work has not only been continually in progress, but that it would have been much earlier ready for publication, had not the amount of documents to be examined been found to exceed all possible calculation, being besides so widely dispersed as to render a constant or easy access to them extremely difficult, compatibly with the usual residence and professional duties of the learned biographer. The work is, however, now so far advanced as to warrant the expectation of its speedy appearance, as the labours of the press and of the artists, in the necessary embellishments, will proceed uninterruptedly.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.—Feb. 12.

WILLIS V. DUNCOMBE.

This was an action by the plaintiff, a respectable music-seller in St. James's-street, against the defendant, for pirating the popular song of Cherry Ripe. The defendant made no defence, and the Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 200l.

Mr. Brougham having obtained a rule, calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a new trial had, on the ground that the sudden illness of the defendant's attorney had prevented his delivering the briefs which had been prepared for the defence, and that there was a good defence,

Mr. Scarlett showed cause against the rule, and contended that the defendant had not set forth any sufficient grounds to induce the Court to grant a new trial. If the defendant will pay 100l. into Court, and pay the costs, we will accept it.

Mr. Chitty, who was on the same side, said, if the defendant would pay 5l. into Court and the costs, it would be accepted.

Mr. Brougham—No, we cannot do that. The learned Counsel then detailed the facts relative to the defendant having instructed his attorney to defend the action; that the attorney had prepared briefs, and attended to examine the cause list, but by sudden illness, was compelled to return home, and that in consequence thereof, before the briefs could be delivered, the cause was tried. The affidavits also alleged that the supposed piracy consisted of two parts, the one part as old as any song in existence, and that the other part did not bear any resemblance to that part of the song which the plaintiff claimed as his property.

Lord Chief Justice.—On payment of costs, and the defendant's bringing 20l. into Court within one week, to abide the event, you may take a rule for a new trial.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.

SLANDER—HUTTON V. WESTCOTE.

This was an action for slanderous words. The plaintiff, who is a gentleman of some celebrity in the literary world, having published his travels on the Gold Coast, complained against the defendant, who is an officer in the public police-office, Marlborough-street, that he had designated him as a rogue and a swindler in the presence of several persons.

A witness named Stride, who is a box-keeper at Drury-lane Theatre, stated that he was at Arthur's Club-house in St. James's-street, in the latter end of May last, in company with Mr. Taylor, the Member for Wells; and the defendant, when conversing on the subject of the approaching election, said that the plaintiff was a swindler. Hutton, the plaintiff, was an agent for Mr. Edwards, the rival candidate who opposed Mr. Taylor, and the defendant was an agent for Mr. Taylor.

Three other witnesses were called, who stated that in consequence of similar expressions being made use of by the defendant respecting the plaintiff, they declined to execute some orders he had given them.

On cross-examination it was elicited that two of these witnesses were first cousins to the plaintiff, and they afterwards executed the orders he had given them.

Mr. Merewether addressed the Jury for the defendant, and after the case was shortly summed up by the Chief Justice, a verdict was found for the plaintiff.—Damages 1s.

WYNNE V. JACKSON.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, a celebrated hopper (not at the Opera House) to recover a sum of 42l. 10s. alleged to be money lent.

By the evidence of the first and only witness called, it appeared that the defendant represented to Mr. Wynne, on the 17th July, that he had engaged to hop a distance of 63 yards in 19 hops, for a considerable wager, and having put down part of the stakes, he was not enabled to complete his deposit by 30l., and he wished the plaintiff to advance him that sum. The plaintiff accordingly lent him the 30l., having previously lent him 12l. 10s. to complete the stakes in another hopping match, in which he agreed, for a considerable wager, to hop 60 yards in 19 hops, being allowed three trials.

After the case had proceeded thus far, it turned out that the money was lent upon an agreement which was not stamped; and, upon the objection of the Common Sergeant on this point, the plaintiff was nonsuited.

RAGGETT V. SIR PHILIP MUSGRAVE, BART.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who has been duly appointed as the master of the Cocoa Tree Club, in St. James's-street, against the defendant, Sir Philip Musgrave, Bart. to recover from him the sum of ten guineas, being the amount which the Hon. Baronet ought to have paid, as his subscription to the above-named Club for the year 1825.

Mr. Gurney shortly stated the outline of the case, and then called the head waiter at the Cocoa Tree,

John Bush, who stated that Sir Philip Musgrave became a member of that club in 1821. He paid his subscriptions regularly for that and the succeeding years, down to the end of 1824. He continued a member during the year 1825, but had not paid his subscription for that year.

Cross-examined by Mr. Scarlett—Though Sir Philip was a member in 1825, witness did not know that he attended the club in that year. Gentlemen who are members of the club have dinners there, and also wine. It is likewise a card-club; and occasionally there is a good deal of play. Witness was not called on a former occasion, when a similar action was brought against another gentleman.

The rules and regulations of the club were now put in and read, by one of the articles of which it appeared, that no gentleman, who was a subscriber, could withdraw himself from the society without sticking up a notice in the club-room, for a certain length of time, that it was his intention to withdraw. By another article of the rules, the subscriber so giving such notice was bound to pay the subscription for the current year when it was given; and by the evidence it appeared that the defendant had not complied with either of these regulations.

Mr. Scarlett took an objection that the action was not maintainable, inasmuch as it was not proved that the defendant had received a copy of the rules.

The Lord Chief Justice said, that he would either nonsuit the plaintiff, giving his Counsel liberty to move, or direct a verdict against the defendant, giving Mr. Scarlett liberty to move.

Mr. Scarlett preferred going to the Jury. He was suprised to see Mr. Bush, the waiter, in the box, as another waiter had been called on a former occasion, when an action was brought against another member of the club; he was still further surprised that a witness named Bush should be called at all in this case, because that witness stated that the plaintiff supplied the members of the club with wine as well as dinners, and the proverb says, "good wine needs no bush." However, the reason why Sir Philip disputed the payment of the sum in question was, that he had not attended the Cocoa Tree Club in the year 1825, and therefore he doubted (reasonably enough) whether he was obliged to pay his subscription for that year. If his Lordship was of opinion that the defendant ought to pay, he must submit to a verdict; but it was clear that no proof had been given of his receiving a copy of the rules.

The Lord Chief Justice said he was of opinion that any gentleman who was a member of a club ought to be presumed to be acquainted with the rules of that club, and therefore if the Jury concurred with his Lordship, they ought to find for the plaintiff.

The Jury instantly returned a verdict for the plaintiff.—Damages 10l. 10s.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, Westminster, Feb. 12.

PROSSER V. FAIRMAN.

The defendant in this case, the proprietor of the late Palladium newspaper, applied to the Court to be discharged out of custody under the Lord's Act, and was opposed by

Mr. Sergeant Wilde, on the ground that since his confinement the defendant had sold a commission which he held in the army, and had not accounted for the proceeds of that sale in the schedule of his effects. He then proceeded to examine the defendant, who acknowledged that he had received, through the hands of Messrs. Greenwood and Cox, various sums to the amount of about 800l. These sums he had made use of for the purpose of carrying on the Palladium newspaper, in which he had unfortunately embarked. He had hoped that that paper would have been a source of profit to him, but it had turned out the contrary: he had by some extraordinary means been deprived of the copyright, but he intended shortly to bring that transaction before one of their Lordships.

The Lord Chief Justice said, as the commission had been sold, it was necessary it should appear in the schedule.

Mr. Sergeant Wilde then intimated to the defendant that no mention was made in the schedule of any printing-presses, type, &c., which he should suppose would be necessary in carrying on of a newspaper.

The Lord Chief Justice informed the defendant that this had been mentioned in order that he might come prepared next time, and not risk being remanded a second time.

The defendant thanked the Court, and said that he had offered fresh security to the plaintiff, who, however, refused to come to any terms.

The defendant was then remanded.

SIR JACOB ASTLEY V. GARTH.

In this case Mr. Sergeant Taddy showed cause against a rule which had been obtained by the defendant for the postponement of the trial. The defendant himself had made the affidavits on which this application was grounded. The plaintiff had given notice of trial, on the 5th of December last, for the first sittings in Hilary Term, and the defendant made an application for its postponement on the ground of the absence of two witnesses, who, he stated, were very material and necessary. The affidavit went on to state, that on the 24th of January last, the defendant caused inquiry to be made after Martha Shorter, one of the witnesses whom he described as being necessary, so much so, that if her testimony did not obtain the verdict for him (the defendant), it would, at any rate, very materially reduce the amount of damages which might be given against him in case of a contrary result. It stated that application had been made at the houses in which she usually resided while in town, but the reply given by the inmates was, that she had left town, and was gone to a place called Wheatly, in Oxfordshire. Upon receiving this information, the deponent caused diligent inquiry to be made at Wheatley, but the only intelligence that could be obtained of her there was, that she had left that place a few days previous, nor could the deponent obtain any information as to where she was gone, but he had every hope of being able to procure her attendance by the first sittings in next Easter Term. The next person who was stated to be a material witness was James Carrol, Esq., who, while in England, invariably lodged at the Union Hotel, in Cockspur-street, but he was stated generally to reside in Ireland, where he was at present, but was expected to return to the Union Hotel in about six or eight weeks. The learned Sergeant having read this affidavit, contended that it was not sufficient to maintain the application, that it was not made conformably with the rules of the Court, and that it did not contain any of that information which their Lordships, in similar cases, always required.

Mr. Sergeant Vaughan, in support of the rule, said that this affidavit contained more information than affidavits of this kind generally afforded: it stated what was the nature of the evidence which the witnesses described were supposed to be capable of giving. It stated that Martha Shorter was a servant-maid whose evidence would be most important.

The Lord Chief Justice said, that according to the rules and practice of this Court, there appeared to be nothing in this statement that could properly be called an affidavit. For any thing that appeared to the contrary, the defendant might have used every means in his power to keep the witnesses out of the way.

Mr. Sergeant Taddy admitted that the affidavit contained matter that would cast aside any imputation of the defendant having made use of any means to prevent the appearance of the witnesses named in the affidavit; but he submitted that that affidavit was made in too general terms, and was not supported, as it undoubtedly should have been, by the affidavits of those persons who had actually made the inquiries.

The Court were decidedly of opinion that this affidavit was insufficient. They could not act on what the deponent had been informed and believed; they ought to have been furnished with the affidavits of those who had made the inquiries. Their Lordships decided that they would refuse this application, on the ground that the affidavit was insufficient.

Mr. Sergeant Vaughan observed, that by this refusal of his application, the defendant would be compelled to go to the expense of another application, as on the day of trial he should renew the application, by which time he hoped to obtain more satisfactory affidavits.—Rule refused.

TUESDAY, Feb. 13.

MARGARET FRIEND V. THOS. HARRISON, JUN.

Mr. Sergeant Peake and Mr. Hutchinson appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Sergeant Vaughan for the defendant.

This was an action for debt, on a bond, to recover 121. 10s. Harrison had kept the Tavistock Hotel, Covent-garden. A bond had been given by him to the plaintiff, to secure to her an annuity of 50l. After the signature to the bond was proved the defence was entered on. It was that the bond had been given to the plaintiff with a view of supplying an inducement for the continuance of illicit cohabitation with the defendant. In support of this Fred. Taylor and Thos. Hatkins were examined. The latter witness stated that the plaintiff was a common street-walker when the defendant's acquaintance commenced with her, and that for nearly two years before the bond was given, they had cohabited, and continued to do so after the bond was given for about a month, when Margaret Friend went out of town for three months, and then resumed her intercourse with the defendant for a considerable period—nearly a year.

On the cross-examination of this witness nothing material was elicited.

Taylor stated that he keeps a house in Prince's-street, Leicester-square; that the plaintiff lived in his house at the time stated (Feb. 1824), and left it for three months.

The Lord Chief Justice said, this was a case of importance to the public and the parties; for the principles on which it rested ought, as far as possible, to be set free from any uncertainty. If it had been a case where the plaintiff was seduced, and that the bond was given in some degree to repair the injury, in morals and in law there could not exist a stronger claim. A man who deprives a woman of the means of honest support, is bound to do all in his power to save her from a course of prostitution. There was a difference in the case of a common woman: but a man cohabiting with such a female is at liberty, on breaking off the connexion, to make a provision for her future maintenance, and would be responsible on his bond. Cases, however, occurred in which threats on the part of the female, of putting an end to the connexion, so operated on men, under the influence of excessive fondness, as to induce them to give bonds as the condition of future illicit cohabitation. Of the invalidity of such a bond there could be no doubt; but for the Jury to say, what were the circumstances under which the bond was given, it would be necessary to look at the conduct of the parties. If it appeared that they had totally separated immediately after the execution of the bond, they must find for the plaintiff; and though she were induced, at a subsequent period, to renew the cohabitation, still she might recover; but, if it could be inferred from the conduct of the parties that they had consented mutually to continue the cohabitation, the bond would be void. It appeared that the connexion between the defendant and the plaintiff, continued for a month after the execution, was only temporarily interrupted, and then was renewed for nearly a year. The Jury would say whether, under those circumstances, the bond was given in contemplation of future cohabitation, or solely for provision on immediate separation.

The Jury deliberated a short time, and returned a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 12l. 10s.

BERKELEY V. FAIRMAN.

Mr. Sergeant Vaughan stated, that this was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover a sum of 100l., lent to the defendant.

A letter of the defendant's was then put in as evidence, the handwriting being proved. It was addressed to the plaintiff, and appeared, from its post mark, to have been sent in the month of May, 1825. It stated that the writer, from the rank which he held in the army, and from his situation and connexions, would not be induced to solicit a loan under ordinary circumstances; that he was engaged in carrying on a little work of considerable importance, which could not proceed without funds; that his object in establishing the Palladium newspaper, was to acquire the means of resisting with effect the attacks of the mercenary and unprincipled portion of the press. For this purpose he had incurred considerable expense, and was then likely to want a loan of two or three hundred pounds, and, in case he should require it, he requested to know whether Colonel Berkeley could afford him that accommodation, adding, that delay would be death, and begging an immediate answer. It further said, that the want of funds would prove ruinous to the speculation, and that its failure would be a source of the highest exultation to the least respectable portion of the press.

A cheque for 100l., dated in the month of May, 1825, drawn by Colonel Berkeley on his banker, was shewn to have been in the hands of Colonel Fairman, by means of the numbers of the notes in which it was paid.

The Counsel for the defendant objected to this evidence, and the Court took a note of the objection.

It was alleged on behalf of the defendant, that the 100l. in question was given, not as a loan, but for the purpose of carrying on the paper.

The Lord Chief Justice observed, that that was not the language of the letter.

Verdict for the plaintiff—£100.

OLD BAILEY, Feb. 15.

OLD COURT.

This morning these Sessions commenced before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, the Recorder, the Common Sergeant, Mr. Sergeant Arabin, &c. &c.

STATE OF HIS MAJESTY'S GAOL OF NEWGATE, FEB. 13.

Prisoners under sentence of death, 45; transportation for life, 31; for fourteen years, 33; for seven years, 105; under sentence for various periods for felony and misdemeanors, 3; for trial at the ensuing Sessions, 248; committed under the Bankrupt Laws, 4; whose judgments are respited, 4; remanded from last Sessions, 2; for trial at the Admiralty Sessions, 1.—Total, 376. Of the above number there are 317 males and 159 females.

CONSCIENTIOUS JURYMAN.

One of the Jurymen summoned to serve on the Middlesex Jury made an application to the Court, seeking to be excused the duty.

"My Lord," said the applicant, "I beg to be excused serving on the Jury."

Mr. Sergeant Arabin.—Upon what ground, Sir?

Applicant.—Because I could not conscientiously return a verdict, the tendency of which would be to inflict the penalty of death.

Court.—What are your reasons, Sir, have you any to state?

Applicant.—My reasons are, my Lord, I think that the penalty of death ought to be abolished.

Mr. Sergeant Arabin—The laws of your country say otherwise—you are a very extraordinary man, but I cannot ask you any further questions now. Gentlemen (said the Learned Judge, addressing the Jurors already impanelled), perhaps it would not be well to have such a conscientious man among you.

The Applicant was then ordered to stand down for the present.

Another gentleman having similar scruples, made the same application, and he was ordered to stand by for the present.

When the panel was gone through, Mr. Sergeant Arabin, alluding to the circumstance, said, "There were two gentlemen who addressed the Court just now upon a subject upon which the Court could not enter into a discussion. They have not made a sufficient excuse, but we shall endeavour to dispense with their serving on the Jury, if we can do without them, but they must attend the Court, and the officer will inform them at what time and where they are so to give their attendance.

At ten o'clock, Mr. Justice Littledale, and Mr. Justice Gaselee, took their seats on the Bench.

SILK TRADE.

COPY OF A NOTE RECEIVED FROM MR. HUSKISSON.

"Board of Trade, Whitehall, Jan. 10.

"Mr. Huskisson presents his compliments to Mr. Alderman Waithman, and in reference to the memorial of Messrs. Gillman and Co., transmitted in his note of the 13th ult. has the pleasure to acquaint him, that directions have been given to discontinue the charge for licence duty, to persons solely employed in printing, painting, staining, or dying silk goods; but that it is deemed necessary that the premises of such printers should be entered, and be subject to the inspection and survey of the officers of excise, to prevent any fraud upon the revenue, or upon the manufacturer of cotton goods, or of silk goods mixed with cotton."

THE ARMY.—One squadron of the 1st (the King's) Regiment of Dragoon Guards, marched on the 15th instant, from Leeds, for Berwick. Three troops of the 9th Regiment of Lancers, marched, on the 15th inst., from Glasgow, for Carlisle.

Admiral Sir Robert Stopford is to succeed Admiral Sir James Saumarez, as Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's ship at Plymouth.

Major-General Fisher is to command the Artillery at Woolwich, in the room of General Ramsey deceased.

It was lately mentioned, that Mr. Secretary Peel had caused the Clerks of the Peace to be written to, on the subject of fees claimed from parties who were tried and acquitted. A case notably in point occurred on Wednesday last. It was a petty assault case, and the matter of complaint was so trifling, that the Chairman gave it as his opinion, that it did not amount to an assault. Upon this, Mr. Clarkson, who appeared as counsel for the defendant, instead of arguing that no assault had been committed, to the surprise of most present, "begged the Jury to find his client guilty, because he felt satisfied that the Court would inflict merely a nominal fine of one shilling in case of conviction; and if his client should be acquitted, he would have to pay 11. 7s. 6d. fees."

The public is always too precipitate in endeavouring to identify the characters of a satirical novel with living originals. With what success this has been done, in reference to the personages who figure in Truckleborough Hall, we know not; but, according to common report, Citizen North has been assigned to Mr. W—ds—th; the Rev. and Loyal Dr Mufflechops to the Rev. Mr. V——n, who is at present labouring hard for a bishoprick; Counsellor Babblethwaite, to Mr. Sergeant V——n; Lord Slender, to Lord G——le; Louisa Slender, to the Lady L. H., &c. &c.—Morning Chronicle.

LONDON SESSIONS.

Wednesday these Sessions were held at Guildhall, before the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Thorp, Birch, Sir R. C. Glyn, and Sir Peter Laurie.

William Carpenter, the pastry-cook of Fleet-street, was tried upon an indictment preferred by his wife, for an assault committed upon her the day before Christmas-day last.

The contentions of the defendant with his wife have been repeatedly the subject of the police reports from the Justice-room, Guildhall. The Jury found the defendant guilty.

The Court was of opinion, that the defendant had not only been guilty of brutal violence on the occasion in question, but of grossly immoral conduct in general towards his wife. To punish him for the act of which he had been found guilty, they sentenced him to two months' imprisonment in the Giltspur-street Compter; and to protect her for the future, they required that he should be further imprisoned until he found sureties to keep the peace towards her for the space of two years.

The defendant pleaded his large family of eight children, and the injury his business would sustain by his imprisoment, to obtain a mitigation of his sentence.

The Court refused to alter or mitigate the sentence.

RIOT IN WHITECROSS-STREET PRISON.

William Martin, William Spriggins, Henry Burrell, Samuel Simmons, Fisher Alderton, Edward Hannam, George Smith, and Peter Martin, were put to the bar, on a charge of having been guilty of riot in the Whitecross-street, Prison, and assaulting a prisoner named Mapleston.

The first witness for the prosecution was Valentine Musson, who deposed, that he was a prisoner in Whitecross-street Prison. On the 20th of November there had been an election of a "twelver"—that was, a person whose duty it was to make the beds, clean the rooms, and empty utensils. There was great noise then, for there was much party spirit in favour of the respective candidates. Mapleston was a prisoner. "Catting" was a punishment inflicted on those who did not pay the fees of the ward. It was chiefly performed by the parties, with their faces blackened, and disguised with rugs, going and taking the bed clothes from the offender, and otherwise maltreating him. The fees were appropriated to keep the ward clean, provide coals and candles, and other things for general comfort. The witness described an attack which was made by a number of prisoners, who went disguised, armed with brooms and sticks, to the bed of Mapleston; they made a noise in imitation of the mewing of cats, from which the practice derives its name. Mapleston resisted desperately. Witness saw the chamber utensils, with their contents, flying from his room; one of the assailants was knocked down, and they retreated; they afterwards returned again, when Mapleston set up cries of "Murder." He was dreadfully beaten, and they left him with the blood flowing profusely from his wounds.

The RECORDER, in his charge to the Jury, said, that a voluntary contribution for mutual comfort might be permitted, but a forced tax could never be tolerated in the prison.

The Jury found William Martin, William Spriggins, Henry Burrell, and George Smith, guilty, but acquitted the other defendants.

One of the Jury—We recommend the prisoners to a lenient punishment, in consideration of the practice having been an established custom there. We think the authorities are more to blame, in having permitted it, and that the prisoners, having been drawn into it to maintain the comforts of the place, are deserving rather of compassion than of punishment.

Another Juryman—That is our unanimous opinion.

The RECORDER, after consulting with the Magistrates on the bench, said, that if the offence had been a mere personal insult, such as pulling off the bed-clothes, the Court would have listened to the humane suggestion of the Jury; but it was violence, approaching almost to murder. The inmates of that gaol would think themselves countenanced, if the defendants now convicted received but a slight punishment. The Court therefore thought it their duty to sentence the defendants to be imprisoned for six months each, to hard labour, in Giltspur-street Compter.

ACCIDENTS, &c.

An inquisition was taken at the Belvedere Tavern, Pentonville, before Thomas Stirling, Esq. Coroner, and a respectable jury of the inhabitants, touching the melancholy death of Mr. James Wm. Aldridge, surgeon accoucheur, of Penton-street, who terminated his existence by taking a large quantity of laudanum on Friday night last. It appeared by the evidence, that so cautiously and unobserved had the decesed effected his purpose, that no discovery of the circumstance was made, nor even a suspicion entertained, until half-past ten o'clock at night, and within a very short time of his dissolution, previous to which his convulsive and agonizing groans attracted the attention of his family, and led to a discovery of the fact. Immediate medical assistance was obtained, and every effort used to save his life, but without effect, and the deceased expired a few minutes before 11 o'clock. It was the opinion of the medical gentlemen who attended the deceased, that the fatal drug had been taken about four hours before their assistance was called for. A short time back the name of the deceased appeared in the Gazette, and it is believed that that circumstance, connected with pecuniary difficulties, and a large family, preyed so much upon his mind as to excite him to the fatal act. The Jury brought in a verdict of—"Temporary mental derangement."

SHOCKING SUICIDE.—Just before ten o'clock on the evening of Saturday se'nnight, the following melancholy occurrence took place at the Smithfield Coffee-house, Smithfield-bars. Mr. Pickman, the respectable proprietor, having been from home for the previous two or three hours, enjoying the company of a friend, entered into some dispute with an old acquaintance sitting in the coffee-room, in the course of which a trifling point was debated with much warmth on both sides, each insisting on their correctness. Mr. Pickman at length became much irritated, and taking a carving-knife from a side-board, declared he would as soon stab himself as be argued out of his senses, and at the same instant plunged the knife into his side, and fell to the ground. Several of his horror-stricken family were witnesses of this dreadful catastrophe, and he was removed to his chamber weltering in his blood, and surgical assistance procured, but without avail, he dying within an hour after the rash occurrence took place. The knife had penetrated nearly three inches, and inflicted a severe wound in the liver.

On Tuesday evening, about eight o'clock, a daring robbery was committed by two fellows dressed as sailors, on the person of Mr. Jones, a gentleman residing at Islington, on that part of Spa-fields leading from Baker-street to Amwell-street, Pentonville. He was first knocked down by a severe blow on the head, which completely stunned him; and on recovering himself, he found both his hands tied together with a strong cord, and his pockets completely ransacked of their contents, which, amongst other articles, contained his pocket-book and 10l. in gold. A gentleman residing in Baker-street, passing by just afterwards, assisted Mr. Jones to disentangle his hands from the cords, which were severely injured by the tightness of the pressure. No traces of the thieves have been discovered. A number of robberies of a similar description have been committed during the winter within a few yards of the same spot.

VIVIAN GREY.—As the time approaches for the appearance of the continuation of this work, about which there has been so much controversy, the eagerness both of its friends and enemies, to know the nature of its contents, is great in the extreme. Their curiosity, however, will now speedily be gratified, as we observe the new volumes are to appear next week.

LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

MR. CANNING'S HEALTH!

We are happy to hear that Mr. Canning is considerably better. The accounts from Brighton yesterday continue of the same satisfactory character. An uninterrupted, but gradual, progress towards recovery is now confidently expected by his medical attendants.

PORTUGAL.

By intelligence from Portugal, received yesterday, it appears, the rebels had actually penetrated to within twelve or fifteen miles of Oporto. At the date of the latest advices from thrt city, however, all apprehensions of immediate danger had subsided, though, as may be expected, considerable anxiety prevailed. General Stubbs had about three thousand troops under his command, and was, besides, in communication with the Counts de Villa Flor, and Angeja, whose forces were interposed between Oporto and the rebels, under the Marquis de Chaves. The inhabitants of Oporto seem to be doubtful as to the fidelity of the troops stationed there; and it is a probable inference, indeed, that the effort of Chaves to enter the city, would not have been made, unless he had received information which led him to expect that the garrison would declare in his favour the first opportunity.

The British army, under the command of General Clinton, had marched from Lisbon to Coimbra, which was to be their headquarters, and where they were to arrive by the 16th. It was considered that by the 10th instant there would not be a British soldier in Lisbon, except those in the depot, and in the hospitals. A Proclamation from the War Department, issued in the name of the Infanta Princess Regent, on the 6th, announces the departure of our brave fellows, and expresses the confident hope of the Princess, that in every part of the interior where they may arrive, their "order and propriety" will "renew the same ties of fraternity which, during the Peninsular War, united the Portuguese and English army into one." This Proclamation speaks, also, in high terms of the discipline and regularity of the British troops while they remained in the capital.

ABDUCTION OF MISS TURNER.—It has been decided by the Court of King's Bench, that the trials of the Messrs. Wakefield, for the abduction of Miss Turner, shall take place at the ensuing Lancaster Assizes, on the nisi prius side.

CRIM. CON.—The trial of Sir Jacob Astley and Mr. Garth, for crim. con., is fixed for to-morrow in the Court of Common Pleas.

The bed-chair in which his Royal Highness the Duke of York died, has been removed from Arlington-street to Cumbridge-house. By command of the King, it is not to be sold, but will remain, as a melancholy memorial, with a beloved sister.

The Duke of York's useful furniture, together with his wines, will be sold by Christie, in the first instance. His ornamental furniture and his plate, the latter of which exceeds in quantity every similar sale in England, will come to the hammer afterwards.—Evening Paper.

We beg to recommend to the Public a New Establishment for the sale of boots, at 33½, Strand, where, for the low price of one guinea, persons may be comfortably provided with those necessary articles of dress.

We have great pleasure in stating, that his Grace the Duke of Wellington has signified to General Maitland, the Honorary Secretary of the Provisional Committee for conducting the proposed National Mouument to the memory of his late Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, his consent to take the chair at the public meeting convened for the 26th inst., at the Freemasons' Tavern. We are satisfied his Grace could not have signalised the commencement of his arduous duties, in the high office which he now fills, by any act more grateful to the feelings of every man in the British Army, and to those of the country at large.

In the debates on the Navy Estimates on Monday evening, Sir George Clerk made a statement to the following effect:—"The adulteration of flour intended for the use of the navy had been carried to so great an extent, that it became necessary for Government to take the grinding of it into their own hands, and they had accordingly established mills at Plymouth, Portsmouth, and Deptford. In the last year, not less than 6000 bags of flour were found to be adulterated, either by a mixture of foreign ingredients, or by using wheat of an inferior quality; and as it was impossible that the examining officer could inspect every sack, it was fair to suppose that many others had escaped detection."

A short time back, the following dialogue was held between a patient and Mr. Abernethy:—"I'm come, Sir."—"You need not tell me that; I see you're come. Well, what do you want with me!"—I feel very bad in my inside, and have no appetite."—"Pray what are you?"—I'm a publican, Sir."—"Oh, you're a publican, are you; well, Mr. Boniface, I suppose you take a glass of gin before breakfast?"—"Yes, Sir."—"And sometimes two?"—"Yes, Sir."—"And very likely if a friend comes in, you take a third glass?"—"That does happen sometimes, Sir."—"Why, you gin-drinking scoundrel, you burn up your guts with drams, and then have the impudence to come to be cured; get out of the house this moment."

The octagon, building at Buckingham-house, which originally constituted a part of the library of the late King, and in which the unique collection of old English poetry and plays was deposited, is to remain, and to be converted into a Royal Chapel. The splendid cartoons, by Raphael, now at Hampton-court Palace, are to be placed in this Chapel, Mr. Nash having ascertained that the various vacant compartments will exhibit these monuments of Raphael's genius to the greatest advantage.

On Thursday, between ten and eleven o'clock, Colonel Purden arrived at the Colonial-office in Downing-street, in a chaise and four, having landed on the coast of Cornwall, bringing despatches, with an account of the decease of the King of the Ashantees, in consequence of the four wounds his Majesty received in the celebrated battle in which Colonel Purden distinguished himself as commander of the British forces. The King was accompanied to the field of battle by twenty-nine of his wives! The King's great Chief has also died since the battle. Soon after the battle was over, the surrounding native troops took possession of the bodies of the slain Ashantees, cut off their heads, and were very expert in separating the jaw-bones, to take home with them as proofs of their victory. When General M'Carthy was taken, the King of the Ashantees had his head taken off, and worshipped it in a libation of rum. Colonel Purden has since got possession of it. During the conflict, the Colonel was wounded in the thigh. No less than three attempts were made to poison him. On his voyage home, he was nearly shipwrecked off the Rocks of Scilly. He left England about three years ago, with the rank of Major. The late Duke of York subsequently promoted him to the rank of Colonel of the Royal African Corps.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.—The resignation of Lord Amherst as Governor-General of India has been received by the Court of Directors; his Lordship is expected to quit Bengal in the latter end of this year. The severe family bereavement which Lord Amherst has suffered in the loss of his eldest son, has led, it is understood, to an earlier abandonment of the office than he previously contemplated. The vacancy, of course, is not yet filled up; but the "wise men of the East" are speculating on the probable successor to his Lordship. Lord William Bentinck, the Duke of Buckingham, Mr. Wynn, and Lord Melville, are talked of. To the last it is said that the post has been offered, but declined. It is a singular coincidence that vacancies have occurred in all the three Indian Presidencies, Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, nearly at the same time. The two last have been filled up by the appointment of Mr. Lushington to the Presidency of Madras, and Sir John Malcolm to that of Bombay. At the three seats of Indian Government the chair will be simultaneously filled, about the end of the present year, by individuals new to the office.

GENERAL MOURNING FOR THE DUKE OF YORK.

As the Lord Chamberlain's order respecting the changes of Court mourning, in Friday's Gazette, may be misunderstood, and thereby frustrate his Majesty's most gracious consideration for the many thousand manufacturers of fancy articles of dress, whose employment is almost entirely suspended during a public mourning, we republish his Majesty's command in the London Gazette at the decease of her Majesty Queen Charlotte.

"Lord Chamberlain's Office, Dec. 5, 1818.

"It is the intention of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent, and that of the Royal Family, to continue their mourning for her late Majesty during the space of six months, but it is not expected or desired that other persons should appear in mourning, except at Court, after the expiration of six weeks from the day of her late Majesty's demise."

The French Budget presents one item, which deserves to be noticed. No less a sum than eight millions sterling, nominally, but estimated, according to the value of money in France, at little short of twelve millions in reality, is devoted to the service of the navy. We would intreat those who display their zeal for economy, in attempting to cut down the Navy Estimates, to keep in mind this fact.

It is said, that on the 31st ult. the amount of property vested in securities in the name of the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, was the enormous sum of upwards of forty millions.

RECORDER'S COURT, DUBLIN.—O'Connell v. Sheehan.—Mr. Sheehan applied personally to the Recorder, to have the trial in this case postponed for a few days, upon the grounds of not being sufficiently prepared. The Recorder ruled that he should make the necessary affidavits, and give notice to the opposite party.—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

ITALIAN OPERA.—Miss AYTON was in excellent voice last Thursday, her sweet notes and brilliant execution are an additional attraction, belonging to so pretty a figure and under so good a guidance: the naiveté and attraction of the actress awakened all our sympathies for the mimic scene. We were delighted to see so select an audience—this is as it should be. The scene in which the highest perfection of musical talent is introduced should be patronized by those whose education and fortunes entitle and capacitate them for the enjoyment. We noticed a number of distinguished personages in the pit passing us during the evening. We hope the proprietor will, in the bizare performances announced for next Thursday, draw a wide distinction between the Carnival on the Parisian Boulevards, and a Masquerade at the King's Theatre; indeed the capabilities of his establishment entitles us to expect it.

The Journal des Debats states, that an intention exists of healing French honour, which has been wounded by the Austrian Ambassador's refusing to recognize the German titles of French Marshals, by a somewhat curious expedient. Austria, it seems, has made no objection to titles representing victories over her armies, but only to tilles taken from her fiefs. It is proposed, therefore, to add to the family name of each Marshal some German adjunct, descriptive of a German battle; and the first experiment is to be made in the case of Marshal Soult, who is at once to acquire a peerage, and three additional syllables to his name, by being admitted to the House of Peers under the title of Duke Soult-Austerlitz. We can scarcely credit a rumour so absurd on the face of it. Should it be true, there is more than one nation which will have the right of decorating its Generals with titles and names derived from various towns of France. Austria will, of course, lose no time in nominating Dukes of Lyons and Paris.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 228, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for £1., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

MOGUL, OR REAL CHETNA SAUCE.
C. HODGSON, ORIGINAL INVENTOR AND SOLE PROPRIETOR, is induced to caution his Friends and the Public against several spurious Sauces offered for sale, under the title of
"MOGUL, or REAL CHETNA."
C. H. will feel obliged if each purchaser of the above delicious Sauce will please to observe the Label: which should be signed, "C. HODGSON," and the Cork, sealed and impressed, "HODGSON'S MOGUL SAUCE," without which none can be genuine.
C. H. also begs to acquaint those who have not yet made a trial of this much approved Sauce, that the flavour will be found quite different, and far superior to any yet offered, for all kinds of Curries, Steaks, Stews, Chops, Hashes, Game, Grills, Broiled and Wild Fowl, Cold Meat, and for enriching Gravies, &c., and feels assured, that when tasted, it will fully justify what he has above stated. To Merchants and East and West India Captains, it is strongly recommended, being warranted to retain its full flavour in any climate.
To be had at the manufactory, No. 68, Long Lane, Bornugh, London, at the Piazza Coffee-house, Covent-garden, the Queen's Head Tavern, Holborn, and at any of the principal Oilmen and Grocers in Town and Country.

PILES.—A MEDICAL GENTLEMAN from Edinburgh, having been afflicted with this distressing complaint for more than seven years, and being aware of the danger of cutting, after consulting several eminent surgeons, from whom he derived but little benefit, was recommended to Mr. VAN BUTCHELL, Surgeon Accoucheur, No. 2, Half Moon-street, Piccadilly, who has effected a perfect cure in the short space of two months. In testimony of Mr Van Butchell's superior treatment of this disease, he is induced to give publicity to his case.
Every particular may be had by applying to Mr. Craddock, Chemist and Druggist, No. 54, Crawford-street, Bryanstone-square.

TOOTH-ACHE AND EAR-ACHE.

NEW EDITION, THE TENTH, ENLARGED,
With Observations on the Danger of trusting to Nostrums, as an Internal Remedy for the Cure of Strictures. Illustrated by Cases. Price 3s.
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS on STRICTURES of the URETHRA and RECTUM, recommending an improved system for their Treatment and Cure; illustrating its efficacy by numerous remarkable and highly important cases, in some of which, Strictures of from ten to twenty years duration have been totally removed in a few weeks, and its superiority thereby fully established over every other method hitherto practised. By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. To which are added, Observations and Practical Comments on Gleet, Seminal Weakness, and the miseries occasioned by Self Abuse, for the cure of which a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author.
Printed for the Author, Robert-street, Adelphi; and published and sold by Jones and Sherwood, Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Chapell, Royal Exchange; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell, 94, Pall Mall; Sutherland, 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; and may be had of all Booksellers.
"We earnestly recommend the cases related by Dr. Courtenay to the perusal of such of our readers as are afflicted with the complaints which the Author has made the subject of these Observations. Several instances are adduced of the recovery of perfect health from states which were considered hopeless by Practitioners of eminent talents, and very extensive experience. We entertain the highest opinion of Dr. Courtenay's professional skill, and congratulate him on his successful and judicious application to these severe and often fatal diseases."—European Magazine.

A Letter from W. Drayton, Esq. Sion-Hill, Bath.
TO Mrs. VINCENT, SOLE PROPRIETOR of GOWLAND'S LOTION.
MADAM—I should think myself deficient in duty to society and you, were I to withhold my public testimony to the great efficacy of your GOWLAND'S LOTION, which I have seen performed by the administration of it in a case under my own roof.
A young gentleman, aged about seven years, son of a Colonel in the army, was afflicted with a virulent and sore eruption, accompanied with an intolerable itching in the wrists and insteps, the only places of attack of the complaint, and that to so violent a degree as to make it necessary to confine his hands in bags, particularly at night: the complaint resisted various applications from the united consultation of three physicians of eminence, and continued to grow worse under the regimen prescribed, when a lady, who had received a cure of a very bad case of Scurvy in the face, of several years standing, by your Gowland's Lotion, recommended a trial of the same remedy. It was applied under my own inspection—the disease gave way—and three quarts of your Lotion performed a radical cure of a disorder, which had been of about four years duration, and had baffled the skill of several physicians eminent in their profession.
From my conviction of the above cure I recommended your Gowland's Lotion to a lady whose face exhibited a very disagreeable eruption, (even large pustules, and as one died away another appeared,) so much as to prohibit her going into company: a Quart of your Gowland's Lotion effected a cure, and she is now free from eruption. I am, Madam, &c.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH.—Feb. 20.

THE KING V. RICHARD DOWNING RICHARDS.

Mr. Adolphus opened the pleadings. This was an indictment charging the defendant with having published in The Age Sunday Newspaper several false, scandalous, and defamatory libels of and concerning the Dowager Countess of Glengall, and her son, the Right Hon. the Earl of Glengall.

Mr. Scarlett, in stating the case to the Jury, observed, that he had no doubt they had heard of a newspaper called The Age. So long as a newspaper contributed to excite a smile, by its observations on the follies of the day, provided it refained from wounding the feelings of individuals, or from attacking their moral character, he (Mr. Scarlett) would be the last person to advise a prosecution; but when the proprietors of a newspaper took advantage of the liberty that they enjoyed, and transgressed those bounds by making their columns the vehicle for the malice, the calumny, and slander of persons who might contribute to its collections, it was high time that a stop should be put to proceedings involving the peace and happiness of families. There could be no doubt that some of the real proprietors of this paper entertained some secret malice against the Earl of Glengall, for the series of wanton attacks to which he had been subjected could in no other way be accounted for. He (Mr. Scarlett) did not mean to say that the defendant himself was the author of these libels, but that he was put forth as the responsible person of others who preferred remaining in the back ground; and not content with calumniating his Lordship, they had also attacked his mother with similar abuse, attributing to her that she was a smuggler, and had, at last, only escaped detection by changing her name; while to his Lordship they imputed the habit of telling lies—one of the most disgraceful vices which could render a man odious in the sight of the world. He (Mr. Scarlett) should not trouble them with further observations on a subject which the libels themselves would exhibit in its true light. The defendant, or his correspondents, had adopted various modes for putting forth their calumnies: sometimes they appeared as Notices to Correspondents, or answers to letters alleged to have been received by them; and the first instance which he (Mr. Scarlett) should call their attention to was a publication in the defendant's Paper of the 19th of February, 1826, purporting to be remarks on his Lordship in a supposed Obituary for the year 1846, in the following words:—

"We are sorry to have to record the decease of the Right Hon. the Earl of Glengall, one of the most amusing story-tellers in town. In the early part of his life his Lordship was better known by the name of "Dull Care," but brightening up, he became the owner of several dramatic pieces—Irish Tutor, Cent. per Cent., High Life in London; and Norah, and a play called The French Libertine, have been attributed to his pen: they were nearly all, however, 'damned' at the time. His Lordship's mother was celebrated for carrying the question on the legitimacy of Lord Belfast, who married her Ladyship's daughter, and also for smuggling to such an extent, that it was a regular rule to search Lady Cahir; and she only avoided it the last time by becoming Lady Glengall during her absence from England—a title the preventive service were not acquainted with. The Earl was, however, a good-humoured, handsome, and witty man, and his talents are thus recorded:—

'' 'Here lies Le Menteur veridique,
'The Menteur very Dick indeed,
'Of whose sentiments here to speak
'There surely is but little need.
For Dick's accomplishments were such,
'He's left a fame that never dies,
'And having lied in life so much,
'No wonder 'tis in Death he lies.'

ANOTHER.

'Good passenger, one does lie here
'Who living did lie every where.' "

The next was contained in the defendant's Paper of the 11th of December, 1825, in the following form, as if alluded to some theatrical performance about to take place:—

"We hear that the following entertainments have been suggested by the parties whose names are opposite to them:—Begone dull Care and the Lie of the Day, by Lord Glengall; the Smuggler, by Lady Glengall." And again in The Age of January 29, 1826, the following appeared:—"Mrs. Chatterley refused to play in Glengall's comedy—his Lordship more partial to Chatter*lie* than Chatterley to his Lordship;" and in the Paper of the 21st of August, 1825:—"Thursday, went to Manton's, found Glengall looking at a gun—Should have expected to find him at Waring's, in Caroline-street, knowing his propensity for shooting—with a long bow;" and in another number, containing a copy of verses, entitled the Age of Monkies, or the Monkies of the Age, his Lordship was represented as

'The White Eye-lid Monkey is Dicky Glengall,
'Who for tricks all the other before is.'

If, continued the Learned Counsel, addressing the Jury, you should be of opinion, that such publications, by which an individual is to be rendered contemptible and ridiculous in the sight of mankind, are to be suffered to pass with impunity, you will find your verdict accordingly.

Mr. Joseph Tims and Mr. James Mallison having produced from the Stamp-office the affidavit that the defendant was sole proprietor of The Age, as also the newspapers of the above-mentioned dates.

Mr. William Manningham stated that he had been long acquainted with the Countess of Glengall, who was formerly known by the title of Lady Cahir.

The defendant not having appeared, or offered any defence,

The Lord Chief Justice, after recapitulating the different libels, told the Jury that if they were of opinion that the publications in question were of a tendency to bring into ridicule and contempt Lord and Lady Glengall, they would find the defendant guilty; if they were of a contrary opinion, they should acquit him.

The Jury, after deliberating in their box for a quarter of an hour, retired at half-past ten o'clock, and at 11 o'clock, returned with a verdict of Not Guilty, their foreman at the same time observing that they could not but express their decided reprobation of the conduct of a person who had been guilty of such repeated attacks on private character.

The Lord Chief Justice (who seemed to regard the verdict with some surprise) said, "You know best, gentlemen, the reasons for your decision; I suppose you mean your opinion to be recorded as part of the verdict."

HUGHES V. RICHARDS.

Mr. Adolphus opened the pleadings.

Mr. Scarlett stated the case to the jury. He said, this was an action by the plaintiff to recover from the same defendant such a compensation in damages as they might deem him entitled to for the publication of a gross libel on his character and reputation. The plaintiff was a gentleman of great respectability, and well known in the highest circles. Some time since he had become the purchaser of Oatlands, the estate of his late Royal Highness the Duke of York, and he had also married a lady who had formerly appeared as a performer at the King's Theatre. Although her situation in life was not then such as to render her an object of choice, yet her beauty, her accomplishments, and her worth, had been to Mr. Hughes sufficient to render her acceptable, and a sufficient excuse for the passion he entertained for her. He (Mr. S.) did not suppose that the defendant knew any thing of either Mr. or Mrs. Ball Hughes, yet he had, or through the means of his paper some one else had, cast upon the conduct and character of this gentleman the most serious imputations, and he (Mr. Scarlett) trusted that when he should prove to their satisfaction that the defendant was the proprietor of this paper which had put forth these false and libellous attacks on the conduct of unoffending individuals—he trusted that although the defendant might not appear to be very rich, the jury would by their verdict mark their detestation of his conduct, and either in his purse or in his person make him feel that punishment which he so richly deserved. The defendant had in this case pleaded the general issue, and by that plea he had admitted the libel. If he had had any shadow of defence, it was competent for him to have pleaded a justification, and placed the matter in justification on the record; but having adopted a different course, it only remained for him to produce the necessary proof of the publication, and read to them the libel which was contained in the defendant's paper of the 19th of Feb., 1826, under the head of memorandums, for the last week, in the following words:—

"York House getting on—one story finished—another story talked of as the reason of delay, owing to Ball Hughes owing the ready for Oatlands to his Royal Highness, and having taken French leave, and his wife's maid from the Quadrant without leave:"

Thus imputing to the plaintiff that he had absconded under the most disgraceful circumstances. The next publication appeared in the paper of the 2d of April, in the Obituary for 1846:

"Few persons have gone down to that bourne from which no traveller returns, more regretted than Mr. Ball Hughes, just departed this life. As a wit, a scholar, a finished gentleman, a tender father, and a devoted husband, he has left behind him no equal. About seven or eight and twenty years ago, this noble gentleman burst out upon the town with a fortune of nearly 700,000l., the greatest part of which he, with a too great liberality, gave away in the holy cause of charity, retaining just enough to enable him to support his establishment in a becoming manner. Mr. Hughes is a singular instance of the victims mankind are to calumny; for, in spite of his well-known character, it has been malignantly said of him, that when he took Mademoiselle Mercandotti (the present Mrs. Hughes) accompanied by her mother out of town in the year 1823, (on which event so many epigrams appeared), amongst which was the celebrated one of the facetious G. Colman, ending with

"She's one Ball at her foot," &c. &c.

he had not the remotest idea of marrying her; but not being able to effect his purpose without, and urged by Lord Fife, wheedled by the mother, and denied by the lady, he finally consented. The tongue of slander has never said that sometime after his marriage he had such a predilection for a maid instead of a matron, that he supported one for a long time at No. 139, Regent-street, from which place he removed her to the Quadrant in the same street, and finally removed her to the continent in the year 1826. They did also say that he was addicted to gambling, and lost heavy sums to the notorious Crockford, part of which he never paid, and that the debt for the purchase of Oatlands from the Duke of York was never all discharged. But we have reason to believe that the whole of these reports are a tissue of malice and invention. Mr. Hughes spent a great part of his life with the late Tom Raikes, (whose regard for his sister, Lady Burke, was well known.)—They were at Paris together for some time, when Mr. Hughes acquired that perfection in the French language for which he was so distinguished: as a proof of which the following epitaph was some time since written by himself, and is placed on his tombstone agreeably to a codicil in his last will and testament:—

'' 'Here's Mr. Ball Hughes stretched at length
'Whom all the maids that knew, pay
'A tribute of regret to find
'Son Vie est sitot coupe!' "

The jest, continued Mr. Scarlett, contained in these lines, was perfectly worthy of the good taste of the persons conducting The Age; but if these attacks had not extended to the character of the plaintiff, they might have been passed over in silence with that contempt they deserved, but as the plaintiff had been urged by these repeated calumnies to bring his case into Court, he (Mr. Scarlett) trusted that the jury would by their damages against the defendant, who was merely the stalking horse of others, pronounce their horror and detestation of such conduct.

The usual evidence having been given from the Stamp-office, that the defendant was the sole proprietor of The Age,

Mr. Samuel Kendal, land steward to his late Royal Highness the Duke of York, proved that the plaintiff, Mr. Ball Hughes, purchased Oatlands on the 4th of October, 1825, and that the purchase-money was invested in the names of trustees some few weeks after the signing of the contract.

The defendant offering no defence,

The Lord Chief Justice, after remarking on the nature of the publication, observed that it was for the jury to say whether in their opinion those publications were libellous or not: if they thought they were, they would find a verdict for the plaintiff, with such reasonable and temperate damages as they should think him entitled to.

After deliberating in their box for about three quarters of an hour, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, £150

RAIKES V. RICHARDS.

This was an action by the plaintiff, a gentleman of great respectability, to recover from the same defendant a compensation in damages for certain libels published in The Age Sunday newspaper, tending to bring the plaintiff into ridicule and contempt.

Mr. Scarlett (with whom were Mr. Common Sergeant, and Mr. Adolphus), in stating the case to the Jury, said he could not help making some observations on the decision of the jury in the first case against the present defendant; he must say that, entertaining the greatest respect for those gentlemen, he at the same time felt the greatest surprise at the result of their deliberations; and as they had by their decision refused that redress which the prosecutors sought for the calumnies and abuse they had been exposed to, he would only wish, that at some future period those gentlemen might themselves feel the sting of such publications as they had by their verdict refused to suppress. He regretted that any journal should resort to such practices as those which had brought The Age into a degree of unenviable notoriety. The plaintiff had to complain that he had been, by a succession of libels, driven to seek protection and redress from a Court of Justice. It could not be contended, that because the attacks which the plaintiff had been subjected to were, taken singly, mere trifles, that they were the more excusable, or less likely to prove injurious to character. The constant dripping of water would wear away the stone, and a man might have the forbearance for once or twice to look over such attacks; but when, week after week, his name was posted up at the corner of every street as a subject to be attacked in the present or next week's paper, it was not to be wondered at that he sought that relief from the hands of a jury of his countrymen which could alone put a stop to such licentious and unmerited attacks. When the names of Dicky Glengall, and Tommy Raikes, and Hughes Ball, were advertised to be the food for public scandal, to be served up in the next number of The Age, it was impossible to suppose that there was any thing but a deliberate intention to make those individuals conspicuously remarkable and contemptible, by placing them in some ludicrous or malicious point of view, and though it might be beneath the notice of a sensible man to commence proceedings against the author of remarks respecting the peculiarity of his countenance or person, if those remarks proceeded to such a length as to render that person the subject of ridicule and observation, it was impossible not to feel uneasy and irritated at a series of attacks, though petty and insignificant in themselves, destructive of the peace and happiness of individuals and their families. One of the libels against the present plaintiff was contained in the supposed Obituary published in the defendant's paper, and already adverted to. The first was in the following words:—

"Tommy Raikes, whose demise we lately noticed, was at one time an eminent merchant; but losing a very considerable sum of money by an unfortunate speculation in tallow during the Russian war, he has not died as wealthy as was expected. It has been attributed by some to his entering at rather an advanced period of life into fashionable society, and therein wasting both time and money. It is said that the feeling of vanity was so predominant in him, that he would not "bring out his daughters," lest they should betray their father's age. He was educated at Eton, and was a very clever and witty man; he is said to be the author of a work on Vaccination; but whether true or not, we are unable to determine. He was buried in a private, respectable, but cheap manner, in Cripplegate church, and a tablet is erected to his memory with this inscription:—

'' 'Who o'er this tomb his contemplation makes,
'Laments o'er one of London's oldest rakes.
'He was, or fate before had stopped his breath,
'So very ugly that he frightened Death:
'And yet he had such fear in nerve and limb,
'That any living always frightened him.
'Though covered with the pits he faced before,
'He's covered now in one he'll face no more.' "

The next was in defendant's paper of the 4th of January, 1826, as follows:—

"Woodstock, at the rival theatre, has gone 'to the place from whence it came,' and the best place for it too; and its performance is only remarkable for an instance of downright Cockney impudence, deserving castigation. On the evening of its production, a party were permitted to occupy his Royal Highness the Duke of York's box, and one among them was a pert cit, who generally contrives to poke his face every where, which is the more reprehensible, as it is one of the ugliest in the kingdom: we allude to Mr. T. Raikes, who, during Mrs. Chatterley's recitation of the epilogue, leant out of the Duke's box, tore up a play-bill, and threw the fragments on the stage. Can such an old prig as this man is, therefore, wonder that The Age, or any journal, should hold up to ridicule the conduct of one who, after obtaining the entree of a society he was no more born for than he is fitted for, does not know how to behave himself in it. If the Duke condescends to allow any such person to sit in his box, he naturally concludes he will deport himself like a gentleman; but that not being the case, we hope this circumstance (which we saw from the opposite box) coming to his Royal Highness's knowledge, will operate on the grant of any future permission to such very vulgar people."

In the defendant's paper of June 4, 1826, under the title of the Age of Monkies, or the Monkies of the Age, the following lines appeared:

'' 'In these days when no one but monkies you see,
'To fill up our streets and our stages,
'We venture to trace, of each kind and degree,
'Who the monkey in chief of the age is:
'That every ass may see in his glass,
'As thorough a monkey as any that pass.' "

And with reference to the plaintiff the following:—

" 'It is also apparent the name ————
'Of the common baboon justly makes his;
'And 'tis equally evident, by the same rule,
'The *un*common one Tommy Raikes is:
'That every ass, &c.' "

In another of the defendant's papers, professing to contain the account of theatrical representations, suggested by different persons, the farce of The Liar, attributed to the suggestion of the plaintiff, and placed opposite to his name, with the intention of imputing to him habits which would entitle him peculiarly to that performance. The learned counsel, after remarking at considerable length on the irritating nature of these attacks, concluded by expressing his hope that the jury he had now the honour of addressing would not, like their predecessors, declare that it was not libellous to call a man a liar. It was greatly to be regretted that the defendant was the only person that the law could, in the present instance, reach, for he was a mere man of straw, set up as a blind for the authors of those libels which had appeared in The Age; but he (Mr. Scarlett) trusted that by their verdict they would teach the defendant that such conduct could not be pursued with impunity.

Mr. Tims and Mr. Mallison having produced the necessary affidavits and the newspapers from the Stamp-office,

Mr. Rowley, of the firm of Dawson, Capron, and Rowley, was called to prove that it was impossible to walk down Bond-street, or the principal streets, without observing the placards which had been published, announcing in The Age some of the libels which were to appear relative to Mr. Raikes.

Mr. Brougham objected to the admission of this evidence.

Mr. Scarlett—What! does my learned friend mean to say he defends this action?

Mr. Brougham—Indeed I do.

Mr. Scarlett—Then you ought to have apprised me of it. The last case was undefended, and my learned friend, who was in Court, made not a single remark.

Mr. Brougham—I had no brief in the last case, and until it was necessary in this, I did not think it proper to say any thing.—(A laugh.) The learned gentleman then contended, that as there was no evidence to connect the defendant with the placards that had been posted up, the evidence of the witness could not be received.

Mr. Scarlett submitted that it was matter for the jury to consider whether such information as was contained in those placards could be obtained in any other way but from the defendant.

Mr. Brougham, in reply, contended that if the doctrine of his learned friend was admitted, it would have the effect of admitting evidence of the most improper nature. The fact of the placards containing the name of Mr. Raikes, was only evidence that the newsvender intended to excite the curiosity of the public by puffing off the paper to contain some anecdotes respecting Mr. Raikes.

The Lord Chief Justice was of opinion that there was no evidence that the placards were published by the authority of the defendant.

Mr. Brougham, in addressing the jury for the defendant, observed, that his learned friend (Mr. Scarlett), when he adverted to the trifling nature of the libels, evidently felt some misgivings on the subject, and he (Mr. Brougham) was not surprised at his learned friend's feelings. It was quite absurd to say that Mr. Raikes's character was likely to suffer, or had suffered, or his feelings been lacerated, by those publications. The topics which his learned friend usually insisted on in cases of libel, were, that they affected the fair fame, blighted the reputation, and wounded the feelings of the parties against whom they were directed; but in the present case such topics did not apply. The question, whether Mr. Raikes was a little more or less ill-favoured in his countenance, could be of little consequence. It had nothing to do with his reputation—nothing to do with his happiness—and, if he was a sensible man, very little to do with his feelings. The libels, if libels they could be called, had been, by his learned friend's admission, frittered down to nothing. It had been admitted in substance, that no person in a dignified situation would think it for a moment worth his while to bring an action on such trifling charges. A man well known, filling a public situation, would depend upon his own respectability and reputation, without considering what others thought of him. This his learned friend had admitted, but then, said he, when a person filled no public situation, but was only known in private life, and in the circle which he moved, it was not pleasant to have his person made he subject of conversation or ridicule in the little coteries of which he was a member, or at the dinner parties which he attended: this was the ground his learned friend had taken, and what could be more curious? Mr. Raikes's person must have been known to those coteries. The persons who composed them could not be ignorant of it, when they had the advantage of a view which the jury had not. (A laugh.) His learned friend's position was, that the libels now complained of were for the purpose of making the plaintiff's person a subject of ridicule and contempt in the circles in which he moved. Yet was it possible that the individuals who composed those circles were unable to judge of their own knowledge, whether Mr. Raikes was ill-favoured or not? Was it to be supposed that their judgment was to be suspended till they had seen the next Sunday's newspaper? Then, and not till then, according to his learned friend, they were to decide, by the assistance of the editor of THE AGE, whether Mr. Raikes was an Adonis or not; whether they were to laugh at him, or treat him as a handsome man. If Mr. Raikes was not a very handsome man, he was not to blame—he could not help it, nor the newspaper was not in fault, it was nature that was to blame; and if Mr. Raikes was a very handsome man, nothing could be more harmless than the comments contained in the paragraphs in question. His learned friend said the libel must apply to the plaintiff; he (Mr. Brougham) did not know that it did apply to him, but if it did, the foundation was in nature, and if it had not its foundation in nature, there was nothing in it, and Mr. Raikes had only to show himself, and there was an end of the squibs. He (Mr. Brougham) had heard of ladies being offended at imputations on their personal loveliness: such observations might mar a woman's prospects, but it really was too ridiculous for a gentleman of Mr. Raikes's age, having daughters old enough to be brought out in the world, to trouble himself with such ridiculous squibs. Of all the cases of libel he (Mr. Brougham) had ever heard, this was the slightest, and one that tended the least to affect a man's fair fame, his reputation, or his happiness. But then his learned friend said, that the editor of this newspaper was not contented with ridiculing his client, but he had actually placed him in the obituary, and killed him whilst living. But this was a misfortune which others besides clients were subject to. (A laugh.) Lawyers, as well as laymen, had been killed before their time; and it really was very annoying, for the first intimation the person thus despatched had of his death was, if in Parliament, to find that his letters had been stopped at the Post-office, and, next day, to see a long paragraph, containing his life and character, in a newspaper. The advantage of this practice, was, that the person thus prematurely killed, heard all that good of himself during his life-time, which, under other circumstances, would have been kept for his executors and administrators. (Continued laughter.) On this ground, therefore, Mr. Raikes had little reason to complain, as he was no worse off, he would say, than his betters, but certainly than his fairers. Well, then, there was another charge; Mr. Raikes was termed a cockney. Mr. Raikes, it seemed, was a respectable merchant, and he was called a cockney. Well!—what was a cockney? By a cockney was meant a person who had been born within the sound of Bow bells, or was connected with the City of London. Now, what imputation was this on any man? It assuredly could not be considered a matter of disgrace—at least, he hoped not; for he (Mr. Brougham) was himself subject to an imputation, being a member of the corporation of that great and wealthy metropolis—a connexion which he always looked to as conferring very great honour on him. He knew many respectable gentlemen having business in the city, and living in the west end of the town, who treated the imputation sought to be cast on Mr. Raikes in the highest contempt. Yet such was the charge upon which Mr. Raikes thought it necessary to have a special jury empanelled in Westminster—he could not go a little to the east, when he knew that to be called a citizen would be accounted an honour, but he came to Westminster to persuade a special jury to find a verdict for a libel. Another charge was, that it was said Mr. Raikes was not fit for genteel society. Really a man of Mr. Raikes's age should not think himself hurt by such an observation, for what was to be unfit for genteel society in the opinion of all others but those regular idiots who have the phrase for ever in their mouths? To be unfit for genteel society in the minds of rational men, was to be regular, punctual, industrious, and above fashionable vices. Every man, he repeated, but vulgar fools, thought a man the better for being frugal, honest, and industrious; and this it was to be unfit for genteel society. Now, there remained another libel to which his learned friend thought proper to allude. A number of characters, domestic characters, were placed opposite to gentlemen's names—and that appended to Mr. Raikes's name was "the Liar." Opposite a noble friend of his, Lord Nugent, was "the Minor." Now, his noble friend, Lord Nugent, he knew was two or three and thirty, if he was a day; so that the name of the "minor" could not apply to him, any more than that of "the liar" to Mr. Raikes; and he could only account for their names being appended to those characters, by supposing that his noble friend Lord Nugent patronized the farce of the Minor at some private theatre, and Mr. Raikes patronized the farce of the Liar. This, he protested, was the only way he had of accounting for the circumstances. He, therefore, called upon the jury to look at the matter as men of sense, and not to inflict heavy damages on a poor man, whose condition was pretty well demonstrated by his allowing another case to go undefended. His learned friend said by pleading the general issue, the falsehood of those libels had been admitted; but how could a special pleader have justified the libels if they were true? It would be too ridiculous to set forth in the declaration, that Mr. Raikes was a very ugly man. Under all the circumstances, he thought the Jury would best consult their duty by returning a verdict of not guilty.

The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up, observed, that the only question for the consideration of the jury was, whether the publication complained of were libellous or not. If they were of opinion that the publications in question would have the effect of rendering the plaintiff ridiculous in the eyes of the people he was in the habit of associating with, he was entitled to their verdict, with such reasonable and temperate damages as they might consider a compensation for the injury he had received. In my opinion (continued his Lordship) the calling a man a liar is imputing to him one of the greatest deviations from moral rectitude which a man can be guilty of."

The jury, after a few minutes' deliberation, found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages 40s.

SMITH AND ANOTHER V. JONES, ESQ.

This was an action by Messrs. Smith and Perring, woollen-drapers, in St. Martin's-lane, to recover the sum of 1,914l. 10s. from the defendant, the Marshal of the King's Bench prison, for having suffered the escape of a person named Abraham Simmonds, who had been lodged in execution in his custody for that amount, at the suit of the defendants.

The usual proof having been given that Simmonds had been duly lodged in the custody of the Marshal, and obtained the rules, the evidence for the plaintiffs proved, that on the evening of the 3d of October last, Simmonds went from his house, in the London-road, to the house of a friend, named Hart, in Mount-row, Lambeth, which was out of the rules. Notice was immediately given, by the plaintiffs, whose attorney filed the bill against the Marshal, at five minutes before 11 o'clock that night, and Simmonds did not leave Hart's house till ten minutes before 12, and was followed by the witnesses to his own door. For the defendant it was contended that the witnesses for the plaintiffs were wholly mistaken as to the person of Abraham Simmonds, that he had a brother of the name of Elias Simmonds, so closely resembling him, that few people could know them apart, and that in fact it was on that the witnesses on the part of the plaintiff had seen at Hart's house on the evening in question, and followed to his brother's house. In support of this statement ten witnesses were called, who swore that Abraham Simmonds was at the house of a Mr. Lewis, in Melina-place, Kent-road, on the evening of the 3d of October, from between the hours of five and six till half-past 11 at night, and that it was Elias Simmonds that had been seen at Hart's house that evening, and not his brother. Evidence was also produced that Elias Simmonds was now confined in a mad-house. In reply, the plaintiff's witnesses were recalled, who stated that they were acquainted with both the brothers, and were certain that it was Araham Simmonds they had seen beyond the rules that night, and not his brother Elias.

The Lord Chief Justice, after recapitulating the evidence to the Jury, left it for them to say whether it was not possible the witnesses might have been mistaken.

The Jury, after a short deliberation, found a verdict for the defendant.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, FEB. 19.

SIR JACOB ASTLEY V. THOMAS GARTH, ESQ.—This was an action for Crim. Con. and several witnesses, servants to her Ladyship and the defendant, were called, who clearly proved the adultery. The mother of Sir Jacob, his sister, and the Chaplain, all testified to the perfect harmony which subsisted between the parties up to the time when her Ladyship eloped with Captain Garth. For the defence, it was urged, that Sir Jacob had negligently left his wife at various times on electioneering pursuits and horse-racing, during which absence he was guilty of every excess incompatible with his wife's feelings, and that his conduct had driven her to the necessity of seeking protection elsewhere. The adultery was admitted, but Sir Jacob's treatment was alledged as a strong palliative for the injury for which he claimed recompense. Many witnesses were examined for defendant.

Among others, Mary Richardson, being sworn, stated, that in the year 1826 she was living in Leicester, where she carried on the business of a dress maker. Two young ladies, named Burbridge and Sparfield, lived with her, and assisted her in carrying on her business. She remembers the private races in that year between a horse of Sir Edward Mostyn and one of Sir Jacob Astley. Sir Jacob Astley was present. Witness saw and spoke to him on the race-course. She afterwards saw him in a private room at the Bell Inn twice. Lady Astley was lodging at the time close to the Bell Inn. Witness when she saw Sir Jacob on the race-course, had with her the Misses Burbidge and Sparfield. Sir Jacob came to them from his carriage, in which Lady Astley was sitting, and told them that he would come and treat them in the evening. He had a whip in his hand, with the hooked end of which he lifted up Miss Burbidge's petticoats. This was on the public race course, and within a few hundred yards of Lady Astley. Sir Jacob, on returning to his carriage, got up into the dickey, and turning round to them, kissed his hand, and repeated his promise of coming and treating them in the evening. Sir Jacob did not come to her house that evening, but he came the next, accompanied by several gentlemen. They sent out for wine—Sir Jacob gave her a sovereign to pay for his share. After a little time Sir Jacob retired up stairs into a bed-room with Miss Burbidge. They locked the door after them, and continued up there nearly half an hour. When witness saw Sir Jacob at the Bell Inn he gave her money. He never came to her house either before or after the time she had mentioned.

Witness was cross-examined at great length by Mr. Scarlett, who failed, however, in shaking her testimony.

Mary Ann Webster confirmed great part of the account given by the last witness, as also did Charlotte Spawforth.

Miss Burbidge also gave evidence to the same effect, and admitted having retired to a bed-room with Sir Jacob; but on being asked whether an adulterous intercourse had taken place there, she declined answering that question.

Sir Edward Mostyn stated, that he was one of the party who were introduced to them, and treated with wine. After they had drank a few glasses of wine, Sir Jacob left the room and went up stairs with one of the girls. He was absent about 20 minutes.—Witness's opinion is, that he did not retire in order to commit adultery; but he is not able to give any reason for that opinion. He can only say that such was the impression on his mind. Witness was in company with Sir Jacob on the race-course when he looked up the girl's petticoats, and witness cautioned him that if he did not mind his wife would see him. On the evening of the races, Sir Jacob and witness were standing at the door of the Bell Inn, when four loose females came up and accosted them. They appeared to be drunk: witness retired into the room where they had dined, and was followed by Sir Jacob, together with the girls, who had several glasses of wine before they left. They at last became so noisy that the landlord was obliged to eject them forcibly. Sir Jacob was not tipsy when he went to Mrs. Richardson's house.

Captain Bulkeley admitted having been of the party at Mrs. Richardson's; and Sir Jacob was also there, and that he had acted as described by the last witness.

Captain Rich gave evidence to the same effect. Both these witnesses stated that Sir Jacob was perfectly sober.

Miss Susan Paul stated that she had been accosted by Sir Jacob Astley in the streets of Yarmouth, and asked for her card; that she declined giving it to him, or telling him where she lived. He afterwards met her at a place in that town, called Vauxhall Gardens, where he spoke to her, and gave her 5s. to pay for admission to the theatre.

The Lord Chief Justice, in summing up, said, that if it were as had been hinted by the Counsel for the plaintiff, the object of the defendant to prove adultery on the part of the plaintiff, for the purpose of avoiding any promise he might have made to the lady, a worse wretch did not crawl on the face of the earth. If it were done to free him from engagements which he might otherwise think himself compelled to perform, it was most scandalous. The lady had been proved to be the wife of the plaintiff, and the verdict of the Jury must therefore go against the defendant. The only question was the amount of damages, a subject which the Constitution of the country had wisely, in such cases, left to the Jury. If they should be of opinion that the crime of adultery, as alleged against the plaintiff, was proved, it would diminish the damages. The defendant's case, if proved to their satisfaction, left the plaintiff no claim to any thing beyond nominal damages. If he had thrown away his wife to associate with the women who had appeared in that Court he had nothing to expect from a Jury.

The Jury retired to consider their verdict at seven o'clock, and a little after nine returned into Court, when their names having been called over, the Foreman read their verdict from a written piece of paper he held in his hand, as follows:—

"The Jury have to express their great regret that they cannot conscientiously in this case mark their deep detestation of Captain Garth's conduct, by giving heavy damages against him, on account of the plaintiff not having himself come into Court with clean hands. On that ground they, in finding for the plaintiff, had awarded to him—One Shilling damages only."

The damages were laid in the declaration at £12,000.

CONSISTORY COURT.—WEDNESDAY.

ASTLEY V. ASTLEY.

In this case Sir Jacob Astley has instituted a suit, praying to be divorced from Lady Astley, on the ground of her adultery with Capt. Garth.

Dr. Daubigny (with whom was Dr. Dodson) now applied on behalf of her Ladyship, praying the Court to order Sir Jacob Astley to pay her Ladyship a sum of money on account of alimony. The Learned Counsel said he was not instructed to press the Court for any particular sum, but of course the Court would see the propriety of granting something sufficient to enable Lady Astley to support herself in that rank which she was accustomed to fill, and in which her marriage portion, as well as her husband's large fortune, entitled her to a place.

[It is understood that Sir Jacob received 10,000l. on his marriage with Miss Dashwood, now Lady Astley.]

Drs. Jenner and Lushington appeared for Sir Jacob, and after some remarks between the Counsel for both parties, the Court ordered that the sum of 800l. should be paid to Lady Astley on account of alimony.

OLD BAILEY, FEB. 22.

The Sessions having terminated, the Recorder proceeded to pass the awful sentence of death upon the following prisoners, previous to which he addressed them nearly as follows:—"You have all been tried by impartial Juries of your countrymen, who felt themselves reluctantly compelled in the discharge of the duty they owed to their country and their God, to find a verdict of guilty against you. It is dreadful to reflect, that the example that was made of similar offenders within the last six weeks, has not been sufficient to deter you from the commission of crimes, by which your lives have become forfeited. It is much to be lamented, that the offences of a great many of you are of the deepest die. The crime of horse-stealing in particular has increased to an enormous degree. To such of you as were convicted of that offence, I can hold out no hopes of mercy, and I implore each of you to prepare for that awful change which awaits you.

He then passed sentence in the usual form upon John Smith, Joseph Clarke, Henry Spizey, and Page Donald, for stealing in a dwelling-house.—Sharpe England and Even Jones, for forgery.—John Eagles for stealing a letter from the General Post-Office.—Charles Seward (who pleaded guilty) for returning from transportation.—John Davis, George Avery, Thomas Fowler, Henry Ironmonger, Robert Jones, and Benjamin Saunders, for highway robbery.—William Blanchard and Jeremiah Connor, for burglary.—William Rust, John Oliver, John Howard, alias Johnson, Edward Laycock and Samuel Jones, for horse-stealing. W. Austen, W. Fox, and J. Duxberry, for house-breaking in the day-time; and Rebecca Mullens, for inciting the two last named prisoners to commit the said offence.

To be transported for Life.—George Page, Mary Smith, Elizabeth Addison, John Smith, Margaret Cain, Margaret Goulding, George Pallmer, Wm. Draper, Henry Smith, and James Barnes. hands, that the public securities would be powerfully influenced

To be transported for 14 Years.—Mary Mumford, Thomas Ellison, Thomas Jones, and Silas Brooker.

Several were then sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, and fifteen to be privately, and one to be publicly, whipped.

The Court then adjourned the session.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—BLASPHEMY.—The Rev. Robert Taylor was brought before the Lord Mayor on Monday, in custody on a charge of blasphemy uttered by him at his Areopagus, in the City. The charge was distinctly proved by the testimony of Collins, Ward Beadle of Walbrook, corroborated by Mr. Cornelius Pugh, grocer, of Cannon-street. The Rev. Orator, in his defence, entered into a recriminatory attack on the character of the witnesses, whom he described as illiterate men, and therefore incapable of judging whether the expressions which they declared blasphemous, had been uttered by him in a hypothetical manner, for the sake of argument, or if they were pronounced in didactic tone as truth. The Lord Mayor ordered him to give 48 hours' notice of bail, to stand his trial on two distinct charges of blasphemy, uttered on the 6th and 13th inst. himself in 200l. and two sureties in 100l. each, to be approved by the City Solicitor. The required bail was put in on Wednesday, and Mr. Taylor was liberated.

FATAL TEMERITY.—On Thursday sen'night, between four and five o'clock, the following dreadful occurrence took place:—At the Star Inn, in Bedminster, was a caravan of wild beasts, and the keeper being in want of an attendant, a person who had from his infancy been accustomed to the business, offered his services on the Wednesday, and was accepted. He was, however, cautioned not to go within the reach of any of the beasts: this caution he unhappily neglected. A party came to see the animals, and as the lion was asleep, and did not appear willing to rise, the man imprudently went into his den. The beast suddenly awakened, and probably hungry, and alarmed at the presence of the stranger, darted forward one of his paws, with which he seized the showman by the shoulder, and at the same moment with the other he very dreadfully lacerated the face. The miserable man cried piteously, and struggled to get loose, but his efforts were in vain, and the lion, now infuriated, seized him by the throat with his mouth, and held him in that situation until death put a period to the too horrible sufferings of the victim. A gentleman happening to pass who lived in the neighbourhood, immediately brought his pistols, and another person called to a blacksmith, who had a piece of iron red hot, to afford assistance, but it was twenty minutes before the animal would quit his prey, although his mouth was much burned; at length the head of the unhappy man fell from his jaws, a spectacle too horrible for description, when the body was drawn from the cage. We understand that under ordinary circumstances the animal was exceedingly quiet and docile, so much so, indeed, that two women and two children had actually been in the cage with him on the preceding day. We hope this will be a warning to persons not to intrust themselves within the reach of such ferocious animals; and we should be glad to learn that the disgusting practice of hallooing down the throats of lions and tigers was discontinued.

NATIONAL TALES.—The Illustrations to these Tales will not exceed in number eight. They have been designed on stone, and highly finished by that ingenious and singularly original artist, Thomas Dighton. The two horses in the illustration to the German Knight are admirable; and the group of the shaven and turbulent friars, the plate of which appertains, we suspect, to "The Miracle of the Holy Hermit," is in excellent keeping.

FROM THE MONTHLY REVIEW.—The new novel of Almack's may be said to present masterly representations of the leading features of fashionable existence, the country and its amusements, the routs, dinners, and the Opera, &c. in town, and the balls at Almack's. It seems to have been the sole object of the writer to give a natural representation of the manners, the conversations, and in short, the every day employments of the Aristocratic circles; and she has succeeded to the fullest extent. Readers of every class cannot fail to be amused with a work so full of variety and of elegant satire, controlled throughout by sound good sense, and informed by a spirit that is remarkable for its acuteness of observation.

We have received the following reply from that egregious bully O'CONNELL, which speaks for itself—it is pretty certain where the Catholic Rent goes!—

SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of THE AGE newspaper, containing a letter addressed to me on the subject of the Catholic Rent.

I now answer your laconic epistle in as few words as possible, by saying, that as you are not a contributor to that fund, your curiosity is impertinent, and that all those who are subscribers, and consequently friends to Ireland, have full access to the books of the treasurer to the Catholic Association. I am, Sir,

Your obedient humble servant,

THE AGE.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 25.

The country has read, with unmingled and deep regret, the particulars of the illness with which it has pleased the DISPOSER OF EVENTS to afflict the illustrious Earl of LIVERPOOL, and has watched from day to day the progress of his affliction, in the official bulletins which have been regularly issued, and in the reports gathered from the anxious enquiries of hundreds of people at his LORDSHIP's residence.

A more lamentable occurrence could not certainly have befallen the nation, at this crisis, when matters of such weighty importance are about to come under the cognizance of Parliament, in the consideration and discussion attendant upon which his LORDSHIP's judgment and assistance would be of such infinite value. It is, however, gratifying to be enabled to state, from accounts given to us up to the latest moment last evening, that the NOBLE EARL's recovery is now placed beyond a matter of doubt, both speech and action being considerably restored. The particulars of the mode in which his LORDSHIP was attacked, have been laid fully before the public during the week, and after reading the melancholy occurrence, it was hardly to be supposed, that party spirit would have been indulged to such an extent, as to make the distressing affliction the subject for argument, as to the probable and most advisable way of filling the distinguished place in the Administration of the country, held by the Noble Earl. But such has been the case, and from day to day have the columns of the Opposition Journals been filled with conjectures and opinions upon this subject, nominating, with a barbarous want of feeling, and with singular indelicacy, whatever person the fancy of the writer might choose to pitch on, as successor to the Earl, before it could possibly be ascertained how far it was likely his Lordship might sufficiently recover, to reassume the reins of Government. It is unnecessary to comment on this principle, because we feel that its pursuit has naturally disgusted every class of readers. A man more universally venerated than the Earl of LIVERPOOL does not exist; and it is but natural, therefore, to suppose that such an indignity wonld naturally excite the contempt it merits.

We have much pleasure in submitting the following bulletin, which is the last that has been said on the state of his LORDSHIP's health:—

"Fife House, Feb. 24, Half-past Twelve o'Clock.

"Lord LIVERPOOL is quite as well as he was when the last favourable Report was issued, although his Lordship has not had so much sleep during the night."

THE EARL OF GLENGALL,
MR. BALL HUGHES, AND MR. T. RAIKES, versus
THE AGE.

It will have been seen that the actions of these celebrated gentleman, against this Journal, came on in the Court of King's Bench on Tuesday last, the result of which has been, that in the Earl of GLENGALL's case, the defendant has been found Not Guilty; while Mr. HUGHES has obtained 150*l.* damages, and Mr. RAIKES the important sum of forty shillings!

Upon this subject, as we know it is a most ungracious thing to be prolific about one's-self, we shall endeavour to be as brief as possible; but we feel that some observations are necessary. In the very infancy of this paper, the Earl of GLENGALL made it his especial business to cry it down in every society he entered, for no other purpose that we are aware of, than on account of its castigating the vices of fashionable life; and in retaliation for this attempted injury of our property, we are bound to admit that we have handled the peculiarities of the NOBLE LORD, in a rough, and in some instance, illiberal manner—at the same time, we were further wrought to this extreme, by his LORDSHIP having combined, with his two friends here cited, and the Lord BINGHAM, to prosecute the Paper; wisely judging, that, if its proprietor could stand up against their arrayed and collected wisdom, he could not against their collected purse. Our readers will cease to doubt the existence of CONSPIRACY, when they are apprized, that the four actions of these gentlemen were notified to us the same day, three of them in a different legal shape, by the same attorney (not the regular professional adviser to either party), and three of them brought into Court the same day, with the assistance of the same Counsel! Against all this combination, we could only oppose the strength of our opinions in the first instance, and afterwards combat it in Court, to the extent of our means, and by the advice of our counsel. That we were rightly advised, the result has clearly proved; although we are persuaded, had we defended the action of Mr. HUGHES, we should, by the evidence we COULD have adduced, have defeated the main petition of his case. No matter, we are perfectly satisfied with the result, which is far more than can be said, we presume, of our Noble opponents.

We are anxious that the Earl of GLENGALL should not for a moment imagine, we exult over his defeat in this attempt to punish us—indeed we do not—we are glad to have escaped punishment—but truly sorry that his LORDSHIP should have been so ill-advised as to bring, before a tribunal of his country, a few harmless jokes, that could in no respect injure his worldly character. The question having been tried, and the truth of our position having been proved, we do not mean to triumph over a fallen enemy—but, on the contrary, we never again will, from this day, directly or indirectly, aspire to prejudice the NOBLE LORD in worldly opinion, even by the most remote joke, unless his LORDSHIP should again harass us, by vexatious and unnecessary litigation. Having been victorious in this instance, we cannot be supposed now to entertain any latent bile, and expressing therefore every proper regret for past occurrences, we at present take leave of the Earl of GLENGALL.

It is a most fortunate thing for Mr. HUGHES, that we entered into no defence of his action; for if we had been advised to the step, we could have brought some witnesses respecting his quondam Regent Street establishment, who would have given a different colouring to that transaction, to what it received on Tuesday last from the Court, with whom no doubt poor BALL passes off, now, for the most moral and injured man in existence. But let it pass—if it is possible for any thing to have exalted our opinion of Mr. HUGHES's strength of mind, this prosecution has had that effect. We however admit it was culpable in us to circulate so prejudicial a report, as the one of his not having paid for Oatlands—we might just as well have said, he has not paid CROCKFORD.

But the person for whom, in this unfortunate business, we feel most, is Mr. RAIKES, who was most reluctantly drawn into it, by the absurd instigation of others. A harmless plain man, (we mean in habits, as well as face) like him, would, if left to himself, have gone into any other extreme rather than this, for, as it was natural to expect, the result of it will, in all probability, stick to him for life. However opposed to Mr. BROUGHAM we may be in polilics, we have ever entertained the highest respect for his vast legal attainments, which may safely be rated beyond most men in existence; and to no other man could a case of this description be so well entrusted. Above that unfortunate conceit which brought Mr. RAIKES into Court, Mr. BROUGHAM did not hesitate to bring into comparison his own peculiarities as a set off against those, alledged to be the property of the Plaintiff; which is at once the most liberal and most judicious mode of proceeding—the consequence of this admirable defence has been, the most contemptible verdict imaginable, even which would have been in favour of the Defendant, if the charge of the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE had not conveyed an imputation, from us, on Mr. RAIKES's veracity. Poor TOM has therefore to console himself with the possession of 40*s.* damages, for our alleged suspicion of his word, with the surety that the everlasting gaze of mankind will be on him, to ascertain how far Mr. BROUGHAM and ourselves have over, or underrated his scale of beauty. If this subject were to be discussed seriatim, we should feel disposed to comment on Mr. RAIKES, for this last stretch of his folly, in severer strains, than upon any act of his life; for it is indeed painful to think that an old man, nearly sixty years of age, with grown-up daughters just launched into the world, should come before a Court of Law, to claim compensation for being termed UGLY; a charge which, we heartily believe, either of his children would have treated with contempt—but seriousness with him is not our purport at present. We think TOM RAIKES ought to have shown that he has been disappointed in the expectation of possessing some rich heiress, by this horrible charge, or been instrumental in alarming ladies in a certain condition, or exciting a general panic through society—then we should have done him deep injury—but the solid and only proper way to have proved the truth of our remarks, would have been to put TOM-TIT into the witness-box, and then we really think his countenance would have thrown the whole Court into convulsions.

Of Mr. BROUGHAM's masterly defence in this action, it is impossible for language to speak too highly; and the very fear of coming under such a man's irony ought to have induced Mr. RAIKES to have thrown himself over Westminster Bridge, rather than have entered Westminster Hall—and we think he would to do so now, sooner than try the experiment again; but Mr. BROUGHAM's knowledge, eloquence, and satirical powers did not end with poor RAIKES, for he pounced upon SCARLETT like an eagle, and gave him his quietus in a very few minutes. SCARLETT's astonishment, at seeing Mr. BROUGHAM rise up to object to the evidence of one of his witnesses, was greater than any thing of the kind we ever remember. With reference to Mr. SCARLETT (who in all the prosecutions against THE AGE has certainly stuck pretty closely to us), we are much surprised that, as he expressed himself so concerned respecting our charge of mendacity against one of his clients, he did not avoid the possibility of such a charge being made against himself. His account of the former pursuits of the Editor and Proprietor of THE AGE is equally false and malicious; and as he is so extremely anxious to ferret out people's origins, we can with pleasure, if he wishes it, accommodate the good folks of Peterborough with a full account of his. Mr. SCARLETT appeared much annoyed at our killing his client before his time—we are surprised at that, when, as Mr. BROUGHAM so admirably hinted, the very same thing happened to Mr. SCARLETT a year or two since; and the world then spoke quite as much in his favour, as they afterwards did when they found he was alive. Another able part of Mr. BROUGHAM's management of this defence, was directed to a Mr. ROWLEY, attorney in the three actions, who perked himself in the witness-box, with the utmost self-conceit imaginable, to give evidence of his having seen very frequently, in Bond-street, a placard reflecting on his client, Mr. RAIKES—his evidence was laughed at, and so was he himself; and even if Mr. ROWLEY should continue to parade Bond-street, (although we think he had much better stick to his desk in Saville-place,) we shrewdly suspect he will not be over anxious to submit an account of his perambulations before such a man as Mr. BROUGHAM.

In closing our remarks upon these trials and their issue, we have no cause to do otherwise than to congratulate ourselves thereon. The discernment and justice of an English Jury (in each of these instances SELECTED BY THE PLAINTIFFS) has decided, that a Journal is not to be oppressed by every petty complaint which may be brought against it; and consequently that power is not to be compromised, which it ought to possess, of pointing out, with a view to their correction, the many glaring improprieties, vices, and follies so continually practised by the upper orders of society, from whom, as we have urged over and over again, a far different sort of example ought to proceed. This circumstance being now passed, we sincerely hope a better understanding may exist, than has hitherto been the case, between such parties and ourselves—we will endeavour to amuse rather than annoy, if they will give us the opportunity; and with this anxiety, we look for considerable amendment in the circles referred to.

In our last number we made a few hasty observations on the above production; a press of other matter prevented our taking a more comprehensive view of it; as also a desire to abstain from any observations that might by possibility give a bias to the public mind against Mr. SHIEL, previous to a Grand Jury of his country deliberating on its supposed immorality. We have attentively read this production; we have carefully looked back at the conduct of the Catholic Association; the state of Ireland now, and for the last five years; and our firm opinion is, that a more insidious or more inflammatory speech was never uttered by any individual—if its object be not to inflame, we should be glad to know by what process of moral contrariety it can tend to tranquillize? Ireland is at this moment, either generally tranquil, or generally disturbed: this is her position; of the former, how can it be supposed that the eulogised introduction of the life and adventures of the Traitor THEOBALD WOLFE TONE, who had the desperate and unshaken hardihood, thrice to attempt the destruction of the Government of his native country, by means of a French force, be calculated to promote a continuance of that tranquillity? And if the latter, surely this oration cannot tranquillize her; it is worthy of remark how the Catholics of that day are sought to be distinguished from those of the present; and that as the former were indebted for their defeat to the failure of Mr. TONE's expeditions, and the defection of some of their advocates, so the latter might avoid a recurrence of similar misfortunes, by a different line of conduct on the part of their Directors—leaving the mind to draw the obvious conclusion from these premises—that another expedition from a foreign shore, not exposed to the vicissitudes of the winds, but impelled by steam navigation, and perhaps commanded by some other adventurous traitor to his KING and country, may prove more successful in planting the standard of revolution upon the shores of his native soil. The history of this unfortunate and ill-fated rebel is introduced to the Meeting, at which the speech was delivered in rather a curious way—a reference is made by the orator to the lessons of unanimity and general co-operation, so repeatedly inculcated on the popular mind by the noisy leaders of the Association, and the decry of the rebel TONE, published by his son in America, is quoted in proof of the necessity of this conduct, thereby stamp-ng the speeches of the advocates with the authority of a precedent founded upon the advice of a rebel traitor.

So far it is sought to give strength and importance to the speeches of Mr. O'Connell, by showing that he only recommended the avoidance of that line of acting, which Tone had previously reprobated as fatal to their object. It became also necessary, for further effect, to state something about this connection of Mr. Tone—and mark the ungracious spirit of offensiveness in which that statement is made. Mr. Shiel says, "of his character," meaning Tone, "on this occasion, it is not necessary to say any thing, except that he was loved and prized by all those who knew him, and more especially by Mr. Plunkett and Dr. Magee.

Now, if Dr. Magee and Mr. Plunkett had the misfortune of knowing a person whose crimes would have doomed him to the scaffold, had he not anticipated the stroke of the execution by suicide, it is quite enough that they, in common with others, had long since suffered the poignancy of regret for such a connection. Without again feeling the effect of an unnecessary and ungracious allusion to a man whose death was an outrage on Christianity, if Mr. Tone was a man of such respectable connections, why not have named others, that the odium which attended an acquaintance with him might be equally subdivided? No, no; this would not serve the purpose. Mr. Plunkett at the head of the law, and Dr. Magee at the head of the Church in Ireland, were the only two persons that could be found in the wide circle of Mr. Tone's friends, (and according to Mr. Shiel's statement he had many,) fit and proper to be introduced to the public attention. Of Mr. Plunkett we have already spoken—we have repelled the charge of inconsistency, so wantonly flung against him—of his talents, there is but one opinion—of his fidelity to party, there can be no question—of ability to discharge the important duties of his office, all admit—and, as a zealous and steadfast friend, no man stands superior to him. With the name of Dr. Magee, the mind naturally associates every qualification that can possibly adorn so distinguished a supporter of the Church over which he presides—the sanctity of his religious habits, the purity of his morals, his unabated zeal in the great cause of the Protestant Church, justly entitle him to the admiration and gratitude of every friend to the British Constitution. Whether in the pulpit or in the senate, his services are equally valuable; and it is our sincere and ardent wish that he may long preside over that Church whose doctrines he has fearlessly promulgated, and whose institutions he has improved. We hope his pious example will be universally followed, and that every Prelate belonging to the Established Church will as zealously devote their labours to its support as the Archbishop of Dublin.

The speech, after thus identifying these enlightened individuals with the friends of Mr. Tone, next proceeds more fully to detail what the opinion of the unfortunate Diorist was; and the words are, "He states it (meaning Tone) as his conviction, that if, in the embarrassed condition of England, with the prospect of war without, and insurrection within, the Catholics had been firm, the Ministers would have given way, and complete emancipation would have been carried." (Cheers.)—How well the orator knew the palates of his auditory, and the seasoned food to administer to their palates; for, at the conclusion of this sentence, loud cheers followed from every side. And now mark the language in which the impression then made is endeavoured to be more firmly fixed in the minds of the Irish Catholics:—"Whoever reads the political diary of Mr. Tone will be convinced that the men who influence the councils of the Roman Catholics, will only consult their own interest by acting with spirit, energy, and determination; that they must rest upon the people for their exclusive support; that the public passions are "the element wherein they live and have their being;" and that, whenever they listen to the false blandishments of authority, and manifest a willingness to compromise the great, the essential and fundamental rights of their fellow-citizens, they will inevitably prove the dupes of official artifice, and of their own unwise cunning. Here the people of Great Britain are told, in words whose meaning will not admit of even the shadow of ambiguity, that if England should be hereafter engaged in war, and become embarrassed in her condition, or harassed by insurrection at home, then emancipation will be demanded, and if not conceded, will be enforced. The "public passions" are to be appealed to, said Mr. Shiel, because "they are the element wherein they live and have their being."

We implore Mr. Shiel to consider the nature of the elements to which the appeal is to be made; is it to be a rash, infuriated, and misguided rabble, the justice or impolicy of the great question of Catholic Emancipation is to be submitted for consideration, is the decision of the Legislature of these realms to be reviewed by a lawless mob, or the fundamental principles of the British constitution to be prostrated at the feet of anarchy and revolution? He who looses the winds of Heaven can alone direct the storm—we admire a sober and legitimate appeal to the public voice as much as Mr. Shiel; we know she is a chaste monitor—we defer to her judgments and appreciate her admonitions; she punishes slowly, yet effectually; but when she forgets her duty, she becomes dangerous—licentiousness leads on to crime; crimes become multiplied, and from chastity, she degenerates into delinquency, leaving her victims to suffer all the penalties of their transgressions. We come now to a passage in the speech of Mr. Shiel, which, for the sake of religion, morality, and every Christian virtue, we wish had been omitted; it is by way of a solemn thanksgiving to Heaven, in order to render it still more imposing; judge how the Deity is invoked; the awful Majesty of the most high and the most just God, called upon to accept the unfeigned thanks of the orator of the Catholic Association; wherein he says, "But I thank God, that the admonitions, given in Wolfe Tone's diary of our cause, are now unnecessary." This is really too gross an insult to the Omnipotent Disposer of all human events to offer Him thanks, not for his gracious and merciful interposition in saving the country from the machinations of the evil minded Tone, but that the people were now more fitted for a similar experiment to be practised upon them, by some more desperate character—that in fact they had become systematically and generally organized: that the Catholic Aristocracy were now above the suspicion of defection: that their co-operation in the great cause was a matter of certainty: that the result of such an union of strength and principle would be finally to dissolve the bond of connection between the two countries, and thus afford England a melancholy proof of the alleged impolicy of her administration—but the orator is not satisfied with this pious offering of his gratitude to Heaven for so great a blessing—he feels it necessary to proceed further and to inform the supporters of the Constitution, "that they ought to look pale in turning over the memoirs of Tone;" thereby insinuating that in those very memoirs they may read a warning lesson; which may teach them how dangerous it is for the Legislature any longer to deny unqualified concession of religious and political power to the Catholics of Ireland. From this address to the "Ascendancy," he next appeals to the Cabinet, and in language not to be misunderstood, says, "I could fain commend them (meaning the Memoirs) to the nocturnal vigils of the Cabinet: and if there be any man who, in reading what I say, shall be disposed to smile (for what I say is meant for the whole country, and will reach far beyond the walls of this contracted room), I would bid that sardonic reader to recollect, that a fleet composed of seventeen sail of the line, with fifteen thousand Frenchmen on board, an immense port of artillery, and fifty thousand stand of arms to supply the population, ought to awake reflections of which scorn should not constitute a part."—This was followed by cheers. Let us ask why was it applauded. Was it because it was a pretence of the past, intended to serve as an archetype of the future: we fully agree with the popular speaker in recommending the diary of Mr. Tone to the serious consideration of the British Cabinet: we would also recommend, like him, the vital necessity of unanimity and general co-operation. Mr. Tone imputed the failure of his evil designs upon the Government of his native country to a want of union and support on the part of the people: we anxiously look forward to see that line of policy pursued by the Cabinet of England, which will effectually secure the British nation against the machinations of the successors of that unfortunate individual.

Hitherto the speaker had only stated what had been done, and what might hereafter be done under particular circumstances: he now proceeds to tell his auditory by what financial and other arrangements Mr. Tone had proceeded upon his plan. He first transplants him to America, with a wife and two children. The soil of republicanism appeared, however, too poor to sustain this political glutton, and, after spending seven-eights of his portable income, he takes shipping for France, in order to improve his destinies; he arrived there 1st February, 1796, as stated, and proceeded direct to Paris. A new scene now opens upon our view———

A Correspondent informs us that Tom Raikes was complaining to Alvanley, that, since his trial in the Court of King's Bench, every one he met stared him out of countenance—to which Alvanley replied, "Well, according to Brougham's account, you ought to be very much obliged to them."

We have not time to refer, but we think this is an old joke of ours upon Lord Kinnoul. No matter; we give Tom the benefit of it.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

This class of literature has got into such repute within the last year or two, that it may be said to form the principal feature in the lucubrations of the reading part of the community. Like every other mania, with which our countrymen become afflicted, it has been most woefully abused; but, making allowances for those visitations on our patience and credulity, which the carpe diem principle of daily and obscure scribes is sure to bring about, we are free to include ourselves amongst those who have derived much gratification from a perusal of some of the "Memoirs," which have lately been submitted to public opinion.

Our attention has been directed to a consideration of this subject, by one of the most ignorant and insulting articles, on the same point, in the last Quarterly Review, that ever came under our observation; in which no line of distinction is drawn between the productions of distinguished literary men, and a common murderer and highwayman, some time since executed in Edinburgh. This article is understood to be the production of that exquisite coxcomb, Mr. J. Lockhart, lately imported from the North to edit the Representative newspaper, and who failing in that, has aspired to fill the chair of the late illustrious Mr. Gifford. By this beauty we are told, that the autobiographists of the present day are men without the pale of society, and that "people have themselves to blame for admitting the companionship, on any terms, of farcewrights and professional buffoons!" Let us "talk a word with this same learned Theban."

Among the late principal productions, in this department of literature, may be enumerated, Mr. Moore's Life of Sheridan—(faulty enough we admit—but written by one of the first poets that ever lived.) The Lives of Mr. Kemble and Mrs. Siddons, by Mr. Boaden, an acknowledged gentleman and a scholar; The Memoirs of Kelly, understood to be edited by Mr. Theodore Hook, certainly the most extraordinary wit and genius of this or any other age; The Life and Times of Reynolds, by himself, who is allowed to be one of the most humourous and talented dramatists ever before the public; and, soon to be added to the list, is The Life of George Colman, a man on whose extraordinary wit and acquirements, and on whose companionable qualities and incessant humour, Princes, Nobles, and Gentles, have dwelt for years in admiration. These, to say nothing of names of minor consideration, are classed, by this scribbling Narcissus, in common with ephemeral accounts of pickpockets and vagabonds, whose notoriety always procures some kind of writer to commemorate their crimes and profligacy.

In one point of view, we are disposed to discuss this matter seriously, and consequently to express our regret that a publisher, like Mr. Murray, should have allowed such an article to emanate from his house, reflecting, as it does, on men whose rank and genius he must know, although his stripling Editor may affect not to—and then militating, as it must, against the interests of a rival publisher, by whom the greatest part of these works have been brought forth. A more liberal patron of our current literature than Mr. Colburn does not exist, or one whose gentlemanly manners, and punctuality in business, have rendered more generally liked; and it is therefore a reflection, of no enviable character, on Mr. Murray, that he can permit an attack of this description to be made on the property of a contemporary bibliopolist, for displaying a generosity in his purchases, which he himself has not the spirit to do.

To the young gentleman who has been propagating all this, we shall speak with less reserve. One would have supposed that a person so tenacious respecting his own literary character, as this man Lockhart has proved himself, (a tenacity which led to the unfortunate death of that lamented and talented individual, Mr. Scott), would have paid a little more regard to the feelings of others, and not have dealt out this quantity of abuse and ignorance, without drawing at least a proper line of distinction. It is barely credible that the said Lockhart is ignorant of the fact of the gentlemen, enumerated above, moving in the highest circles of association in this country, and entitled so to do, whether as respects their education, their rank in life, their manners, or their acquirements; and the character of English society must have arrived at a pretty pass, if, in this account, its respectability is to be questioned by such a presumptuous intruder on our literary elite, as this man has proved himself to be.

Independent of every other consideration, there is nothing in this young gentleman's pretensions that can persuade us he is not far more fitted for executing the duties of the toilet than the study, more particularly (to adopt the phraseology of a well-known writer on his qualifications) as "he labours under the dark insinuation of wearing a frogged coat;" and in referring to the writings of another person—Mr. Lindley Murray—which he has equally traduced, we can only say, that it would have been highly desirable if, in taking upon himself the editorship of the Quarterly Review, he had made himself much better acquainted with the works of this English philosopher, than his exhibited ignorance of grammar and history convince us he has done.

"And now," Mr. Lockhart, "to breakfast, with what appetite you may."

LETTERS OF TON, No. VII.

FROM T. R. ESQ., AT OATLANDS, TO HIS FRIEND, THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF G———, Lower Grosvenor-street, London.

Dear Dick,
I have seized the first moment, to say
The "Circle" down here are in monstrous dismay,
At learning the news from the Court of King's Bench,
(Which horrible place,—when detailing in French
To pauvre Madame an account of it all—
Le banc du Palais Ball Hughes happened to call)
Lady B. and myself have been laying together
Our heads, for the purpose of settling, whether (Considering all that has passed) 'twould be better,
To give you a call, or to send you a letter;
—The first, from regard to the state of your health—
—The next, from regard to the state of your wealth—
But postage from Oatlands will go little way
To increase the expences you now have to pay;
And therefore accept, without grudging the cost,
This "Address of Condolence," for what you have lost:
Though I feel, entre nous, that you need not repine,
For, whatever it is, it cannot equal mine!
Consider, dear Dick, how this blow may undo
All the plans and arrangements I had in my view;
Imprimis, I feel I can ne'er shew my face
In the Regent's Park, where I have purchased a place—
Besides, I had reckoned the "damages" would Have furnished the house, as a gentleman should;

(Which though ALVANLEY once or twice hinted to you
As an en-passant joke, yet by G—— it is true.)
The "Trial by Jury" let none say a word of,
For a much greater humbug there never was heard of,
When on your libelled truth, they no damages set,
And on my libelled beauty—£2 only—net!*
Of the case to JOE COPLEY I casually spoke,
Who, as usual, threw in a d——d "Joe Miller joke,"
"Never mind, my old buck, like the girl in the play,
"That your 'face is your fortune' you never can say."
It is clear 'gainst us both MASTER BALL has the jest,
As being best off, although "bad is the best."
They were fools that, in his case, they did not subpœna
His sister, my dear LADY B., for between her
And poor Madame HUGHES, they'd have easily shown
BALL sent off her maid, when MADAME did her own;
And when LADY B. writes to SIR JOHN, and complains,
SIR JOHN sends back word, "you're a fool for your pains."
Adieu, my dear DICK, this long terrible bout
Of sickness you've had, makes us very much doubt,
(However your wishes may that way incline)
If you'll e'er be remembered at all in your line.†
BALL begs me to add, if you're hard up for cash,
Or, as SHAKSPEARE says, "who steals you're purse, will steal trash,"
The loan of his verdict you gladly may claim,
The instant that RICHARDS remits him the same!!
Let us hear from you shortly, for all of our sakes,
And believe me,
Yours, vastly annoyed.
T. R——s.

P. S. I have not to the City since been,
And am reckless if in it I'm e'er again seen—
For, from what they all read about Russia, they call
The place I have got in the Park—Tallow HALL!
Thus, from the East to the West I am so much perplexed,
And with every one's jokes so infernally vexed,
When I think of what "damage" they happened to give
I shall only say "damn AGE" as long as I live!
Oatlands, T. R.
Wednesday, February 21, 1827.

NOTES BY THE EDITOR.

* We really think a merchant, in writing to a Nobleman, should sink the SHOP.

† Has not Mr. R—— borrowed this idea from Lord BYRON, who, by the bye, borrowed the idea from SHAKSPEARE—"hailed him father to a line, &c. &c.

BLASPHEMY.

A wretch, by the name of the Reverend ROBERT TAYLOR, who has been for some time past endeavouring to thrust himself on public notice by outrageous language and conduct, has been this last week committed by the LORD MAYOR, (and subsequently bailed) to take his trial on a charge of blasphemy, contained in his addresses to a set of vagabonds, denominating themselves the CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE SOCIETY. We some time since hinted at the necessity of a stop being put to these infamous proceedings, and highly must we extol the CHIEF MAGISTRATE for his praise-worthy conduct: but we must beg leave to differ with HIS LORDSHIP, in the view taken by him, when he requested the particulars of the evidence, on which this fellow was taken up, might not be made public by the press, owing to its dangerous doctrine. We think that a proper exposition, now its consequences have been partially visited on the chief offender, may awaken the followers of such a specious brute as this TAYLOR, to a sense of their danger, and be the means of correcting a fatal bias, particularly in young minds—and with this view alone, do we submit the following specimen of unprecedented outrage on the RELIGION OF THE COUNTRY:—

Wilson, Ward Beadle of Walbrook, stated, that on the evening of the 6th inst., he went into the Areopagus; he paid for admission a shilling. He was in the lower part; the galleries were crowded with a number of persons, of whom many were young. There was a person in the Chair, who announced the subject of debate for the night, to be a reply to the defence of Christianity, written by the Rev. Dr. Chalmers. The audience applauded throughout. When Mr. Taylor sat down, the Chairman rose, and asked if there were any one to argue against the Rev. Doctor? After the Chairman had made this offer, the Rev. Robert Fletcher was called on by name to advance, and defend Christianity, but no reply was made. The Chairman then gave out the subject of the next meeting, which, he said, would be advertised in the Examiner of Sunday following. I saw the announced advertisement. It stated, that the discussion of the 13th instant, would be on the character of our Divine Redeemer, as published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. This advertisement was signed "Robert Taylor, 17, Carey-street, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields." In consequence of this advertisement, the witness went again on the 13th instant to the Areopagus. He went into the gallery in the course of the evening, there were present about 300 persons. In the gallery were 20 or 30 females, of 15 or 16 years old, and several boys, who appeared to be only 11 or 12, and they seemed principally brought there by elder persons. The same Chairman presided as on a former evening. Mr. Taylor read what appeared to witness a small tract, descriptive of the character of our Saviour; which was to be, he said, the subject of that evening's discussion: he then spoke for nearly an hour: in the course of his oration he quoted the well-known lines from Hamlet as applied to the Redeemer:—

"Be thou a spirit of health or goblin damned," &c.

Talking of the incongruities which he declared existed between the Gospel of John, and those of the other three Evangelists, the prisoner had said they formed as heterogeneous a mixture, as if a horse's head were placed on a fish's body. Taylor, adverting to the marriage at Canaan, called it a drunken feast. The prisoner contrasted the dying moments of our Saviour with what he called the triumphant deaths of Voltaire and Talma. When Taylor sat down, the Chairman put the question, "whether the character of Christ was a good or bad one?" About twenty persons held up their hands for the former, and at least eighty or ninety for the latter, which the Chairman declared carried; on which there was a great deal of shouting and clapping of hands.

After a perusal of this, there surely cannot be found many persons in existence, who will not compliment the LORD MAYOR on the excellent principle he has thus held forth, of punishing to the utmost these various impostors who are going about, in the hope of enriching themselves, by selling, to everlasting perdition the souls of their fellow-creatures.

A NOBLEMAN'S MEMS. OF THE LAST WEEK.

Read GARTH'S trial—find Sir JACOB got "a little shilling" damages—BALL HUGHES says "its half-price into the pit at Astley's"—Overheard DOCTOR —— tell JOE COPLEY that Lord LIVERPOOL was not quite restored to his senses, upon which JOE exclaimed, "can't thou not minister to a mind diseased"—Understand Mr. PEEL is going to be made a PEER—reminded of the song,

White's, SATURDAY AFTERNOON. N.

We understand, that if Mr. ROWLEY (of the firm of ROWLEY, CAPRON, and WELD, attornies against us in the late trials) had not been so soon set down by Mr. BROUGHAM in the witness box, he intended to have sang A SONG to the Court, descriptive of the origin and progress of these actions, and the following may be considered an authentic copy of the same:—

AIR.—A frog he would a wooing go.

A LORD he would a sueing go,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
Because his mother would make him do so,
With his ROWLEY, powly,
Gammon, and spinnage,
"Heigho, said MISTER JOHN ROWLEY!

He drove to George street, Hanover square,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
To talk with TOM RAIKES, who was coming from there,
With his ROWLEY, powly, &c.

Down they went to Oatlands Hall,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
To get the assistance of Mr. HUGHES BALL,
And his ROWLEY, powly, &c.

In close consultation they sat down all three,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
When TOM begg'd to call in his friend LADY B.
With his ROWLEY. powly, &c.

"I give you my word," said the LORD in a quake,
"Higho," said ROWLEY!
"You give us," said she, "what the Age would'nt take,"
With your ROWLEY, powly, &c.

Says BALL, "they allege I my maid keep, my dear,"
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
LADY B. said "your wife would not let her keep, here,"
With your ROWLEY, powly, &c.

Says TOM, (to the Lady) almost in a swoon,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
"They say I'm as ugly, love, as a baboon,"
With my ROWLEY, powly, &c.

"Indeed," said the LADY, "how painful to you!"
"Heigho'" said ROWLEY!
"But what they have said, is most certainly true,"
With your ROWLEY, powly, &c.

Then off they all set, in a giffey, to town,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
And very soon after, each cause was set down,
By their ROWLEY, powly, &c.

The trials came on, and the first was soon tried,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
But they gave the LORD—nothing! who "costs" paid, beside,
To his ROWLEY, powly, &c.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY, off Mr. BALL bore,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
For which he may keep half a dozen maids more,
With his ROWLEY, powly, &c.

Then came TOMMY RAIKES, but so weak were his grounds,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
They awarded his beauty—a couple of pounds!
For his ROWLEY, powly, &c.

They each seem'd to think they had paid pretty dear,
"Heigho," said ROWLEY!
So they all left the Court, with a flea in their ear,
With their ROWLEY, powly,
Gammon and spinage,
"Heigho," said MISTER JOHN ROWLEY!

THEATRICALS.

Miss BROTHERS has made her appearance this last week at Drury-lane Theatre, selecting Mrs. Haller as her character of debût, and that of Desdemona, for her second appearance---the last of which selections was much more judicious than the former. This young lady has not too many requisites for the line of life she has entered upon, though she possesses one, of whose superior quality, she is either not aware, or does not know how to avail herself---we mean, her voice, than which few have a much finer. We have always entered our protest, and always shall, against the introduction of novices on the metropolitan stage, which should be exclusively considered the College, and not the school, of the Drama---and we have seen few debutantes, who have proved the truth of this opinion more forcibly than Miss BROTHERS. She has some good qualifications for the formation of an actress of superior calibre, but those qualifications require that cultivation, which practice and experience can alone give them, and which practice and experience can alone be well learnt in a provincial theatre; let them afterwards come to London for refinement and due appreciation. We mean not a syllable unkindly to Miss BROTHERS, when we say, she is totally unfit at present for the support of any particular line of business at either of the national theatres; but while we are compelled so to express ourselves conscientiously, we are assured that two or three years' gradation in the country will render her a most acceptable and talented actress.

Miss PATON has returned from her Irish excursion, apparently full of health; and by all accounts full of money—we saw her in the Oracle, on Tuesday last, and were highly delighted with her, though we cannot say as much for this second exhibition we have seen of this opera. We were present, on its production in the summer, at the English Opera House, and were pleased---its transplantation was in our opinion quite unnecessary, and its general effect not half as good. Were there no other drawback, the Rocca of Mr. SERLE would be quite enough, which is many, many degrees beneath the performance of the same character by Mr. PERKIN, on whom, by pure mistake; we were unfortunate enough to fix the name of Gerkin. But the production of this opera is only one, among the many instances, which has displayed the incapacity of the present Covent Garden management, which we regret to hear is completely hors de combat—indeed, so much so, that it is understood Mr. C. KEMBLE has altogether retired from it, and certainly, except that were the case, nothing else could justify his absence from London. We have so often had to expatiate on the inability of this cabinet, which the genius of Sir SNUFFLE SHUFFLE does not appear to have enlightened, that we forbear to say more at present—and only sincerely hope that on the termination of the approaching cause in the Court of Chancery, the parties will petition Mr. HARRIS to resume the management; for which his long experience, his urbanity of manners, his appreciation by every member of the profession, his long head and his good heart so eminently qualify him. We shall then have men and things once again in their proper places—but never till then.

Since the publication of our last number, we find that YATES has yielded once more to the solicitations of the Parisian Nobility, and has so much charmed the Duke of ORLEANS, that his Highness has naturalized him, procured him the Star of the Legion of Honour, and that he has been eventually appointed Ambassador to this Court, to succeed the Prince POLIGNAC, for which purpose he landed at Dover this last week, with Mrs. YATES, under a salute from the batteries. If he looks sharp, and is not too much infatuated with Gallic honours, he may stand a chance of succeeding Lord AMHERST, as Governor General of India. This is all as it should be. We are glad to hear that LAPORTE'S talent is very highly appreciated by the Dublin people, which is the more valuable, as "by my sowl, they know what's what." In addition to this information we find that Miss FOOTE hos cleared 300*l*. at Portsmouth, and that partridges are selling for 1*s*. 6*d*. a couple in the same town—from which it would appear that game is just now very plentiful at Portsmouth---all of which excellent news we are very glad to hear.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS—FEB. 19.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented several petitions against further concessions to the Roman Catholics.

The Earl of Kingston and the Earl of Limerick presented several petitions praying for the removal of Catholic disabilities.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE presented various petitions against any alteration in the Corn Laws. The Noble Earl also presented a petition from Belfast, praying for means to enable the poor of that town to emigrate to Canada.

The Duke of Athol and Lord Teynham presented petitions against any alteration in the Corn Laws.—These petitions were ordered to lie on the table.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 22.

THE CORN QUESTION.

Earl BATHURST rose to move the discharge of the order for summoning their Lordships on Monday, on the Earl of Liverpool's motion respecting the Corn Laws. Though it was necessary that any measure on this subject should originate in the other House of Parliament, yet his Noble Friend had thought it incumbent on him to avail himself of the earliest opportunity of explaining to their Lordships the nature and extent of a measure of so much importance as that which was to be brought forward. His Noble Friend had hoped by that explanation to have allayed that degree of irritation, and to have arrested that conflict which exists between two great national interests now unjustly set in array against each other. Unfortunately, the illness of his Noble Friend made it impossible for him to bring the subject forward as he had intended. Under these circumstances, therefore, he should move that the order be now discharged.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE had not the slightest wish to oppose the discharge of the order; but he could not refrain from expressing his sincere regret at the cause of its being recinded. As a public man, there was no one whose character stood higher; and he was convinced that that House and the country looked up to him as the person most likely to succeed in reconciling the present apparently conflicting interests. With regard to his conduct in that House, no opponent had ever been more fair in argument than the Noble Lord. He should be extremely sorry if the Noble Lord should be lost to his private friends, even if, unfortunately, the attack he had sustained should deprive the public of his valuable services. With respect to the course to be pursued, it was probable that he should think fit to move certain resolutions. Whether any future inquiry should be limited in the way the Noble Lord suggested, or should be more extended, there would be sufficient time to consider. The question was one

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

TUESDAY, Feb. 27.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN postponed his motion on the Catholic Question from the 8th to the 15th of March.

Several petitions against further concessions to the Catholics from West Farley, Littledale, Sundal, Rye Dock, Bunton, and other places in Kent; from the clergy of the Archdeaconry of Wells, and from several parishes in Devonshire, were read and laid on the table; as were petitions in favour of them from numerous parishes in Ireland. Lord Clifden, in presenting the latter, said that this was, he believed, almost the only country in Europe in which such laws were still in existence. He must except one; we had an ally in our intolerance in Ferdinand, that famous worker of petticoats.

The following petitions against any alteration in the Corn Laws were presented:—Eighteen from parishes in the East Riding of Yorkshire; from Langon, and other places in the county of Lincoln: from Dorchester, Binfield, Longfield, and other places in the county of Oxford; from Brandon; from Cambridge; from the county of Durham; from certain landowners of Kingston; from Barham, Bouden, Wickham, and other parishes in Kent; and from Newton Ferrars, Ulverston, &c.

Lord TEYNHAM called on their Lordships to resist any alteration, for it had been hatched and brooded by the French Revolution, the commencement of which was introduced by the calling for a free trade in corn, and by a free trade in corn the advocates of that Revolution hoped to overturn the Altar and annihilate the Throne. At these sacred institutions the attacks were in reality directed, and he called energetically on their Lordships to resist them.

Petitions for a repeal of the Corn Laws were presented from the merchants, householders, and inhabitants of the borough of Southwark; from the Anti-Bread Tax Association No. 85; from the cloth-manufacturers of Burley in Gloucestershire; from weavers in Forfarshire; from the clergy, gentlemen, and manufacturers of Blackburn, and from manufacturers of Ripon.

The Earl of MACCLESFIELD presented petitions fromseveral places in Oxfordshire praying that the Winchester measure might be restored.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE presented a petition from the Magistrates of Bury St. Edmund's praying for a repeal of the Game Laws; and immediately afterwards drew their Lordships' attention to the motion of which he had given notice for a revision of those laws. He stated, that he did not expect that the alterations he had in view would remove at once the grievous evils of the present system, but he was sure if a change were made consonant with the feelings of the people, such a change as he meant to propose would tend to the ultimate removal of all the evils of those laws. He was a land-owner, fond of field sports, and anxious to avoid any thing that might put an end to sporting habits, as tempting gentlemen to reside on their estates. But if that could not be attained without a continuance of the Game Laws, in his opinion the advantage was too dearly bought. His Lordship then went into the particulars of his intended Law, pointing out many absurdities which now existed. Although an advocate for making the sale of game legal, that alone was not sufficient, because the qualifications to kill game must be greatly altered. He next came to a branch of the subject of great importance; he saw no reason why, having the property of the game, landlords should not also have the power of selling it. He was, however, free to admit, that, for some years, such permission to sell game might have an injurious effect; for which reason he should propose, by a clause in his Bill, to enable Magistrates to licence persons to sell game. These were the heads of the first Act he should propose. His second would be directed against persons who should go out at night, armed, to kill game. The Noble Lord, after reminding their Lordships of the crowded state of the gaols for offences under the Game Laws, and of the general impression upon the public mind, that the deteriorated state of the morals of the people was ascribable principally to those laws, contended that every man must concur with him that those laws required amendment. It was high time that some measures should be taken to improve the moral state of society. He should, with that object, propose the repeal of the 57th Geo. III. commonly called, "Mr. Bankes's Act," on account of the extreme severity of punishment which it affixed to the offence of poaching—namely, transportation. One consequence of that severity was, to induce Jurors to forget their duty and acquit guilty persons. His proposed Bill would give to magistrates the power to punish summarily, by three months' imprisonment and hard labour, for the first offence; by six months' imprisonment and hard labour, a second offence: but that for a third offence, the party should be sent before a jury, and if convicted, punished as a felon, by transportation. In every case, whether a first offence or not, when violence should be used towards a gamekeeper, he should propose that the offender should be tried and punished as a felon. He should introduce into his Bill a clause to enable magistrates to hold offenders to bail. These were the provisions of his Bills; and he entreated for them the fullest consideration of their Lordships.

The Earl of MALMESBURY feared the rendering game property would increase poaching, the increase of which of late years was to be found in the want of employment.

Lord Teynham, Earls Hardwick and Carnarvon, and Lord Clifden, spoke in favour of inquiry.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN said he should vote for the second reading of the Bills. In the mean time he moved for returns calculated to shew the connexion between the crime of poaching and the other offences which had crowded our prisons to an overflow.—Ordered.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE then introduced his two Bills, which were read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday the 13th.

Their Lordships then adjourned to Thursday.

THURSDAY, March 1.

CATHOLIC CLAIMS.

Lord ROLLE presented petitions from Great Torrington and its vicinity; from St. Stephen's, Exeter; from various parishes in the county of Devon, and St. Mary's, Exeter, against granting any further concessions to the Roman Catholics.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition to the same effect, from Newcastle-under-Lyme, in Staffordshire. The petition was signed very numerously, but as a great part of the signatures were upon a separate sheet, he should present the petition as that of the persons who signed the first sheet. He also presented a similar petition from a parish in the county of Southampton.

The Bishop of EXETER presented petitions to the same effect from the Archdeacons and clergy of the Archdeaconry of the city of Exeter; and from the Ministers, churchwardens, &c. of the parishes of St. Paul and All-Hallows in the Wall, in Exeter.

Lord MAYNARD presented a petition from a place in the county of Essex, against the Roman Catholic claims.

Petitions in favour of the Roman Catholic claims were presented by the Earl of Rosslyn, from the parish of St. Andrew, Dublin, and from a parish in Galway; and by Earl Spencer from certain inhabitants of the town of Northampton. The noble earl stated, that 20 years ago a man would have been hooted at who said any thing in favour of the Cathols, but, thank God, the absurd cry of "No Popery" was now not listened to.

Lord ROLLE presented a petition from a parish in Devonshire, against alterations in the corn-laws.

The Earl of MALMESBURY presented a petition to the same effect from Wellingborough, in Northamptonshire, in which the number of acres that each petitioner owned or occupied was attached to his signature; also petitions to the same effect from parishes in Norfolk.

Lord GOWER presented a petition from the town and neighbourhood of Newport against alterations in the Corn Laws.

FRIDAY, March 2.

Lord KING said, if it was necessary for any persons who lived by their industry to come forward and demand justice in the matter of the Corn Laws, it was not less necessary that they should do so, after what had been divulged within the last 24 hours. In a petition he had to present, the petitioners begged their Lordships would enable them to live by their labour. They said, the cause of their suffering was the Corn Laws. All was to be attributed to the Corn Laws. They limited trade, and limited food. He knew there were many persons who wished to make it appear that no difference existed in the interests of the manufacturer and the corn grower, but it was nothing more nor less than a contest between high rents and the suffering industry of the country. If Parliament enacted any thing like the resolutions and duties he had heard proposed elsewhere, the hands of that House would be on every man, and they must expect in return that every man's hand would be lifted against them. The Noble Lord concluded his remarks by presenting a Petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of the City of London in Common Council assembled against the present state of the Corn Laws, as the cause of the misfortunes of the country. The Noble Lord also presented a similar petition from Ratray, in Perthshire.—The petitions were severally received, and laid on the table.

Earl BATHURST moved an Address to his Majesty, for the second and third Reports of the Commissioners of Inquiry into the Administration of Criminal Justice in the West Indies.—Agreed to.

The Noble Earl then gave notice that it was his intention to bring in a bill for the better Administration of Justice in the Colonies.

Lord MALMESBURY, adverting to returns laid on the table respecting the price of grain in foreign countries, said, he could not find any return from the British Consuls at the ports in the Black Sea. He considered the returns from that part of the world most important. There was another part of the Mediterranean, namely, Alexandria, from which no return had been made. He also thought the House ought to have before it the price of corn at Odessa. The Noble Lord at the same time took the opportunity of saying, with respect to the Resolutions in another place, that he should prefer prohibitions rather than fixed duties. He did not wish to enter upon the subject then; but they had no opportunity of hearing the Resolutions regularly read, and therefore could not enter into a discussion before the Bill came from the other House. The Noble Lord concluded by moving for a return of all the information received from ports on the Black Sea, relative to the price of corn.

Lord REDESDALE, in a speech of considerable length, contended that the present distress of the country was in no measure owing to the Corn Laws. After some further conversation, the House adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Feb. 26.

MONDAY, Feb. 26.

EMIGRATION.

Mr. W. HORTON presented a Report from the Emigration Committee, containing a resolution that they were not prepared now to advise a general system of Emigration, even though it was submitted, the private aids would be afforded. The Committee had deemed it right to make this Report thus early, because from what had heretofore been said, of the readiness to advance private and parish Funds, it might be supposed that there were no other obstacles to the adoption of a system of Emigration.—Report ordered to be printed.

BRIBERY AT ELECTIONS.

Lord ALTHORP, on the resumption of the debate on his resolution, that a Committee be appointed, to whom should be referred Petitions on Corruption said, it was notorious there were many Boroughs in which bribery notoriously existed; where 5l. 10l. 20l. and 30l. a man were given for votes. There were laws he admitted, but the corruption continued; the remedy however, of throwing open Boroughs had been found effectual. The object of this resolution was to make discoveries of the "head money" system more frequent. The proposed Committee was for Petitions alleging corruption generally; to ascertain whether there was any case for the consideration of the House. He thought it very desirable that some measure should be adopted, to prevent these disgraceful practices, which did any thing but reflect credit on the House.

Mr. L. FOSTER said, there could be no doubt that corruptions at Elections ought to be prevented; but here extensive and important alterations were proposed. If a case could now be made, in every instance he thought the House would be fully and actively disposed to promote and encourage inquiry. (Hear.) Grampound proved it; efficacious remedies did exist. (Hear.) It was best to leave the power to the House. The proposed plan would raise painful and odious distinctions. Who would like to be on the proposed standing Committee? Those who would like it would be the most unfit for it; and as there was no over-ruling necessity for the plan, why adopt it! It was also objectionable, having an ex-parte character; but he did not think any alteration necessary for the investigation of complaints respecting bribery and corruption.

Lord J. RUSSELL had hoped that the proposition now made would have been unanimously agreed to, the form being most unobjectionable. More efficient remedies were requisite. The proposition of his Noble Friend was not to appoint a judicial Committee, but a Committee of Inquiry. They were not to have power in any way to inculpate the conduct of any Member, though there might be such delinquency proved against the Borough as to cause its disfranchisement. Although the House had proceeded to inquiry and punishment in the case of Grampound, yet it was not till half the electors had been convicted of bribery in a court of law, and was no proof that the same course would be followed in any ordinary case. He thought it was a great advantage that the Committee should be a standing Committee, rather than be appointed to investigate the case of each particular Borough, as the proposed form would effectually guard against partiality. He was aware with what difficulty any improvement coming from his side of the House would be received. It was quite easy for a Minister to come down to the House with improvements of the law; he was certain of support from a great majority, many of whom, but ten years ago, were ready to denounce, as Jacobins, those who promised the same measures, and supported them with the best arguments. (Hear, hear.) Very different was the fate of him who proposed any improvement from his unfortunate side of the House. He was continually baffled by objections and delays from the other side of the House, till at length, wearied out, he, in despair, submitted to the continuance of bribery and corruption. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. R. PALMER said he was requested to state a fact which took place on every general election at a borough in his neighbourhood. The Hon. Gentleman read an extract from a letter which stated that when the time for presenting a petition against the election was expired, a miller went round and delivered a parcel containing 20l. to each of the electors. This he thought ought to be put a stop to in some way. (Loud cries of hear.)

Sir JOHN NEWPORT said it was the unanimous profession of the House to be desirous of putting an end to the bribery and corruption that notoriously existed in returning Members of that House. He had fourteen years ago proposed what he conceived would be found the only effectual remedy; that was, that instead of making the electors take the bribery oath, that oath should be taken by the elected at the table of the House, and if the House was really in earnest to prevent bribery, and preserve its own honour, they would agree to such a bill, and he pledged himself to bring such a Bill into the House.

Mr. PEEL said, as the Right Hon. Gentleman had promised to bring in a better measure than that now proposed by the Noble Lord, he would resist the present measure, to give the House an opportunity of considering the Right Hon. Baronet's. He had to acknowledge with gratitude the support he had received from both sides of the House in his endeavours to improve the laws, but he could not agree in the censures that had been bestowed on his side of the House of opposing improvement. He hoped no man in the House would stand up in the support of bribery and corruption, but he thought they should take time to consider the details of the proposed remedy before its adoption. He still thought that the House should procced by Bill rather than by Resolutions. The Resolutions stated that the Committee was to report its opinion on ex-parte evidence, which would have a great effect on the opinion of the House. According to the Resolutions of the Noble Lord every complaint of every man against any Borough was to be referred to this Committee, without incurring any responsibility. He was not to give any security that he would proceed to prosecute his petition, but say to any Member that he had such a case against him, and invite a compromise. If the case of bribery stated by the Hon. Member was proved at the bar of the House, he for one would give his vote for punishing the parties concerned. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. R. MARTIN said he felt himself bound to support the Resolutions of the Noble Lord. He would however recommend to the Noble Lord to withdraw his Resolutions for the present, for the purpose of conferring with those Members on his side the House who were willing to prevent the existence of the practice. But why confine the operation of the Resolutions to Boroughs, when it was notorious that corruption was infinitely more atrocious. He could state, and was ready to prove, that an Under Secretary of State went into a County and opened a bank for the payment of all the expenses of a Candidate whom he called his man; who paid all his expenses, promised offices to his supporters, and even promised a Peerage. He would prove these facts before a Committee, so help him God. The person who did this was the Marquis of Clanricarde, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and he would within a month prove the facts before a Committee, and apply for a special Report against the Marquis of Clanricarde. (Hear, and laughter.)

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he knew nothing of the election for Galway, but he hoped the House would suspend their judgment against the Noble Marquis, who had been accused by the Hon. Gent. when they knew that that Hon. Gent. was petitioned against himself, and that it was alleged he would be proved to have been guilty of every offence which it was possible for a candidate to commit. (Hear, and laughter.)

Lord MILTON said he agreed with the Member for Galway, that it would be an improvement to have included counties in the Resolutions. He was confident, however, after what had taken place in that House that night, it was impossible they could stop short. The corruption that had been stated to have taken place at a Borough, which, though not named, was probably known, and must be inquired into.

Mr. W. WYNN read a Resolution, giving twenty-eight days, after the payment of any money as bribery at election, to present a petition to inquire into the same, which, he said, he was ready to move, if it was the pleasure of the House.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE said, the Resolution was one very fit to be adopted; and it appeared to him that the whole House were substantially agreed in the Resolution of his Noble Friend. The whole difference was, would they appoint a Committee on the commencement of the Session, or would they appoint it on each particular case as it occurred?

Mr. BARING thought the Resolutions of the Noble Lord would open the door to very vague proceedings; and that the Resolutions proposed by the President of the Board of Controul was to be preferred.

Lord ALTHORPE said, his principal object was to disfranchise corrupt Boroughs, which the Right Hon. Gentleman's resolution would not effect. He must, therefore, prefer his own Resolutions, but would not divide the House on it.

The question on Lord Althorpe's Resolution, was negatived without a division.

Mr. WYNN then moved his Resolution.

Mr. HOBHOUSE supported the Resolution, though he did not expect much from it; for, in his opinion, much stronger remedies should be applied to purify Parliament.

Mr. GEORGE LAMB said, there was no necessity of hurrying to the adoption of the present Resolution, as it was only to apply to future elections.

Lord MILTON said, to pass the Resolution would be an attempt to blind the people of England by making them believe that something had been done to purify that House, when in fact nothing was done.

Sir ROBERT WILSON said he wished to see the election of every borough in the kingdom conducted with the same purity as the borough he had the honour to represent.

Lord MILTON moved an amendment, that after the words—"payment of money, or reward," there be added, "gift, or promise of place."

Mr. WYNN moved that the debate be adjourned to Friday, which was agreed to.

TUESDAY, Feb. 27.

The MASTER of the ROLLS obtained leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the practice of the Court of Chancery, in pursuance of the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners appointed to enquire into the actual state of that Court—its alleged abuses and delays, and the imperfections of its practice.

Mr. BROUGHAM was perfectly aware, as every professional man must be, of the defects of the system in this Great Court of Equity, but he attributed those defects to the personal administration of that system by the Noble and Learned Lord who presides over the Court of Chancery, rather than to the system itself.

The Attorney-General and Mr. Peel vindicated the Lord Chancellor; and leave was given to bring in the Bill.

On the motion of the Attorney-General, leave was given to bring in a Bill to declare the law relative to bills of exchange falling due on Good Friday and on Christmas-day.

The other Orders of the Day were then disposed of.

WEDNESDAY, Feb. 28.

At four o'clock, thirty members only being present, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 1.

The interest excited by the expected declaration of Ministers this evening on the subject of the Corn Laws filled all the avenues of the House at a very early hour. At five o'clock the House commenced business; but until after six, the confusion which prevailed in the gallery prevented us from taking any accurate account of the matters which occurred. The committee was sworn on the Stirling burgh election petition: the names of the Members were as follows:—The Hon. W. Gordon, Mr. W. Rickford, Sir Charles Forbes, Mr. F. G. Howard, Lord Henry Cholmondeley, Mr. W. R. Cartwright, Mr. E. B. Wilbraham, Mr. C. B. Wall, Mr. J. Fleming, Mr. H. Dawkins, Mr. Abercromby, and Sir G. Clerk.

Mr. PLUNKETT gave notice, that he would to-morrow present the petition of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, praying for a repeal of the disabilities affecting their body. It would not be doing justice to so momentous a case as theirs, to call the attention of the House to the subject at this hour, when they were about to apply their minds to a different consideration, but to-morrow he should present the petition in the manner in which he thought it right to be submitted to their calm and deliberative judgment.

CORN LAWS.

Mr. Secretary CANNING moved, that the House resolve into a Committee on the Corn Laws.

Sir E. KNATCHBULL did not wish to give unnecessary opposition, and would not oppose it if he and his friends should not be compromised by agreeing to it.

Mr. Secretary CANNING said, such a motion was pro forma, and ought to have been moved yesterday.—Motion agreed to.

Mr. Secretary CANNING then rose. He first begged to return acknowledgments for the favour extended towards him. He had been very desirous that the views of Government should be fully known, and he had to regret that the serious visitation of Providence that had befallen a Noble Colleague, had prevented the motion from being made simultaneously in the other House. He was therefore not only the representative of his Noble Friend, but the organ of Government, and he therefore desired the attention and consideration of the House. Heretofore he had taken no part in these discussions, except as far as concerned a clause. He came to this discussion without prejudice, or pledge, or acrimony towards any party. It did surprise him that so much acrimony was introduced into these discussions. As yet he had never met with the extreme opinion on either side—for complete exclusion, or for unqualified admission. All the intermediate stages are those of mode and degree. He never yet met with the advocate for free trade in Corn that denied that there ought to be some protection to the agricultural interests. And the agriculturists who desired prohibition always did so with qualifications. Then it was the question of mode and degree—to what degree should protection be extended? That was the question they had in reality to discuss. Different plans had been suggested by those most formable to free trade in Corn, but they proposed protection. One proposed a duty of 20s. until it had gained a certain maximum. A Noble Lord had proposed duties from 16s. to 10s., the latter to be permanent. A third was for a duty of 5s. or 6s., without reference to the price; but in case of extremity, there was to be an appeal to Parliament. That was his objection to this course; they would not stand times of pressure, when famine should appear in their streets, in the workshop, and in the cottage. The plans would not stand in times of extremity; their advocates appealed from legislation to discretion. Did the laws as they now existed, afford adequate protection, or to an unnecessary, or not to a sufficient extent. The law of 1815 introduced prohibition; that was in fact the character of the law. Though there was a certain price fixed, the law was prohibition. In 1815, there was, he repeated, up to a certain extent, unqualified prohibitions; and what was surprising, after a certain price, there was to be unqualified admission. It seemed as if it were desired to reconcile the most opposite principles, as if the desire were to prevent the combination of the two principles. It was a most extraordinary state of things. The averages showed the injurious operation of the prices in 1819 and 1820. In that year the law of 1815 was altered, and such correcting law never came into operation. It gave up unlimited prohibition, and contemplated a duty; but still we live under prohibition up to 80s. absolutely. If duty be the fit protection, the law just mentioned would never do. In one year corn was 38s., but the duty, that yielded to fluctuation, would not give protection. He was disposed to assume the price named in 1822, namely 70. The average price preceding 1815 for twelve years was 85s. From 1815 to 1820, it was 75s. The average for the last twelve years was 65s.; but he thought 66s. now might be deemed what 70s. was in 1822. Then what would be the point of protection? His Noble Friend thought that 60s. was the price at which the agriculturists were entitled to protection. (Hear, hear.) He was not favourable to fixed duty, but to a scale of duties, correcting excesses and making up deficiencies, and thus to secure steadiness, one ingredient to insure the lowest price. Foreign corn would enter into the consideration. What he proposed was, that there should be a duty of 20s. when the price was 60s.; to diminish 2s. on every advance of 1s., and advance 2s. on every decrease of 1s.; so that at 70s. all duty would cease, and importation remain free. The desire was to hold the scale equal between the contending interests, casting the balance in favour of the consumer. He could not from either party anticipate objection; if there were any he trusted the amplest time would be taken for consideration. Heretofore there was a disposition to encourage exportation. Now there was only the alternative of adhering to the principle of 1815; but so as to prevent the alternatives that had hitherto affected the market, and to supersede the necessity of the Government legislating instead of the Parliament. Then there was the abuse of average. By previous arrangements, three halfpence or twopence had opened the ports, when they ought to have been shut; and shut them when they ought to have been opened. By the new plan the great capitalists would not have the opportunity of getting together, and defeating the law. Now the prices of one Saturday would regulate the imports of next Saturday. The Government had done right in letting in corn last year; but though it did much good it inflicted much private mischief; by the stroke of a pen many merchants were overthrown. He should not call for the decision of the House, but leave the Resolutions for a future consideration, perhaps Friday week, as should be most convenient. There had been the amplest and most anxious attention extended to the subject by the Noble Lord at the head of the Government and his colleagues; and he trusted that it would be received as a peace-offering between clashing interests that have heretofore been supposed could not exist except at the expense of each other. (Hear, hear.) He concluded with moving a series of Resolutions, that wheat, when between the price of 60s. and 61s. should be imported on payment of a duty of 1l. for each quarter; and for every increase of price of Is. a decrease of duty of 2s., until the price reached 70s.; and for every quarter, when the price was 70s. and above, the duty to be Is. per quarter. When the price was 60s. and not under 59s. the duty to be 1l. 2s.; and for every decrease of 1s. in the price, to be an increase of duty of 2s. Similar regulations for barley, oats, &c.

Mr. WESTERN said, this was a dangerous question to meddle with, and much had resulted from the constant tampering with the law. He could not help thinking that the system of duty would be more obnoxious than prohibition to a certain price; because in the former case the object evidently was to produce corn at home; in the latter it will be to raise a revenue. When corn was higher by 10s. or 12s. a quarter than at present, trade and manufactures were flourishing; at present, with a low price of wheat, they were in a state of the greatest distress. Indeed, no case could be produced in which manufactures had flourished when agriculture was distressed; and he was confident that the present experimental measure had already paralyzed the activity of the farmers, and that if it should fail, the ruin of thousands engaged in the cultivation of the soil would be the effect. He would, however, give the Resolution of the Right Hon. Gentleman the best consideration, and hoped other Gentlemen would do the same.—(Hear, hear.)

A Gentleman, whose name we could not learn, said he agreed in the propositions of the Right Hon. Gentleman, as far as they regarded England, but he was confident that it would be necessary to give a higher protection to the cultivation of barley and oats in Scotland, and hoped time would be given to allow Scotland to be heard before the measure was finally settled.

Sir JOHN NEWPORT said the manufacture of flour in Ireland ought to be protected, and he would trouble the House at length on that subject when the Bill was brought in.

Mr. BANKS said he wished the Right Hon. Gentleman had stated what effect he supposed the present measure would have on the price of wheat; whether it would make it lower than the present price of 53s., or whether it would raise it.

Mr. CANNING said it might be inferred from the proposal of laying a duty on wheat at the price of 60s. that they did not consider the present price a high price.

Mr. C. GRANT said that since the passing of the Act of 1815, corn had been as high as 112s. and as low as 38s; the present measure would prevent such fluctuations.

Mr. W. WHITMORE said he was far from thinking that either the manufactures or the agriculture of the country would flourish under the Act proposed by the Right Hon. Gentleman. He thought the duty proposed by the Right Hon. Gentleman was much too high, and would cause snch a difference between the price of corn in this country and other countries, as must be prejudicial to its agricultural and manufacturing interests.

Sir EDWARD KNATCHBULL said the principle proposed by the Right Hon. Gentleman of substituting duty for prohibition, was of the utmost importance, but he would own that he preferred the principle of prohibition, though he would admit that the question required the fullest consideration.

Lord ALTHORPE thought the propositions of the Right Hon. Gentleman were a great improvement on the present Corn Laws. (Hear, hear.) He thought it would improve the situation of all classes of the people; and that the protection offered by the Right Hon. Gentleman was beneficial to the agriculturist, and as much as he had a right to expect.

Mr. Alderman THOMPSON thought the duty proposed on wheat was much too high, though he would rather give the agriculturist a protection too high than too low.

Sir THOMAS LETHBRIDGE said, the propositions of his Majesty's Government had not come in that questionable shape which he had anticipated. (A laugh.) After the dire reports that had reached him, the scale of duty proposed afforded him some consolation, though he thought the duty much too low, and at present thought he must oppose the propositions. He wished to know whether the averages were to be taken weekly.

Mr. CANNING replied in the affirmative.

Sir JOHN SEABRIGHT said he thought the propositions a great improvement on the present state of law.

Mr. CURWEN expressed his opinion in favour of the propositions.

Mr. Alderman WOOD protested against any increase of the proposed duty on barley.

Mr. PORTMAN said he considered protection absolutely necessary to the existence of agriculture in this country, but he greatly preferred protection by duty to prohibition. He wished to know whether the quarter of corn was to be taken by the Winchester measure.

Mr. CANNING replied in the affirmative.

Colonel WOOD said that the country was in such a state, that if a false step were taken in the rate of duty it might be productive of serious injury. He thought protection by prohibition was to be preferred to protection by duty.

Lord MILTON thought the propositions made was a great improvement of the present state of the law; and would be particularly beneficial to the agricultural classes of the community. He hoped the Government would not be diverted from a course which entitled them to the thanks of the country. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BROUGHAM hoped that the discussion of the propositions would not be brought on at a time that some Members of the House would be absent on the Assizes. He would at present abstain from giving any opinion on the propositions; but he would simply offer for the comfort of those who took alarm at the apprehension that prohibition was to be removed, that the propositions combined prohibition with duty. The law would say that they might import at their peril; but unless human nature changed, men would not import unless there was a prospect of a profit; and that could not be expected unless the price of wheat in England was at the least 55s. a quarter. He agreed with Sir Joshua Child, who said that trade and land must wax and wane together. He could not regard the alarm as well founded, but deprecated any lengthened discussion at present, as there would be ample opportunity when the Bill should be brought in.

Sir FRANCIS BURDETT said, his opinion was not in unison with those of any set of gentlemen who had declared their opinions. He was a decided advocate for the principles of free trade, and that a free trade in Corn was for the benefit of both the manufacturing and agricultural interests. He, however, gave credit to the Right Hon. Gentlemen, for venturing to introduce so liberal a plan as the present; but when the subject came to be discussed, he should endeavour to show that it was the interest of the landed interest, that a nearer approach to free trade in corn should be made. He did not say this as making a sacrifice of his particular interest, but because he believed it was best promoted by free trade. He was surprised that the question of Currency was not adverted to, which was the prime cause of all the fluctuation in the price of Corn.

The House resumed.

Sir ALEXANDER GRANT reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at ten o'clock.

FRIDAY, March 2.

The House was occupied six hours in reading petitions for and against the Catholic claims.

Mr. H. GRATTAN said, that those who opposed the Catholics, used far more violent and unjustifiable language than was adopted by the Catholic Association, or any other body of Catholics. By Dr. Duigenan, they had been entrapped into the taking of certain oaths to the King; and then the Catholics were turned round upon and accused of disloyalty to the King and blasphemy to their God. He hoped to be able to read documents to prove these things.

Petition ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWSON presented petitions signed by upwards of 22,000 persons, Protestants, against further concessions to the Roman Catholics. He had also similar petitions from the counties of Wicklow and Westmeath, signed by Peers, Yeomanry, &c., who were neither under the controul of Landlords or Priests. He observed that his opinions remained unaltered, if any thing more strongly against further concession to the Roman Catholics. The conduct of the Priests had been most culpable—so much so that England would hardly believe the details which he should hereafter have to detail; but he should state them without fear, and if after that the people of England chose to put up with a Catholic supremacy, let them abide by the consequences. The Catholic Association, that unjust, illegal, and unconstitutional body, had sown all sorts of calamities; for the Protestants of Ireland were the oppressed body, and they had lived in the fear of their lives till now that they they were determined to speak out.

Mr. J. GRATTAN complained of the "seditious" speech just uttered, and expressed the hope that the Catholic Association would continue to exist till the emancipation was granted. The inhahitants amongst the Protestants in Wicklow, were not unanimously against the claims.

Lord NORMANBY said, that the Hon. Member (Mr. Dawson's) speech more strongly convinced him that the present state of things in Ireland could not continue as they were. (Cheers.) He admitted that the Protestants in Ireland could not sleep in safety in their beds, but all things showed the necessity of adjusting the Catholic Claims.—Petition ordered to be printed.

Mr. PLUNKETT presented a Petition from the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland, to which he was most anxious to call the attention of the House; not only for the sake of the information they might give to the House, but the state of the feelings of those over whose interests they presided. They said that they should be wanting in their duty, if they did not warn the House of the dangers that awaited the non-compliance with the Catholic Claims. The state of things was most perilous. They repelled the calumnious assertions heaped on them and their faith—repeating, however, only what they had before sworn to. He would not mix up the Catholic Question with this Petition, but to these Prelates were they indebted for the tranquillity preserved in Ireland, more than to any other body. He added that the Prelates had uniformly afforded redress respecting the conduct of any of those under them whose conduct might be complained of. He hoped the Petition would be allowed to be read at length.

Sir GEORGE HILL was surprised at the eulogium that had been pronounced on the Roman Catholic Prelates: they had countenanced and approved all the acts of the demagogues of the Catholic Association. He should like to know whether Dr. Doyle's name was attached to such petition: he doubted not it was; and did J. K. L. appear there? That authority had denounced the Protestant Church, and said he had no doubt that the Catholic establishment would take the lead: that being the fact, did the prelacy deserve the eulogium that had been pronounced?

Mr. MAXWELL said he should not do his duty to the country if he did not state that, during such election, the priests had exclusively attended to political affairs. They had led the freeholders to the poll to vote for the Catholic candidates, one priest before them and another behind them; and they cursed from the altar those who had voted for the Protestant candidates. After what the Attorney-General for Ireland had said, he deemed it right to state these things; he had affidavits to prove such facts, particularly regarding the conduct of one of these priests, named Patrick Cor. He also mentioned that between 7 and 800 persons in Cavan had renounced the errors of Rome; all of them had adduced affidavits of previous good conduct. As he learned that Dr. Doyle's signature was attached to the petition, he would read an extract from his letter to Lord Farnham.

It was then read at length, to which Mr. Plunkett entreated attention, as there was much noise in the House.

Mr. DAWSON said that there were many parts of this petition that ought to be contradicted on the moment. The Prelates wished what they asserted to be taken as axioms of the Roman Catholic religion; but heretofore they had receded whenever the Pope desired it. To James I. the Catholics took the oath of allegiance, &c.; but when the Pope found that the oath contained a denial of the Pope's deposing power, the Pope sent an order to recant, and recant the Roman Catholics did. The same was the case with the Veto of Lord Grenville's Bill in 1806; that was granted, then retracted. Dr. Doyle too, had denounced the Protestant Church as an incubus, as like the religion of Juggernaut, which constantly required human victims. It would be ridiculous to believe in such tergiversation and hypocrisy; if we did, we should have reason to deplore it.

Mr. Secretary PEEL, in presenting petitions, said he should abstain from remarks, for on Monday it would be his duty to express his opinions. The first petition was from the University of Oxford against further concessions to the Roman Catholics. He presented a similar petition from Protestant proprietors in Ireland, signed by 1,200 persons, amongst them 27 peers, and the amount of property of all the petitioners not being less than 1,000,000l. per annum, and all the petitioners were residents; the name of every non-resident had been carefully excluded. (Hear.)

Sir CHARLES HASTINGS presented a petition from the Vicar, Curate, and Protestants of the Parish of St. Martin, in the Borough of Leicester.

Lord MILTON moved, that the petition be read at length, as it would appear as if drawn up by a frantic maniac. The petition was read at length, and stated, that the Legislature would not be just to God and Man, if they did not refuse any further concessions to Roman Catholics, whose religion was set up in rivalship to God. That the petitioners were a band of plain humble men, having nothing to recommend them but their loyalty to God and the King, and called upon the House, on scriptural grounds, to preserve the true faith; for they held it abominable to suppose that Popery and Protestantism could ever walk hand in hand. The petition also said a good deal about Babylon and the Old Beast, and produced such continued bursts of laughter, that it was not easy to collect the particular expressions. It concluded by calling on the House to gird themselves, and stand on their watch tower, not to defy God, but to defy Satan. As soon as the last burst of laughter had subsided,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, he did not rise to offer any observations on the petition just read, which appeared to contain a more than usual portion of the figure called rigmarole. (A great laugh.) He merely wished to suggest, that the House had spent six hours in presenting petitions and observing on them; and if the House were to proceed in the same way on Monday, a great deal of time would be lost; he therefore hoped an hour would be fixed at which that discussion should commence.

Mr. PEEL said he could produce a petition presented from the Roman Catholics of a parish in the county of Wexford, in which there was such an assemblage of persons, as shewed there must be great ingenuity in bringing them together. The Right Hon. Gent. read a number of names from a paper, which excited repeated bursts of laughter—amongst them were Judge Blackstone, Julius Cæsar, Lord Tyrionel, Alexander the Great, Artaxerxes, King David, Joshua, Pompey, Mark Anthony, &c. &c. Mr. Peel concluded by observing, that the two petitions might be permitted to pair off together.

ANNUITY TO THE DUKE OF CLARENCE.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved the second reading of the Duke of Clarence's Annuity Bill.

Sir ROBERT HERON said he must oppose the Bill; he thought it unnecessary, and at present highly improper. He moved that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. DAVENPORT, jun. said the Bill should meet his decided disapprobation. He thought they should wait to see the effect the change in the currency would produce in the income of the currency; did they consider that 30,000l. a year in golden sovereigns was equal to 50,000l. twenty years ago? Besides, if his Majesty should be graciously pleased to contract another marriage, (a laugh)—he was glad to see Gentlemen so much amused—but if that event took place, would any Minister undertake to get back the additional income now proposed to be voted.

Mr. WELLS said he felt it his duty to oppose the Bill.

Mr. Alderman WAITHMAN said that the Bill was one of the most ill-timed ever introduced to the House; and in the present distressed state of the people of this country, it was impossible for him to support it. He was lately obliged to hear eightys ummonses in a single parish issued against persons incapable of paying the church and poor rates.

Mr. HUME wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how, as an honest man, he could support this grant when he knew himself to be a bankrupt, the revenue being four and a half millions deficient. If he could show the number of distresses issued to collect the taxes at the present rate, he was confident it would be found that fifteen thousand persons would be turned out of their houses to pay that additional tax. (Murmurs, and cries of question.)

The House divided—For the second reading, 128; against it, 39; Majority for the Bill, 89.

Lord PALMERSTON moved the order of the day for bringing up the Report on the Mutiny Bill.

Mr. HUME objected to going into the discussion after twelve o'clock.

Mr. PEEL said, if the House did not sit after twelve o'clock, they would have an immense arrear in the warm weather.

The Report was then brought up and agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be read on the 5th of March.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned at half-past twelve o'clock.

THE AGE.

LONDON, March 4.

The important discussion respecting the Corn Laws, was opened in the House of Commons on Thursday evening, by Mr. Canning, and the proposed alterations in their present construction are herewith subjoined, to which we direct the particular attention of the reader; as affording a very clear explanation of the scale of duties proposed to be levied on imported corn.

The question comes again before the House on Friday next, and until then, we shall defer the maintenance of any determined opinion upon the subject; prefering that every person may fully weigh the matter thus placed before them, in the most perspicuous manner, and be prepared for the various arguments to which its discussion will naturally give rise:—

"That it is the opinion of this Committee, that any sort of corn, grain, meal, and flour, which may now, by law, be imported into the United Kingdom, should at all times be admissible for home use, upon payment of the duties following, viz.—if imported from any foreign country:—

WHEAT, VIZ.

"Whenever the average price of wheat made up and published in manner required by law, ahall be 60s. and under 61s. the quarter, the duty shall be for every quarter - - - - - - - - £1 0s. 0d.

And in respect of every integral shilling by which such prices shall be above 60s., such duty shall be decreased by 2s. until such price shall be 70s.

"Whenever such price shall be at or above 70s., the duty shall be for every quarter - - - - - - 0 1 0

"Whenever such price shall be under 60s. and not under 59s. the duty shall be for every quarter - - - 1 2 0

And in respect of each integral shilling, or any part of each integral shilling, by which such price shall be under 59s., such duty shall be increased by 2s.

BARLEY.

"Whenever the average price of barley made up and published in manner required by law, shall be 30s., and under 31s. the quarter, the duty shall be for every quarter - - - - - - - - 0 10 0

And in respect of every integral shilling by which such price shall be above 30s., such duty shall be decreased by 1s. 6d. until such price shall be 37s. Whenever such price shall be at or above 37s. the duty shall be, for every quarter - - - - - - - 0 1 0

"Whenever such price shall be under 30s, and not under 29s. the duty shall be, for every quarter - - 0 11 6

And in respect of each integral shilling, or any part of each integral shilling, by which such price shall be under 29s. such duty shall be increased 1s. 6d.

OATS.

"Whenever the average price of oats made up and published in manner required by law shall be 21s., and under 22s. the quarter, the duty shall be for every quarter - - - - - - - - - 0 7 0

And in respect of every integral shilling by which such price shall be above 21s., such duty shall be decreased by 1s. until such price shall be 28s.

"Whenever such price shall be at or above 28s. the duty shall be for every quarter - - - - - 0 1 0

"Whenever such price shall be under 21s. and not under 20s. the duty shall be for every quarter - - - 0 8 0

And in respect of each integral shilling, or any part of each integral shilling, by which such price shall be under 20s., such duty shall be increased by 1s.

RYE, PEAS, AND BEANS.

"Whenever the average price of rye, or of peas, or of beans, made up and published in manner required by law, shall be 35s. and under 36s. the quarter, the duty shall be for every quarter, - - - - - - 0 15 0

And in respect of every integral shilling by which such price shall be above 35s., such duty shall be decreased by 1s. 6d. until such price shall be 45s.

"Whenever such price shall be at or above 45s. the duty shall be for every quarter, - - - - - - 0 1 0

"Whenever such price shall be under 35s. and not under 34s., the duty shall be for every quarter, - - 0 16 6

And in respect of every integral shilling, or any part of each integral shilling, by which such price shall be under 34s., such duty shall be increased by 1s. 6d.

WHEAT MEAL AND FLOUR.

"For every barrel, being 196l., a duty equal in amount to the duty payable on five bushels of wheat.

OATMEAL.

"For every quantity of 252l., a duty equal in amount to the duty payable on a quarter of oats.

MAIZE OR INDIAN CORN, BUCK-WHEAT, BEER OR BIGG.

"For every quarter, a duty equal in amount to the duty payable on a quarter of barley.

"If the produce of and imported from any British possession in North America or elsewhere, out of Europe:—

WHEAT. £ s. d.

We were much gratified in noticing Mr. Canning's appearance, in which no apparent trace was left of that unfortunate and severe indisposition, which the country has so lately had to lament.

EARL OF LIVERPOOL.

The improvement in the state of this regarded Nobleman, is as progressive as an affliction, of the alarming nature which has visited his Lordship, could well be expected to be. The utmost anxiety still pervades all circles; and the inquiries at Fife House have been even more numerous, during the last, than they were the preceding, week. For the satisfaction of all classes of society, who watch with incessant solicitude the state of the Noble Earl's health, we subjoin the latest bulletin which has been issued:—

"Half past Twelve o'clock.

"Lord Liverpool has had another very good night, and is somewhat better in all respects."

REFORMATION IN IRELAND.

In some of our former numbers will be found arguments in favour of this all-important work. It is gratifying to find the expediency of this measure, towards the emancipation of the Catholics of the sister country from the horrors of an idolatrous religion, and an intolerant priesthood, is now so fully admitted by persons on whose judgment much faith is to be placed, that little room, indeed, is left any longer for doubt upon the subject.

The rapid progress of the Reformation is unexampled; every day furnishes additional intelligence of the vast numbers of the Irish Roman Catholics renouncing the errors of Popery, and embracing the true doctrines of Christianity. We really are astounded at the rapid march of religious and moral improvement in Ireland, when we consider the numerous and formidable obstacles opposed to its progress by the Priesthood of the country; but, thank Heaven, the irresistible truths of the Scriptures are forcing their way into every cottage in Ireland; and the arid surface of irreligion and bigotry has become irrigated by the waters of the living fountain, whereunto hundreds of our benighted fellow-creatures have been led to drink, by the illuminating spirit of the true Gospel. Their weary steps have been directed thither; and, through the assistance of Divine grace, they will soon find the difference between the state of superstition and idolatry, and the consolatory hopes of eternal mercy. A Noble Lord, zealous in the promotion of Scriptural knowledge, has in his place declared, there is but one course left for the Emancipation of the Irish Catholics, and that is the Reformation. This was the opinion expressed by us on a former occasion; and it is truly gratifying to find, that in that opinion we are strengthened, not only by him whose labours in the cause his country must ever remain indebted for, but by other Noble Lords, whose residence not being in the country, cannot have the practical knowledge of its blessings as the Noble Lord we have alluded to. That Noble Lord has fearlessly and justifiably called upon the Legislature to protect the Protestant classes from the insults and outrage of the disaffected; he has told the British nation, that unless some strong coercive measures are resorted to for the suppression of the Catholic Association, insurrection must ensue with all its awful and fatal consequences.

This is really a melancholy picture, but drawn as it is by a Noble individual, whose intimate knowledge of the country of which he speaks is not to be excelled, it eminently deserves most serious attention—he has pledged himself for the truth of his assertions—indeed, the truly pious habits of the Noble Lord's life, and his unremitting exertions in the great cause of religious and moral education, forbid it for a moment to be imagined he could utter a falsehood. That the state of the country is as depicted by the Noble Lord we are fully satisfied; and we can assure our readers, we have taken no ordinary pains to arrive at an accurate knowledge of the fact. We earnestly recommend the melancholy situation of Ireland to the serious consideration of Parliament—some measures must be adopted for its amelioration—some check must be put to the daring conduct of the leaders of the Catholic Association—the people of Ireland must be taught to trust to the wisdom of the Constitution for redress of their supposed grievances—they must not imagine that the law of this country can tolerate such a monstrous assumption of power as the Catholic Association has attempted to exercise—and that if the merciful forbearance of the law, in not punishing their offences sooner, may have led them to believe they have not transgressed its provisions, that to its mercy, and not its defectiveness, they are to attribute the indulgence. It is not for us to suggest to the wisdom of the Legislature the remedy that ought to be applied, we only say, and we say it boldly, that in any regulation for the better government of Ireland which his Majesty's Ministers may be inclined to adopt, let them never forget for a moment, that our Constitution is in all respects Protestant, and that in order to continue so, she must not submit to innovation.

MORE AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

We have the satisfaction of finding that our sentiments, delivered last week upon this subject, have been echoed back by all the literary and reading circles of the metropolis; and that we have consequently been instrumental, in removing, from many eminent men, a most insulting imputation, thrown on them by one of no eminence at all.

But more than this has been effected; for the desire of perusing autobiography has certainly received a considerable impetus, within the last few days—second editions have made a sudden and unexpected appearance, and other people who had hitherto been deterred, by this "libellous varlet," from entertaining any high opinion of their own works, and letting those works entertain other persons, have all at once taken courage, and seriously turned their thoughts to publishing. However much this was to be expected, we think it never was to be expected, under all the circumstances, that the life of this very person himself should be submitted for sale—unless, indeed, as many people have imagined, his general vituperation of the subject arose from a desire to produce additional curiosity for the purchase of such works. We have been informed, on pretty good authority, that a friend of the party waited, the beginning of this last week, on an eminent house in Paternoster-row, when the following dialogue took place:—

Friend. I am come to ask what you will give for the "Life of Mr. LOCKHART," written by himself?

L. and Co. Mr. LOCKHART! We don't know any thing of him! LOCKHART. or HAGGART, did you say, Sir?

Friend. LOCKHART!

L. and Co. What is he—a highwayman?

Friend. A what, Sir?

L. and Co. A highwayman! If so, it may sell—according to an account we read in the last Quarterly.

Friend. The person whose "Life" I have to offer you, is an eminent author.

L. and Co. Of what?

Friend. PETER'S LETTERS TO HIS KINSFOLK!

L. and Co. We never heard of it.

Friend. No! then, REGINALD DALTON!!

L. and Co. Never heard of that, either.

Friend. And, VALERIUS!!!

L. and Co. Nor that.

Friend. God bless my soul. Well then, he was the editor of the Representative.

L. and Co. What, MURRAY'S paper that failed! Hum—ha—

Friend. And, beyond all this, he is the editor of the Quarterly Review.

L. and Co. What, MURRAY'S magazine that's failing? Why this is worse than all. We are very sorry, Sir, that we can make you no offer; more particularly, as the very reasons you have urged, in your friend's behalf, are those which he himself, in his said Review, has given as arguments against such publications.

[Exit FRIEND, in a huff.

A more extraordinary circumstance, than this, has has never come under our knowledge; and it only shews the vast difference between "criticism and infallibility," as Lord BYRON terms it. On the presumption that the account be correct, it will point out to this young gentleman, the magnitude of the error (to say the least of it) into which he has fallen, and the very proper check which his literary ambition has here met with, will teach him two important things—to think much more highly, than he does, of others—and much less so, than he does, of himself.

CHARADES.

"D'ye give it up?"—KEELEY. 100*l*. Note.

A VERY clever farce, under the title of the £100 Note, has been playing these three weeks, or a month, at Covent Garden theatre; in which an actor, by the name of KEELEY, personates the "Boots" at an hotel, and perpetually torments you with charades, ejaculating (before you have time to think, even if you were so disposed) the above phrase, "do you give it up?" We saw it the first night, and were quite amused with this character particularly—the farce, as every one knows, turns on the adventure of JEMMY BRADSHAW and his wife, when she was performing at Manchester as Miss M. TREE. As variety is at all times pleasing, and as the farce is likely to be a permanent favourite, we have put together a few charades, in case KEELEY should like to pop in a new one, every now and then.

Q. Why is TOM RAIKES like the Archbishop of YORK?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because his aspect is holy.

Q. Why is the Baroness ROEBECK like Mr. CURTEIS?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because she is the present Member for Sussex.

Q. Why is CHARLES KEMBLE like the late Doctor KITCHENER?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because he is suddenly gone off.

Q. Why is JOE HUME like Lord BINGHAM?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because he is a man of figure.

Q. Why is Mrs. BLIGH like the British Army?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because she is on the peace Establishment.

Q. Why is Mrs. COUTTS like Momus?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because she is seldom out of SPIRITS!

Q. Why is JEMMY BRADSHAW like a Freemason?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because he is wedded to mys-t'ry.

Q. Why is WILLIAM LENNOX like Mr CHANTRY?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because he has always a cast IN HIS EYE!

Q. Why is PETRE like the Augæan stables?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because it would be a herculean task to thoroughly clean him.

Q. Why is AULDJO like a post-paid letter?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because he was taken in, without paying for it!

Q. Why did ROWLEY, the attorney, look, the other day in Court, like the BRAZEN HEAD?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Because he was BRASS without, and NOTHING within.

Q. What is the present Covent Garden Manager like?

"D'ye give it up?"—A. Like to go out.

We could give Mr. KEELEY several more, equally good; but we think the above quantity will do for the present.

THE GREAT UNKNOWN!

One of the Edinburgh Papers has been playing off an absurd trick upon Sir WALTER SCOTT, by reporting that, at a Theatrical Fund Dinner, a few days since, in that city, the Baronet returned thanks to the company for drinking his health, and wound up by acknowledging himself to be the sole individual author of the novels, which, though attributed by at least half the world to his pen, have always been classed, from the forms of common courtesy, as the works of The Great Unknown.

We submit Sir WALTER's speech, exactly as it is reported by the Edinburgh wag, as being a curious document—its being a true one, is out of the question; because a man of his extraordinary genius, who has prided himself in keeping this secret to Royalty, Nobles, Gentles, and "great—as even they," to the first literary circles of the world, could never, if he was sober, bottle it up for a series of years, and at last confess it before a set of players; and then claim, as the only privilege of such a man, that of drinking the health of some mime who has played one of his characters—Baillie Nicol Jarvie, we believe—in that city of Edinburgh. If he was not sober, that alters the matter—but we think equally out of the question—at all events this is his speech, and the reader may judge for himself:—

Sir Walter Scott certainly did not think, that in coming there that day, he would have the task of acknowledging, before 300 gentlemen, a secret which, considering, that it was communicated to more than 20 people, was remarkably well kept. He was now before the bar of his country, and might be understood to be on trial before Lord Meadowbank, as an offender; yet he was sure that every impartial jury would bring in a verdict of "not proven." He did not now think it necessary to enter into reasons of his long silence. Perhaps he might have acted from caprice. He had now to say, however, that the merits of these works, if they had any, and their faults, were entirely imputable to himself.—(Long and loud cheering.) He was afraid to think on what he had done. "Look on't again I dare not." He had thus far unbosomed himself, and he knew that it would be reported to the public. He meant, when he said that he was the author, that he was the total and undivided author. With the exception of quotations, there was not a single word that was not derived from himself, or suggested in the course of his reading. —The wand was now broken, and the rod buried. They would allow him further to say, with Prospero, "Your breath it is that has filled my sails," and to crave one single toast in the capacity of the author of those novels; and he would dedicate a bumper to the health of one who had represented some of those characters of which he had endeavoured to give the skeleton, with a degree of liveliness which rendered him grateful. He would propose the health of his friend Baillie Nicol Jarvie (loud applause); and he was sure that, when the author of Waverley and Rob Roy drank to Nicol Jarvie, it would be received with that degree of applause to which that gentleman had always been accustomed, and that they would take care that, on the present occasion, it should be prodigious! (Long and vehement applause.)

Advices from Tiflis, of the 24th January, mention, that on the 9th of that month, Lieut.-General Prince MADATOFF had passed the Araxis, and, having formed a junction on the other side with Colonel MITSCHENKO they had vigorously attacked the tribes cantoned along the Samboor.

The Swiss brigade, on its return to France, were every where received with the greatest attention. The King of SPAIN had ordered his Ministers, and the public authorities in the line of their march, to refuse nothing to General D'ARBAND-JONQUES, which he might demand. The people, it is added, exceeded the wishes of the Government, by the cordial reception which they gave to these troops.

In the Chamber of Deputies, the discussion on the Law of the Press was still continued.

THEATRICALS.

THERE were sundry objections to the new comedy called the Trial of Love, produced on Thursday at Drury Lane; the title was a bad one—the cast was a bad one—the scene of action a bad one—and it was, moreover, understood to be written by MR. SOANE, who verily hath no fun in him. But the great drawback to the affair was the assumption of such a character as Antonio—a gay, fashionable, finely-dressed, and love-making fop—by MR. LISTON: and we are quite at a loss to account for this eminent comedian undertaking any thing so totally out of his line. If MR. LISTON's name is essential to the security of any new comic piece (which we very believe it to be) then no such piece should be produced which has not a part in it exactly suited to his peculiar abilities. MR. LISTON is an exceedingly ugly man—so is TOM RAIKES—and neither fortune, nor fine clothes, have ever made any person think them otherwise. LISTON, to be sure, has this great advantage over RAIKES, that his face has produced him a mine of wealth, while TOM'S has only procured him the sum of forty shillings.

The people have so identified this inimitable actor with a peculiar range of eccentric characters, (for which he is certainly principally qualified) that they are not willing to have their ideas of him disturbed by any other representation; and least of all, by one of a nature like this. We believe there is no instance on record of his having produced a solitary effect, in these fine holiday gentlemen, and, as one party concerned, we never wish to see him try the experiment again. The principal feature in the acting of this comedy was a finished portrait of SALVATOR ROSA by MR. WALLACK, which, in his interview with the Banditti, was peculiarly excellent—his manner was characteristic, his action graceful, yet impassioned, and, by way of finale, his costume perfect, both as to correctness and beauty. Mrs. YATES is next entitled to all the favour she received, for her admirable personation of Angela, which possessed that elegance and neatness of manner, and that agreeable conception, as well as execution of character, which has always distinguished this very pleasing lady. Beyond this deserved eulogium, we do not remember any thing particularly worthy of notice, in the performance of a Trial of Love.

Mr. SOANE has had to contend against himself, in producing any thing bearing even the name of COMEDY—there was a prejudice against author and piece at starting, which was never got rid of through the evening. But it is unjust and false to deny, that there is not some superior language, and also an excellent situation or two in this play, which would have had the effect anticipated for them, if they had been better wrought up—if the character allotted to LISTON, (a principal feature in their construction) had been of a very opposite mould, and if more attention had been paid, to have prevented those stage inaccuracies committed by young MACREADY (SOUTHWELL!) and his bells, and one or two others. This article should not be dismissed without bestowing on Mr. WALLACK a full meed of approbation for his prompt concession to public opinion, in instantly withdrawing a piece, which did not particularly seem to tickle their fancies.

Considerable expectation is excited, in behalf of Mr. POOLE'S forthcoming comedy, both as respects the eminent talent of the author, and the principle actress, Madame VESTRIS, who has, we hear, what is commonly called "a crack song" in it, which is expected to run Cherry Ripe very hard. It is to be produced at Covent-garden immediately on MADAME'S return from Bristol, where she sings this ensuing week with CARADORI and others, while Miss AYTON proceeds to Oxford. Besides all this, we find that the Drury-lane Theatrical Fund collected nearly 900*l*. on Friday, and that LISTON was excessively indignant at the Chairman calling on him for a song—and that, according to the Morning Chronicle, the following gentlemen were present:—Lord SALTOUN, Lord BURY, Lord W. LENNOX, Lord WEYMOUTH, Mr. O. SMITH! Mr. G. ROBINS! Mr. EVANS! Mr. YARNOLD! Mr. ELLIOTT! Mr. HUGHES! &c. &c.

The Oratorios commenced, with every prospect of success, on Friday last, and among the distinguished quantity of talent there present, we nosed Miss A. TREE. What a funny world this is, my masters!

INTERESTING THEATRICAL FUND DINNER.

(Abridged from the Edinburgh Evening Courant of Saturday.)

The first annual dinner of the Edinburgh Theatrical Fund was held yesterday in the Assembly Rooms, Sir Walter Scott in the Chair; and near whom sat the Earl of Fife, Lord Meadowbank, Sir John Hope, of Pinkie, Bart., Admiral Adam, Baron Clerk Rattray, Gilbert Innes, Esq., James Walker, Esq., Robert Dundas, Esq.; Alexander Smith, Esq.

Lord Meadowbank begged to return the thanks of the patrons for the honour now conferred on them. He could bear testimony to the anxiety which they all felt for the interests of the institution, which it was for this day's meeting to establish. For himself, he was quite surprised to find his humble name associated with so many others, more distinguished, as a patron of that institution. But he happened to hold a high and important public station in the country. It was matter of regret that he had so little the means in his power of being of service. But it would afford him at all times the greatest pleasure to give assistance. As a testimony of the feelings with which he now rose, he begged to propose a health, which he was sure, in an assembly of Scotsmen, would be received, not with an ordinary feeling of delight, but with rapture and enthusiasm. He knew that it would be painful to his feelings if he were to speak to him in the terms which his heart prompted; and that he had sheltered himself under his native modesty from the applause which he deserved. But it was gratifying at last to know that these clouds were now dispelled, and that the great unknown—the mighty magician—(here the room literally rung with applauses, which were continued for some minutes)—the minstrel of our country, who had conjured up, not the phantoms of departed ages, but realities, now stood revealed before the eyes and affections of his country. In his presence it would ill become him, as it would be displeasing to that distinguished person, to say, if he were able, what every man must feel, who recollected the enjoyment he had had from the great efforts of his mind and genius. It has been left for him, by his writings, to give his country an imperishable name. He had done more for his country, by illuminating its annals, by illustrating the deeds of its warriors and statesmen, than any man that ever existed, or was produced, within its territory. He had opened up the peculiar beauties of his country to the eyes of foreigners. He had exhibited the deeds of those patriots and statesmen to whom we owed the freedom we now enjoyed. He would give the health of Sir Walter Scott, which was drank with enthusiastic cheering.

Sir Walter Scott certainly did not think, that in coming there that day, he would have the task of acknowledging, before 300 gentlemen, a secret which, considering, that it was communicated to more than 20 people, was remarkably well kept. He was now before the bar of his country, and might be understood to be on trial before Lord Meadowbank, as an offender; yet he was sure that every impartial jury would bring in a verdict of "not proven." He did not now think it necessary to enter into reasons of his long silence. Perhaps he might have acted from caprice. He had now to say, however, that the merits of these works, if they had any, and their faults, were entirely imputable to himself. (Long and loud cheering.) He was afraid to think on what he had done. "Look on't again I dare not." He had thus far unbosomed himself, and he knew that it would be reported to the public. He meant, when he said that he was the author, that he was the total and undivided author. With the exception of quotations, there was not a single word that was not derived from himself, or suggested in the course of his reading.—The wand was now broken and the rod huried. They would allow him further to say, with Prospero, "Your breath it is that has filled my sails," and to crave one single toast in the capacity of the author of those novels; and he would dedicate a bumper to the health of one who had represented some of those characters of which he had endeavoured to give the skeleton, with a degree of liveliness which rendered him grateful. He would propose the health of his friend Bailie Nicol Jarvie (loud applause); and he was sure that, when the author of Waverley and Rob Roy drank to Nicol Jarvie, it would be received with that degree of applause to which that gentleman had always been accustomed, and that they would take care that, on the present occasion, it should be prodigious! (Long and vehement applause.)

Mr. Mackay, who spoke with great humour in the character of Bailie Jarvie—My conscience! My worthy father the Deacon could not have believed that his son could hae had sic a compliment paid to him by the Great Unknown.

Sir Walter Scott—Not unknown now, Mr. Bailie.

Mr. Mackay—He had been long identified with the Bailie, and he was now vain of the cognomen which he had now worn for eight years, and he questioned if any of his brethren in the Council had given such universal satisfaction. (Loud laughter and applause.) Before he sat down he begged to propose "the Lord Provost and the City of Edinburgh."

A Marine Insurance Company at Cadiz once took the Virgin Mary into formal partnership, covenanting to set aside her portion of profits for the enrichment of her shrine in that city. Not doubting that she would protect every vessel in which she had such a manifest interest, they underwrote ships of all sorts, at such reduced rates, that in a few months the infatuated partners were all declared bankrups.

Bonaparte's Empress, Maria Louisa, has presented Dr. Automarchi, the physician, with a diamond snuff-box, for his attention to Napoleon during his last moments.

The American Congress seems to be inclined to recede from their extravagant pretensions relative to their intercourse with our West India Colonies, and respecting which, it will be remembered, a correspondence was lately published between Mr. Canning and Mr. Gallatin, the American Minister.—A bill is in progress for raising materially the duty on woollens imported into the United States.—The Americans have now building five 74's, seven 44's, and seven 18-gun vessels.

Thursday being St. David's Day, the Society of Antient Britons (which is now in the 113th year of its establishment, having been instituted on the 1st of March, 1714) celebrated the Anniversary Feast of St. David, in honour of the Principality of Wales, in their usual manner. In the morning they went in procession, accompanied by the Children of the School in Gray's Inn-lane-road, (150 in number), to hear Divine Service at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, where prayers were read in the ancient British language, by the Rev. Thomas Alban, A.M. Chaplain to the Society, after which a sermon, in English, was preached by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Gloucester. The Society and their friends dined in the evening at the Freemasons' Tavern. Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, Bart., M.P. in the Chair, supported by Lord Kenyon, and several other individuals of rank and distinction. After the cloth was removed, and the usual toasts were drunk, the children of the School (100 boys and 50 girls) were introduced into the room by Lord Kenyon, the Treasurer, and other officers. They walked in procession round the room, the band playing a Welsh march. Their appearance was extremely interesting.

Caution to Stage Coachmen.—In the Court of King's Bench on Tuesday, a verdict was given against the proprietor of a Clapham stage for neglecting to call for two passengers who had booked their places to return to London at half past nine. The parties waited till eleven o'clock, and then took a post chaise, for which they paid 13s. The defendant refusing to pay the money to the plaintiff, telling him, when he asked for it, that he might go to Hell, and otherwise abusing him, this action was brought; and the fact being proved, the Lord Chief Justice directed the Jury to find for the plaintiff, damages 13s. adding, he hoped the action would be a lesson to coachmen in future.

FINAL EXAMINATION OF MR. ELLISTON.

On Friday Mr. Elliston underwent his final examination before the Commissioners in Basinghall-street.

Mr. Calcraft, M. P. proved a debt of 5,670l. 16s. 8d. due from the bankrupt to the proprietors of Drury-lane Theatre, and the admissibility of which debt was debated at a private special meeting convened for that purpose.

Mr. Teasdale, of Fenchurch-street, solicitor, proved a debt of 204l. 9s. 2d. due for business transacted, and for which he, as the surviving partner of Weston and Teasdale, held two leases of Coventry Theatre.

Mr. R. Stevenson, the banker of Lombard-street, proved to the sum of 410l. money lent; and Messrs. Manfield and Turpin, timber-merchants, Commercial-road, proved 345l. 9s. 1d. for goods delivered.

Mr. Pullen, the solicitor to the assignees, handed up the bankrupt's account and balance-sheet. The assignees, he said, were satisfied with them, though at the same time, there were many items of expenditure to which they could not but object.

One of the assignees said, they considered the accounts to be as satisfactory, under all the circumstances, as the bankrupt could make them, and they, therefore, had no objection that he should pass his final examination.

The Commissioner (Mr. Law) said that was quite sufficient, and he should now proceed to close the bankruptcy.

The Assignee said there was some property at Leamington which had belonged to Mr. Elliston, but which, it appeared, he had given over to his sons; of this they wanted some explanation as to the time when, and circumstances under which, the transfer had taken place.

Mr. Law—Do you wish for another examination for the purpose?

Assignee—No; we are contented at present, and Mr. Elliston has promised to explain all satisfactorily.

Mr. Chater (the bankrupt's solicitor) said, the assignees were for the present satisfied with the explanation contained in the accounts which they had looked over.

Mr. Elliston, in answer to the Commissioner's questions, said the accounts were made out under his own inspection, and were, every item, true. He had never been a bankrupt before, nor had he even compounded with his creditors. His books, accounts, &c. had been given up to the assignees, and all his remaining property.

From the balance-sheet it appeared, that at the time Mr. Elliston took the theatre, in 1819, he was possessed of unincumbered property to the amount of 20,000l.; the extra expense sunk in Drury-lane in the vast alterations which he made in its interior were between 30,000l. and 40,000l., independent of the current expenditure. His debts at the time of the commission was taken out were about 40,000l., and his available property was 15,000l.

After the bankrupt was sworn, and had answered the usual questions, the Commissioners signed his final examination, and he was immediately congratulated by several friends on having at length overcome the law's delay." The assignees returned Mr. Elliston his watch, gold seals, rings, &c., having, they said, been perfectly satisfied with his conduct throughout the commission, and declared their conviction that unforeseen events alone had compelled him to resort to a commission of bankruptcy.

EXTRAORDINARY PHILANTHROPY.

A Mr. French, butcher, residing in Great Quebec-street, Oxford-street, has recently taken into his house six children of a man who fled to the Continent, and there deserted them. The poor orphans were left at Bonne on the Rhine, whence they hegged their way to Brussels, and some benevolent individuals in that city provided the means of forwarding them to Dover. Here the parish officers paid their carriage to town, and Mr. French took them under his protection, as above stated. What heightens this generous act is, that Mr. French lost 1500l. by becoming security for the father, and has also himself a family of eight children. Sir Francis Burdett last week sent Mr. French 100l. enclosed in the following letter:—

"Sir,—Impressed with a due sense of your noble conduct, in receiving into your own family another family of orphan children, who, but for you, or some like you—and where could he have been found?—must have probably perished, I beg your acceptance of the enclosed, both as a testimony of my admiration and esteem, and as contributing to your success in trade, and in some degree aiding your benevolent purpose. I beg you will observe, Sir, that you are to employ my contribution for your own advantage, convinced as I am, that there can be no other way of employing it so much to the advantage of the unfortunate children, to whom you have so generously afforded an asylum. I remain, Sir, with the bigbest esteem, your most obedient servant,

"F. BURDETT."

SUDDEN DEATH OF DR. KITCHENER.

On Wednesday morning, at ten o'clock, an inquest was held at the sign of the Marquis Cornwallis, Warren-street, Fitzroy-square, on the cause of the death of Dr. Kitchener.

Mr. Robins, surgeon, of 137, Tottenham-court-road, had known deceased for some years past. He was a doctor of medicine, but was not in practice. Witness attended him professionally, and knew him to be affected with a disease of the heart. He was also subject to frequent spasmodic affections, which witness considered would one day or other terminate his existence. For the last fortnight he appeared much worse, and on Monday, by desire of witness, went out to dine with Mr. Braham; he (Mr. Robins) thinking company might rouse him from a depression of spirits under which he appeared labouring. At eight o'clock that evening he called at the house of deceased; but finding him not returned, he supposed him better, and went home. At twelve o'clock he was called up by Dr. Kitchener's footman, who begged him to come instantly, as his master was was dying. He hastened to the house with all speed, and found the deceased quite dead. An attempt to bleed him was quite ineffectual. Dr. Kitchener often declared to witness that he knew his disorder would take him off suddenly. He was in continual fear of death.

In answer to questions from the Jury, Mr. Robins said, that the doctor had not practised medicine for a considerable time. He had devoted his time to other pursuits, principally literary. He had published the "The Cook's Oracle," "An Essay on Telescopes," a large collection of national songs, particularly those by Dibdin, and various other works.

William Antiss, footman to the deceased, came home with his master about eleven o'clock on Monday night, and on letting him out of his carriage, thought something more than common was the matter with him. They almost immediately went to their apartments, and before twelve o'clock witness was alarmed by the loud ringing of his master's bedroom bell. On reaching the apartment he found the housekeeper there, who begged him to send up some warm water and brandy, and hasten for the surgeon, as she feared his master was dying. He immediately fetched Mr. Robins. His master had given directions, that whenever he should be taken ill, his feet might be bathed in warm water, and a little brandy administered.

Mary Ann Beams, the housemaid, corroborated the testimony of the last witness.

After viewing the body, the Jury, under the direction of the Coroner, returned a verdict, "that the deceased died by the visitation of God."

Fresh recognisances have been entered into for the personal appearance of Mr. W. Wakefield to take his trial at the approaching Lancashire Assizes. Upwards of one hundred witnesses are subpœnaed in his behalf. The case will be tried by a Special Jury, before Mr. Baron Hullock, in the Nisi Prius Court.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRENCH PAPERS.

AFFAIR OF M. MAUBREUIL.

It is needless to say that this cause had attracted a great number of auditors.

Before 11 o'clock M. de Maubreuil was brought into Court. He is a man about forty-one years of age; his button-hole is decorated with the red riband; he appears ill, and his language is incoherent.

"The Counsel," said he to the President, as soon as the Judges had taken their seats, "the counsel commissioned to defend me has betrayed me. I am destitute of means of defence. I conjure all the counsel who hear me to lend me their assistance. The one whom I had chosen has seized upon my papers; he has written to M. Talleyrand. I am ignorant of all this: I have not been able to write to my family. If my defence is paralysed—if the horrible means are employed against me that have already been used, what would you have me do? I have confidence in M. Teste; he is a man of talent and of great probity.

The President—First of all, we must know your name.

M. de Maubreuil—You are M. Dufour. You have had me dragged before you hound with ropes. Will you permit me to write to my sister, and to bring a complaint against my counsel?

The President—We must proceed regularly: tell us your names.

Maubreuil.—Will you have the goodness to hear my complaint?

The President.—I will receive all the papers that you think fit to communicate to me; but we must first prove the identity of the person brought before the Court.

Maubreuil.—Is not M. Talleyrand there?

The President.—Your name?

Maubreuil.—You know my name, I have told you.

M. Desportes de Lusson, the King's Advocate.—If you have any complaints to make, we will hear them, but first of all tell us your name.

Maubreuil.—My name is Marie Armand de Guery de Maubreuil. I am 41 years of age, and was born at Maubreuil.

The Court now proceeded to hear the witnesses. In the course of the examination Maubreuil confessed that he had formed the design to insult Prince Talleyrand, and repeated the story of his having been sent for by Talleyrand on the 2d of April, 1814, who promised him 200,000 francs, and the title of Lieutenant-General, and gave him the infamous mission to assassinate Napoleon and all his family.

The result of the trial was, that the accused was found guilty of the facts laid to his charge, and as he had acted with premeditation, and considering that Maubreuil has already been condemned to more than one year's imprisonment, the Court sentenced him, conformably to the 56th article of the Penal Code, to five years' imprisonment, 500 francs fine, 10 years surveillance of the police after the expiration of his imprisonment, and 3,000 francs security.

The following is an extract from a private letter, dated Lisbon, February 21:

"I embrace the opportunity of the sailing of the Pyramus for England, in order to give you the news which has occurred since Saturday. The Marquis of Chaves made his last attack at the head of fifteen hundred regulars, who were well provided, and was assisted by 4 or 5,000 Guerrillas, who fled at the first fire. Chaves, being obliged to escape, got into Spain, and passed near Monteray, at the head of a party of Horse, and fled towards Tras-os-Montes, into which he effected an entrance; he is at Chaves joined by Telles Jordao, who has not more than 300 regulars, and about 1,000 Guerrillas. No dependance can be placed in the armed peasants, who fly at the first shot.

"A rumour is circulated that General Clinton has issued a Proclamation against the rebels, threatening them with immediate destruction if they resisted any longer.

"We are all here on the qui vive, these two days, in consequence of the discoveries of certain parties in the interior and in Lisbon, carrying on a correspondence with Chaves and his party.

"This correspondence was discovered in the capture of the baggage of Viscount Monte Allegre. It compromises many of the greatest men in both Chambers, Peers and Deputies, and many of the first merchants, amongst whom is the Viscount P. G. in whose house Sir Wm. Clinton lodged.

"General Stubbs has taken copies of the letters, and sent the originals to the Government. Copies are also sent off to England. This discovery has produced a great sensation, for we are afraid to look at each other. The papers were laid before the Chamber of Deputies on Monday, where there was a secret sitting on the subject."

Advices have been received from Bogota, to the 14th of December. They confirm the preceding accounts of the vigorous measures of retrenchment carrying into effect by Bolivar, and repeat the strong hopes entertained, that the annual expenditure of the Republic will be brought within four millions of dollars. In the Gaceta de Colombia we find the following Decrees, viz.—

1. For the organizing anew of the militia.
2. Reducing the land-tax from ten per cent. to five per cent., and imposing a poll-tax on all free persons, between the ages of fourteen and sixty years, throughout the Republic, of three dollars annually per head.
3. The collection of this tax to commence in January last, and to proceed with all possible dispatch.
4. Increasing the pains and penalties of smuggling, adding imprisonment to the loss of goods, ship, vessel, carriage, and cattle, employed in this unlawful traffic. The process to be summary and without modification.
5. Incorporating the office of Secretary for Foreign Affairs with that of Secretary for the Interior—also, the Marine with the War Department.
6. Suppressing two of the High Courts of Justice, and uniting them to other Courts.

Business had begun to improve at Bogota, and European manufactures were going off, although not at very encouraging prices; but the cessation of further supplies had improved the prospects in this respect.

The following is an extract of a private letter, dated Bogota, Dec. 14:

"During the Liberator's short stay in this city, he has done much towards restoring confidence and general tranquillity, by passing severe decrees, and taking upon himself the supreme command. The Liberator has decreed, that general economy must be practised, that the interest upon the foreign and domestic debt may be punctually met; to accomplish which, he has reduced the total expenses of the Republic to 4,000,000 dollars per annum. The revenue arising from the duties on imports and exports, exceeds 8,000,000 dollars annually; it may, therefore, confidently be expected, that, under the new system, and under the direction and personal observation of the President, that Colombia, in the years 1827 and 28, willl find herself in a more flourishing condition than ever.

"From what I have observed, and have been able to collect, I am justified in saying, that, in all next month, a remittance will be made to England, for the purpose of meeting the dividend on the English Loan; and, in July next, the time fixed by law, the dividend upon the home debt will be punctually paid.

"The revenue arising from tobacco (a Government monopoly) is at present badly managed; but, if put under proper direction, might be made to produce a net revenue of 3,000,000 dollars annually."

THE AGE.

"THE VERY AGE AND BODY OF THE TIME."

CAUTION.—Improved Patent easy-learnt Musical Instruments, rendered easy to every capacity by the figured book of instructions, which Book, containing Wm. Bainbridge's own Improvements on the Flageolet, was decided by the arbitrator (after being in the Court of King's Bench) last summer, to be his Copyright, which has thrown all his opponents into discord, one whose oath was not believed (as was evident from the result), said, if he could not play "Primo," he would henceforth play the "Tenor," and call it a new instrument; and an individual (who had on a former occasion debarred W. B. the protection of an Honourable Court), not finding on the Flageolet a back hole for his thumb, made his exit "Furioso." Caution—W. Bainbridge begs to inform the Public, that no other person but himself has any Patent for the Double and Single Flageolets, and that he is the sole Inventor, and only Patentee for further improvements on those Instruments. W. B. is compelled to make this statement in consequence of an individual who offers for sale Flageolets, which he states to be his new Patent, although no such Patent exists. That individual also makes other allusions and threats, which W. B. thinks is more becoming to the Public to pass over in silence. He has only to thank his friends, who know the value of his late improvements, for their kind encouragement, which is the best testimony to his character, and of their approbation of his successful endeavours to improve those instruments. W. B. again challenges those who advertise improvements on the Flageolet, to state, through this Paper, what they consist of: It is well known W. B. has for years made Single and Double Flageolets of all sizes, from a full Concert to an Octave, and with and without Additional Keys.—35, Holborn-hill, opposite the Bull Inn, London.

NEW PUBLIC SUBSCRIPTION LIBRARY,—26, Holles-street, Cavendish-square.
EDWARD BULL begs respectfully to announce, that he has opened these extensive premises (late the Banking-house of Sir Claude Scott, Bart. and Co. removed) as a British and Foreign Library, with the primary design of furnishing to Subscribers in town or in any part of the United Kingdom, a more immediate regular and enlarged supply of New Publications, than is attainable through any other means, at a moderate expense. Subscribers have also the privilege of choosing, from a valuable and extensive collection of standard works, the use of the best Periodicals, Foreign as well as English, and the right of requiring the purchase of any publication of general interest that may not already be comprised in the Library. With these great advantages, added to an experience of many years active engagement in the Libraries of Mr. Colburn and Mr. Ebers, E. Bull ventures his pretensions to a share of public patronage, which he will zealously study to merit, sparing neither pains nor expense to ensure its continuance. Catalogues and Terms to be had on application.
Reviews, and Monthly Journals, of Literature, Science, &c., will be received into this Library regularly from France, Italy, and Germany.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS, MONDAY, MARCH 12.

A number of petitions against further concessions to the Roman Catholics were presented, and a few in favour of emancipation; but nothing of interest occurred further than the usual conversation on similar presentations.

TUESDAY, MARCH 13.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented six petitions from the Protestants of parishes in the county of Donegal, against further concessions to the Roman Catholics; and

The Bishop of BATH and WELLS, presented one from Ilchester, having the same object.

The Earl of CARNARVON said, the oppressors of Ireland were the High Church Party, who kept them like Greeks in the Turkish Government.

Lord RODEN felt it quite impossible, as a resident in Ireland, to sit and hear the Noble Lord, who had just sat down, say the Roman Catholics of Ireland were treated as Greeks under the Turkish Government. There was no liberty common to British subjects which they did not enjoy, except that of legislating for a Protestant Church. It was impossible, consistent with the safety of the Constitution of England, to admit Roman Catholics to legislate for a Protestant community.

Lord MALMSBURY presented a petition from the owners of land at Banbury, in Oxfordshire, against the Weights and Measures Bill. The petitioners complained that, in the intended measure relating to the price of corn, the averages had been taken under Winchester measure, and when they came into the market, they were to sell by Imperial measure. The consequence would be a loss to the seller of three per cent.

The Earl of LAUDERDALE said, he had strongly opposed the Weights and Measures Bill, when it came before the House.—He had told them it would be an abortive law, and such it had turned out. It was optional whether the public used imperial weights and measures or not. In fact, it was only an alteration of phraseology. It was like passing a law to forbid him from speaking in a Scotch dialect, whether he could avoid it or not. (Laugh.) It repealed no less than 250 statutes with regard to weights and measures, and it answered no other purpose than to become a stain on the wisdom of Parliament.—Adjourned to

THURSDAY, MARCH 15.

The Bishops of Bath and Wells, of Durham, Lincoln, the Lord Chancellor, the Bishop of St. David's, and the Duke of Newcastle presented petitions against the Roman Catholic claims; and Earl Fitzwilliam and Viscount Clifden in favour of emancipation. Laid on the table.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE presented a petition from the ship owners of the Port of Liverpool, praying for the repeal of the charges and duties pressing upon them, and for an alteration in the navigation laws. The Noble Lord said, that every thing which had passed since he had expressed his opinion on the subject in another House, had confirmed the view which he had taken, that the shipping interest in this country was in great danger of being destroyed, if the present system of navigation laws was not altered. Laid on the table.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE presented a petition from Bingley, in the West Riding of York, praying that the law which prevents the exportation of machinery may be repealed.—Laid on the table.

Several petitions were presented from landowners of different counties, praying that the present measure with respect to corn might not pass into a law.—Laid on the table.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 16.

The Earl of Limerick and Marquis of Londonderry presented petitions in favour of Catholic Emancipation, and

The Lord Chancellor several from the nobility and gentry against them.—Laid on the table.

The Earl of WINCHELSEA regretted the abandonment of the Catholic claim bill by a Noble Marquis; he should notwithstanding take this opportunity of saying there was one measure that would benefit that country—he meant a measure that would release the people of Ireland from religious fraud, the effect of which would be to unite them in the bond of true religion, and they would be then in a happy state of freedom. His hope was, that their Lordships would unite to preserve entire that constitution of England which made this country the envy of all surrounding nations, and that they would not, by way of experiment or expediency, fritter away the privileges they then enjoyed. If they remained true to their religion and country, they might remain the happiest nation on earth. The Noble Lord concluded, by presenting several petitions from Northampton and Kent, against further concessions to the Roman Catholics.

The Bishop of Norwich presented petitions from several learned persons in different parts of Ireland—and one signed by a person styling himself the Bishop of Waterford, in favour of Catholic Emancipation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, as a servant of the Crown of Great Britain, he could not permit any person to present a petition to that House, styling himself Bishop of Waterford. He took it to be a principle of our law, as well as the Church, that there could be but one Bishop for one place; and he could not acknowledge any other than the Protestant Bishop. If the petition was presented as the petition of a person of the dignity of a Bishop in Ireland, he could not have any objection to it, but he could not, consistent with his duty to his country and his Sovereign, allow any man to present a petition, assuming a character which the law knew nothing of.

The Bishop of Norwich then withdrew the petition.

The petition from the Clergy of Norwich, against the Catholic claims, was then read and laid on the table.

Adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MARCH 12.

After a few Bills of private interest had been disposed of, a sharp conversation ensued on the third reading of the Mutiny Bill, relative to the propriety of continuing flogging in the army.

Mr. HOBHOUSE said, that he never could hear any reason for the continuance of the degrading and disgusting practice of flogging.

Sir J. SEBRIGHT said, from his experience in the army in the early part of his life, he was persuaded that the discipline of the army could not be adequately maintained without such power.

Sir H. HARDINGE said he would not quote military authority, but he would appeal to other authority of a high nature. The Hon. Gentleman then read a Report of the Prison Commlttee, which stated that solitary confinement was found insufficient, and that corporal punishment should be resorted to.

Mr. HUME said, the gallant officer who quoted the Report of the Prison Committee had compared the British army to convicted felons. (Loud cries of "No, no.")

Sir H. HARDINGE said it was most untrue to say that he had compared the army to felons; but as military authority was objected to, he had quoted the opinions of persons not military, in favour of corporeal punishment in this country. The Hon. Gentleman's construction was most unfair and illiberal. (Hear, hear.)

The Bill was then passed.

THE CORN LAWS.

Mr. C. GRANT moved the order of the day for a Committee of the whole House upon the question of the Corn Trade.

Mr. W. J. DENISON supported the Resolutions of Ministers, and he believed with the concurrence of his constituents. Some change as to the terms of the spring corn (the oats and barley) he thought might, perhaps, be made with advantage in the Committee; but as to the wheat, he was entirely agreed.

Mr. HOBHOUSE would only say two words, and they were to complain that Ministers should have suddenly altered their Resolutions after the general support which they had received in that House. Their alteration, too, was not for, but against the people, and to suit the particular interests of a party in that House.

Mr. PEEL observed, that the Hon. Member had been diverted, by his indignation against his Majesty's Ministers, from the real question before the Committee. He (Mr. Peel) should have thought, had he entered the House ignorant of the matter at issue, that his Majesty's Ministers had been guilty of some scandalous dereliction of duty, whereas they had merely added a little further protection to barley. Was the Government of the country so constituted that it could not propose to the House an alteration in a proposition once submitted to it? He (Mr. Peel) should not have expected that the Hon. Member for Westminster, an advocate for popular government and the rights of the people, would raise his voice against the mode in which Ministers had proposed a reasonable alteration in their first plan, which was done in consequence of better information on the subject.

After some discussion, of no particular interest nor conveying any fresh information on the subject, the Resolutions fixing the scale of duty on imported duty were passed. A proposition, however, of the Ministers to increase the rate of duty on barley, excited surprise and opposition. Mr. Canning had stated, that whenever the price of barley was 32s., and under 33s., the duty upon every quarter should be 10s. Last night Mr. C. Grant proposed to fix the duty at 12s. A division took place; but the majority in support of the increased rate was very great, being 215 to 38.—In like manner the duty on oats is to be increased; a tax of 9s. is to be imposed whenever the price in the home market is 24s.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 13.

Mr. Secretary PEEL brought in the Bill to consolidate the Laws regarding Larceny. He said he had three other Bills afterwards to bring in, and there would be another Bill to repeal the various Acts, rendered unnecessary by these Bills, should they pass into Law; and if they pass, all the laws regarding theft would be embraced in about 28 pages, repealing 130 Acts. After these changes, he hoped there would be a reprint of the Statutes, as nearly whole volumes would be rendered unnecessary. The Bill was not quite so concise as the French laws, the conciseness of which the French were beginning to feel; such brevity was not consistent with the character of the English laws. He hoped in these Bills to introduce various alterations that would operate as improvements—such as not making breaking into stables, &c. burglary. Also to amend the law touching getting goods under "false pretences," placing them all under one head. He also directed some attention to the Malicious Trespass Act; he proposed to retain the sum (5l.) that gave the jurisdiction, and instead of three months' imprisonment, he limited it to 10 days for 1l., to 20 days, if 2l. He proposed to exempt all offences under the Game Laws, from this Bill; that was, not to give the summary jurisdiction in addition to the Game Laws. As to another part of the amendments, he proposed that power should be lodged with the Magistrates to mitigate all pecuniary penalties, especially where the law might have been violated without marked malice. In order that they might have the blanks filled up, he hoped the House would allow them to be read a second time, and to go into the Committee pro forma.

Sir J. NEWPORT wished to know whether Ireland was to be included in the plan for consolidation.

Mr. PEEL said it would much embarrass the Bills.

Sir J. NEWPORT mentioned that Ireland would then remain for years without the benefit of any such measure.

Mr. PEEL said he should be glad to aid in such measure if it were practicable.

Mr. HUME asked whether the Right Hon. Gentleman had directed his attention to the Debtor and Creditor Law?—(Hear.)

Mr. PEEL said that his attention was directed generally to the Debtor and Creditor Law, in consequence of what had heretofore taken place in that House.

Sir J. NEWPORT again urged the necessity of assimilating the laws of Ireland with those of England; and if it were not done, he would hereafter take the sense of the House on the subject.—Ordered to be recommitted this day se'nnight.

Mr. Secretary PEEL then brought in the Laws against the Hundreds Bills, and the malicious injury to Property Bill. Read a first and second time, and committed, and ordered to be recommitted on Friday se'nnight.—He then brought in the Acts Repeal Bill, observing, that he had been much indebted to the co-operation of the Judges, as well as of the humblest practitioners, and without remuneration.

Mr. A. DAWSON wondered why this consolidation and attention could not be applied to Ireland; for he was sure that there were many learned gentlemen, who would gladly give their gratuitous attention to the accomplishment of such objects.

Mr. Secretary PEEL hoped too much would not be pressed upon him; and that it would be better to wait a year or two, to see how these consolidations should have worked. A Right Hon. Bart. (Sir J. Newport) had intimated his intention to introduce a Bill to extend the Jury Law to Ireland: he could with pleasure say, that the Jury Bills had answered extremely well in England, not requiring any other Bills to explain or enforce them. He however, could not but urge cautious proceedings; it would be well to see how the changes worked in England.

Mr. S. RICE said, what he wanted was English law in Ireland to be administered by Irish Magistrates. He hoped, when these Bills were passed, the Right Hon. Bart. (Sir J. N.) would move for a Committee to inquire into the propriety of extending such consolidations to Ireland.

Mr. Secretary PEEL begged it to be understood that he had not the least objection to the extension of such consolidations to Ireland; he should be glad to see the desired assimilations; he only wished that they might take place with all possible caution, and after the effects had been seen in England.

Mr. SHADWELL feared that, by attending to the suggestions regarding Ireland, some confusion might result; but recent inquiries showed that the subject had attracted justly serious attention.—The Bill was ordered to be re-considered on Friday se'nnight.

Mr. PORTMAN presented a Petition from Blandford against further concessions to the Roman Catholics. Though he could not concur in its prayer, he though it his duty to present it to the House. He would also take the opportunity of asking the Home Secretary whether he intended to propose any measure for the relief of the distresses of Ireland?

Mr. Secretary PEEL said, he yielded to no man in anxiety for Ireland, but certainly he had no specific measures to relieve the evils of society in Ireland; but if he had, he did not think the Hon. Member had any right to call on him for a premature disclosure of them.

MISSIONARIES IN THE WEST INDIES.

Dr. LUSHINGTON said, he had to bring forward a Motion regarding an act of lawless violence committed on an unoffending Congregation, by an armed body under the orders of a regular Clergyman. He had hardly expected that such violence would take place so soon after the Resolutions of that House; it took place at St. Ann's, Jamaica, on Christmas day last. The clergyman incited the militia to commit acts of outrage; and on the afternoon of that day they committed an outrage on the dwelling of Mr. Radcliffe, Missionary, and fired 14 shots into the said dwelling. It was an act of Providence that murder was not committed. He had understated these atrocious facts; and he begged it to be understood that he did not bring forward this motion at the request of any body of men. He brought it forward for the preservation of religious liberty. The country was much indebted to the Wesleyans for the only instruction given to the unfortunate slaves; but they had had no competitors amongst the members of the Church of England. There was now an effort to rear a regular establishment, but he should lament it, if its object were to exterminate other sects. However, he would not desert them. The established minister who had incited these outrages was named Willis, and he afterwards re-preached the same sermon. He entertained a much better opinion of the inhabitants of Jamaica than of Barbadoes; but he could not, after what occurred in Barbadoes, allow any act of intolerancy against missionaries to elude the notice of that House. Whether the Missionaries surpassed the Church of England, or encouraged that Church to renewed exertions, the result must be beneficial to the practice of morality in the West Indies and the safety of this country. The Hon. Member concluded by moving for copies of all despatches received by his Majesty's Government on the subject he had mentioned.

Mr. WILMOT HORTON said, no despatches on the subject had been received. He thought the Hon. Gentleman could exercise a more sound discretion, by leaving the subject for the present in the hands of Government, assuring him that nothing could be farther from the disposition of Government, than to countenance any act of violence. He trusted in God, that the next despatches would shew, that justice had been done, and that the persons engaged in the atrocity mentioned, had been brought to condign punishment.

The Motion was then put, and agreed to without a division.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY said, on a late occasion he had hazarded an opinion that the Lord Chancellor received 20,000l. a year from the bankruptcy practice in his Court. This statement was contradicted by the Member for Corfe Castle, who said the Chancellor's emoluments from that source did not amount to more than 3,000l. a year. He had since made inquiry on the subject amongst the profession, and he believed it could be proved that the Lord Chancellor had in the last year received 30,000l. from the practice of bankruptcy in his court; out of which he had some salaries to pay, but certainly not to the amount of 10,000l. a year. The Hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for a return of the fees on bankruptcy in the Court of Chancery, from the 1st of October, 1825, to the 1st of October, 1826.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the fees of the Lord Chancellor had been inquired into, and an account laid on the table of the House, down to the year 1811. If the Hon. Gent. would propose to have a return laid on the table of all the fees received by the Lord Chancellor in bankruptcy cases, he should support it, and so would Lord Eldon; and he was confident the average would be found under 4,000l. a year; and if any part of his emoluments were taken away, compensation should be made. He was enabled to say that the whole emoluments were under 15,000l. a year. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY called the attention of the House to the informations under the Custom and Excise Law. The informations under the Custom Laws from 1819 to 1826, were 940, brought for the recovery of 500,000l., of which only 24,448l. ever found its way into the pockets of the public. To recover the sum of 11l. 11s. 6d. the costs incurred were 151l. paid by the Crown; and where the Crown brought an action to recover 600l. at a cost of 270l. they actually compounded for sixty shillings. It was absolutely necessary that these facts should be inquired into.—It was a notorious fact that persons were despatched last year to endeavour to seduce the small shopkeepers in Sussex into the purchase of smuggled articles, and after they were prevailed on, information was given for the purpose of wringing money from them as costs. The Hon. Gentleman moved for copies of bills of costs incurred by the Crown on informations filed under the the customs laws against a number of defendants named in the motion.—Agreed to.

The Spring Guns Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Monday.

The Duke of Clarence's Annuity Bill was ordered to be committed on Monday.

The other orders of the day were disposed of, and the House adjourned at twelve o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14.

Mr. Dugdale brought up the Report of the Pontefract Election Committee, which confirmed the election of the sitting Members; and Lord Milton brought up the Report of the Sudbury Election Committee, which declared Bethel Walroud, Esq. to be duly elected.—Neither petition frivolous or vexatious.

Mr. SYKES presented a petition from the master block-makers of Hull, complaining of the falling off in ship-building. The petioners stated, that in the last year the paupers had increased in a proportion of four to one greater than in any other year in their recollection.

Mr. WARBURTON deeply sympathised in the distress complained of by the petitioners; but he must be allowed to state, that a great portion of it was owing to the measure for which these very persons were so anxious. With respect to the falling off in ship-building, it was easily accounted for by the extent to which this branch of trade was carried on in Canada. By a letter which he had lately received, he learnt that there were no less than thirty ships for sale, all built during the last year. The expense of ship-building in this country was from 20l. to 25l. per ton; in the northern ports it was 14l. a ton, when in Canada it did not amount to more than 7l. per ton. He hoped that Ministers would persevere in the wise line of policy they had adopted.

Mr. J. HEATHCOTE believed the commercial marine to be the keystone of the prosperity of this country, and that it was deserving of the serious attention of that House. The trade of the port of Boston had diminished one-third in British vessels, while in foreign vessels it had been nearly trebled.

Lord MILTON believed the distress complained of by the petitioners to be only a part of that general distress which now affected every part of the commercial community, and that it was wholly attributable to the alteration which had last year taken place in the currency.

Petition brought up, and ordered to be printed.

The Master of the Rolls brought up his Bill for the better regulation of the practice of the High Court of Chancery. The Bill was read a first time, and the second reading appointed for Monday next.

Mr. ABERCROMBY hoped the Master of the Rolls would allow time for the members of the bar to become acquainted with the contents of the Bill.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that nothing could be farther from his intention than to hurry the Bill through the House. If Monday next should be found to be too early a day, he should have no objection to defer the second reading to a later period.

Bill ordered to be printed.

FLEET PRISON.

Mr. HUME presented a petition from the insolvent debtors confined in the Fleet prison, praying that the House would inquire into the state of that prison. The Hon. Member said, that finding the city of London had no controul over it, he should submit to the House, that a committee should be appointed upon the subject, if something were not done in it by the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Alderman WOOD said, that the number of persons confined in that prison precluded the possibility of giving proper accommodation to them all. The city of London had offered to give a spot of about six acres for the purpose of erecting a new prison, and to take the present site at a valuation. The persons, however, to whom this proposal was made, had no money, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department had assured him, that the Treasury was so poor, that no money could be expected from that quarter. The Hon. Member suggested, that a part of the money locked up in Chancery, which amounted to 4 or 5,000,000l. should be employed upon this work, and he cited an act of Parliament which authorized the putting out of the money in the Court of Chancery for a similar use—namely, for the erection of some buildings in Lincoln's Inn.

Mr. HUME said, that in rising to move that the petition be printed, he would take the opportunity of doing justice to Mr. Peel, by informing the House, that the Right Hon. Secretary had appointed a medical gentleman to attend the prisoners—a very necessary person to those who could not afford to pay for medical advice, but one that the prisoners never had before.

Petition ordered to be printed.

Colonel DAVIES presented a petition from the operative sawyers of Worcester, praying for a tax on machinery.

Mr. S. RICE presented a petition from Sir Charles Waller, Bart. praying for the introduction of the poor laws into Ireland.

Ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUME moved for a copy of the bye-laws or rules for the admission of proctors to the Ecclesiastical Court, Doctors' Commons, with the dates of such admission, and by whose authority they were made. The Hon. Member complained that the proctors exacted a sum of 1,000l. from each person desirous to act as proctor. He also enumerated other charges, which he said were equally unjust and oppressive.

Dr. PHILLIMORE had no objection to the production of the papers moved for by the Hon. Member, although, at the same time, he thought it would have been more proper and courteous if the Hon. Member had reserved his comments until the papers were produced.—Motion agreed to.

Mr. HUME rose to move for a return of the number of hackney coach and cabriolet licences granted to the present period. He complained of the monopoly practised under the present system of granting licences, which were reserved for the favourites of the hackney-coach commissioners, to the complete exclusion of industrious and deserving men. An instance, he said, was known of one person, a wine-merchant, who was the owner of 18 or 20 cabriolets, each of which he was in the habit of letting out for 24s. or 25s. a day, giving him an enormous profit, which might be much more beneficially divided between a number of poor men. The gross sum collected last year by the commissioners of hackney coaches amounted to 69,000l., and the expence of collecting the revenue was 12,000l. per annum. In the year 1797, a committee was appointed to take into consideration this department, and they reported that the whole of the duty of collecting the revenue, and granting licences, might be transferred with advantage to the Stamp-office, a measure which the report recommended. He meant to move, at a future period, for a committee to consider the propriety of abolishing the hackney-coach office altogether.

Mr. MABERLY was convinced that a saving of at least 10,000l. a-year would be the effect of acceding to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. HUME moved for a return of the number of officers appointed to commissions in the army since the year 1816, distinguishing the rank of each, and also of the number of officers reduced to half-pay during the same period, distinguishing the rank of each, and those officers who served in India.—Ordered.

The Hon. Gent. then moved for a return of the number of officers on half-pay who had made application to be employed on full pay since January, 1820, together with the number of officers draughted from half to full pay during that period.—Ordered.

Adjourned at half-past six.

THURSDAY, March 15.

Mr. DICKENSON brought up the report of the committee on the Crail election, declaring the sitting member duly elected, and the petition not frivolous.

Lord MILTON said he rose for the purpose of moving the second reading of the Wakefield and Ferrybridge canal bill. This was a bill on which much canvassing had taken place. The only objection made against the hill was on the part of those ladies and gentlemen who held shares in the Aire and Calder Canal, and who thought that this rival establishment would be injurious to their interests. Almost all of those through whose lands it was proposed to run the new canal to Wakefield, were favorable to the measure. He thought the best way of coming to a fair division on the subject would be to allow the bill to go to a committee.

Mr. R. COLBURN opposed the motion. The undertaking was unnecessary, as the proprietors of the Aire and Calder canal were preparing to effect improvements, by which all the objects proposed by the new canal would be obtained.

Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. W. Horton, and Mr. G. Bankes, opposed the motion; and Sir J. Yorke, Mr. Wyville, Mr. Sykes, Lord Normanby, Mr. Crompton, Sir T. Lethbridge, Lord Folkestone, and others, supported it.

The House divided—For the Amendment 133; Against it 130; Majority against the second reading 3.

Mr. CHICHESTER wished to know from the Hon. Member (Mr. Martin) whether it was his intention to bring forward that night the motion of which he had given notice, relative to the county of Galway election.

Mr. MARTIN said, that having, upon consultation with his friends, found there was almost an universal opinion against him, it was now his intention to refer the matter to which he had called the attention of the House, to a select committee, and that he should not trouble the House with the motion of which he had given notice.

COUNTY POLLS.

Lord ALTHORP brought forward his motion for a Committee to inquire into the state and mode of taking polls at county elections—a motion that was brought forward with additional propriety at the beginning of a new Parliament, when facts were fresh in the recollections of parties, and when private interests might not be too strong. He said it was now impossible to avoid "treating." His object was, to have regulations made for the taking of votes in different parts of a County, and to reduce the expences of elections. He concluded with moving for a Committee to ascertain how far such objects were practicable.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was not disposed to resist the motion; but as to taking the poll at different parts of the County, he thought it would remove what was rather useful, the "badgering" of the candidates. (A laugh.)

After a few observations from Lord Althorpe the motion was agreed to, and the Committee appointed.

Mr. SYKES rose to move an inquiry into the conduct of the Corporation of the Borough of Leicester at the late election, in pursuance of a notice he had given on presenting a petition from certain freemen of the borough, complaining of the conduct of the Corporation. He disclaimed all personal feelings towards the Members for the borough, or the Corparation, with none of whom he was acquainted. In the borough of Leicester the right of election was in the Mayor, Burgesses, Freemen, and Inhabitant Householders, the latter of whom amounted to 5,000. The Corporation, however, possessed a power to make non-resident freemen, and the petitioners complained that they abused this power, and in the year 1822 and 1823 they offered the freedom of the borough to upwards of 2,000 persons, for the purpose of drawing the power of returning the representatives. In December, 1822, they sent letters, conferring the freedom of the borough to a great number of persons, stating that they were anxious to increase the number of their freemen by persons of sound constitutional principles, and hoped these persons would take up their freedom without delay, and the Corporation would pay all expenses except 3l. duty to the King. Of the 2000 persons to whom these letters were sent, 800 took up their freedom, of whom 104 were clergymen. He thought the whole conduct of the Corporation, both in making an army of sham votes, in paying a part of the expense of the Candidates, and in their partial conduct at the election, formed as strong a case of illegal and scandalous conduct at an election as was ever brought under the consideration of the House. The Hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the allegations of a petition of the borough of Leicester, complaining of the conduct of the Corporation of the borough of Leicester at the late election for that borough, and to report their opinion to the House.

Mr. WYNN said there was not any one ground stated in the petition, or in the Honourable Gentleman's speech, that called for the interference of the House, except the refusal to take the votes offered for the candidate proposed the 3d day of the election; and that might have been inquired into by an Election Committee.

Sir CHARLES HASTINGS said, there was not a more honourable body of men in the kingdom than the Corporation of Leicester. He had hoped, that when the Hon. Gentleman considered the allegations of the petition, he would have abandoned the motion. If there were any grounds for an inquiry now, they were grounds for a petition against his return, which would have been the proper method of investigating the facts of the case. In fact the petitioners had complained to the Court of King's Bench of some of the facts stated in their petition, and the matter was now pending there.

Mr. PEEL hoped the House would mark with their reprobation these attempts to supersede the operation of the Grenville Act. The Petitioners he was informed had been taking a legal opinion whether they had any case under the Grenville Act, and found they had not; besides, if they had proceeded under the Grenville Act they should have entered into recognizances, they should have borne the expences of their witnesses, and if their Petition was frivolous and vexatious, they would have to pay the expence of the other party. He thought it a trumpery case, not fit to be entertained by the House of Commons. If motions of this description were acceded to, it would prevent appeals to the Grenville Act.

Sir F. BURDETT said that corruption, in this country, was so systematic, that it was well known to exist where, without the power of the House it might be impossible to prove it. If the present motion was dismissed, the public would see it in a determination to oppose every inquiry into abuses of elections. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. VESEY FITZGERALD opposed the motion.

Lord MILTON supported it.

The House divided—

For the motion, 68 | Against it, 92 | Majority, 24.

REFUGE FOR THE DESTITUTE.

Mr. HUME rose to move that an account should be laid before the House of the receipts and expenditure of the Society called the Refuge for the Destitute, for the last seven years; specifying the greatest number of persons ever provided for at one time, with the numbers annually discharged and admitted. The Hon. Member said that the grant of 5,000l. annually made by the House to this institution formed a sufficient ground for his motion to proceed upon. As he understood, for several years past the receipts of the es establisbment had exceeded 12,000l. a year, out of which funds it would scarcely be believed that only 60 persons had been maintained.

Mr. F. BUXTON said, that if such were the case, the expenditure no doubt must be extravagant. The cost must be more than 200l. a year for each individual.

Mr. Alderman WAITHMAN begged to correct his statement. He had meant to say 60 males and 60 females, which was about 100l. for each pauper.

Mr. PEEL said that it was proposed, this year, to lower the parliamentary grant to 4,000l. He was compelled to say—wishing, as he did, very well to the establishment—that he thought its funds might be so administered as to become more extensively useful.

Mr. Alderman ATKINS objected to the calling for accounts of receipt and expenditure. The greater part of the funds of the society were supplied, not from Government, but by voluntary contributions.

Mr. W. SMITH thought the accounts might be given, as parliament contributed so largely to the support of the institution.

Mr. HUME said, that this grant of 5,000l. was one to which he had always objected, and which he wisbed were refused altogether. He did not believe, nor had be ever pelieved, that the money was applied to a fair and useful purpose. For the question of the accounts, he thought not only that societies aided by Government, but even those supported by voluntary contributions alone, ought to be compelled to publish the whole account of their receipts and expenditure every year. It was the only mode of securing them against degenerating into jobs.

Mr. Alderman WAITHMAN said that he understood the receipts of the society for the last year had been 18,000l., of which 2,500l. had been expended in building, and 15,000l. in maintaining 120 persons.

The motion was then agreed to, as far as concerned an account of the number of persons maintained.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 16.

Sir B. MARTIN presented a petition from Plymouth, praying "that our happy Constitution might not be exposed to Popish inroads."—Ordered to be printed. He afterwards presented a petition from the same place, on the subject of the Game Laws.

Sir W. ROWLEY presented a petition from persons in Suffolk, praying for the Repeal of the Act of Edward VI. against Brawling.

Sir J. S. GOOCH said, that this Act certainly contained some extraordinary clauses—punishing with cutting off ears, and if the parties had no ears, to be branded. Ordered to be printed.

Mr. G. DAWSON presented a petition from F. W. West, complaining of the Election Petitions presented against him. On Monday he should move that it be considered by the House.

Mr. C. WYNN did not see how this case could now be considered.

Mr. G. DAWSON said, men and Counsel of the first eminence had thought this case to be one of hardship, and meriting attention.

Mr. C. W. WYNN begged to tell his Hon. Friend that the House had decided a similar point; and that they were not bound to "find understanding" for all persons to construe the act. (Cheers and laughter.) That House would not take its law from Counsel or Judges.

The SPEAKER said this case regarded a double return; that several petitions had been presented on the subject; and that on Monday next he should deem it his duty to call the attention of the House to it. The case regarded the double return for Denbigh. He added, that owing to Mr. Hamlet not having petitioned the House, Mr. West now prayed for an object that did not exist when he before petitioned the House.

After a few other objections urged to the petition by several Members, Mr. Dawson withdrew it.

DUKES OF CLARENCE AND CUMBERLAND.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved that the House go into a Committee on the Duke and Duchess of Clarence's additional Annuity Bill.

Mr. J. MARTIN asked whether the Duke of Cumberland had received the additional 6000l. a year for the education of the young Prince in England. If he had pocketed the money, the House had been deluded.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied that the Duke of Cumberland had not received one farthing of the 6000l. the King not having required the young prince to be brought to this country. (Cheers.)

Mr. J. MARTIN said the additional amount appeared in the finance accounts.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rejoined, that the sum was charged because it might have been demanded, but it had not. (Continued cheers.)

Mr. HUME opposed the Speaker leaving the Chair. It was a mockery to make such grants when the people were starving by housands. They prayed for bread, and all relief was denied It was impossible that the House could continue to have the respect of the country if such unfeeling grants as these were made.

Mr. PLUNKETT supported the grants, and thought they were censurable, if censurable at all, on account of their smallness. He was persuaded that there was no individual in the country, whatever might be his situation, who would refuse his mite.

Alderman WOOD did not agree that the poorest man would be ready to support the grants; he thought the contrary.—(Cries of "Question.")—"Sir, you shall have the question when you please; but that shall not be till I like. (Loud laughter.) I give pain to no man by interrupting him, and I will not be interrupted in this way. (Hear, hear.) The expenditure ought to be reduced; it fell almost wholly upon the lower classes—every man that took his pot of beer or glass of gin contributed to this expenditure. It was uncalled for, and he should resist it. (Applause.)

Sir R. HERON opposed the Grants, as unnecessary and uncalled for, and what the people ought not to have imposed upon them.

The gallery was then cleared for a division. The numbers were—

For the motion, 99 | Against it, 15—Majority in its favour, 84

The House then went into a Committee on the Bill.—Report on Monday.

As the orders of the day were severally postponed,

Mr. HUME said he really could not understand what was the cause of putting off the business of the country night after night in this manner.

Mr. VILLIERS STUART presented a petition from the landowners of the county of Waterford, complaining of the appointment of a stipendiary Magistrate in that county, and moved for the production of papers relating to the appointment.

Mr. GOULBURN expressed his concurrence in the motion, and defended the appointment.

The motion was agreed to.—Adjourned.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRENCH PAPERS.

Paris, March 8.—A very disastrous accident occurred on Sunday, the 4th inst. at Lyons. A new steam-boat, built on the plan of Mr. Raymond, was on that day got ready to proceed up the Rhone, taking advantage of the flood in the river. A number of persons, curious to see the experiment, went on board. The fire was increased until the power of the steam was raised to 110 horse power. The vessel, however, had scarcely began to move, when a terrible explosion took place. The boiler burst, and the vessel was torn transversely into two parts. Fragments of the wreck killed and wounded a number of persons on the adjoining quays of Monsieur and l'Hopital. So great was the concussion, that the houses on the quays were shaken, and the windows shivered in pieces. A letter from Lyons, dated March 5, says:—All the sailors agree, that when the boat blew up, there were about 22 men and a child. Of this number, seven sailors remained unhurt, a journeyman cabinet-maker, and the child he had with him, also escaped; of the other 14 persons, two Frenchmen, a sailor, and a carpenter, were severely wounded on the deck. The third, an Englishman, Thomas Fort, was thrown into the Rhone: though his leg and thigh were broken, and almost his whole body burnt, he had courage to take hold of a piece of wood, on which he was carried to the sand bank opposite to the barracks of the New Custom-house, where he was picked up. He lived till this morning. The fourth, Mr. Steel, was found in the river at the very spot where the vessel parted in the middle; he was still alive when one of the sailors took him out of the water, and had strength to say to him, "Good God, it is all over with me, assist me."—These were the last words he spoke, having expired in the boat which was carrying him on shore. The other ten persons, completing the number of those on board, have totally disappeared.—They are—Mr. Guillard Malezieur, (he was on that part of the deck which blew up. Two of the sailors affirm, that they saw him at a prodigious height in the air, and afterwards perceived his body which the current was carrying above the station of the vessel, whence it is supposed he had fallen into a whirlpool, and remained sunk in it some minutes. We were mistaken in saying that his body had been found,) Mr. Derheims, engineer, builder of the vessel; Mr. Roslaing, his bookkeeper; Messrs. Beraud, boatman; Bernoux, confidential clerk of Mr. Guillard; Pellison, Alexander, and three English workmen in the service of Mr. Steel, William Green, William Brown, and Walter Hood.

Seven persons were killed on the Quai Monsieur, and one on the Quai de l'Hospital. Of the persons wounded, as well on the quays as on the bridge of La Guillotiere, only nine have been taken to the hospital.

On the whole, we find eighteen persons killed at the instant of the catastrophe, eleven in the boat, and seven on the quays; twelve wounded, of whom one died this morning, and another in the course of the day; and lastly, other persons, who being more or less severely injured by the fragments of the machine, were conveyed to their own homes, and whose number is not known.

The Mayor has been to the wreck of the vessel, to see if it was possible to save any of the victims. Many afflicting scenes followed this disaster. Mr. Rougier, in fear for his brother, (one of the victims), sought him among the dead, but he was so dreadfully mutilated, that it was not till a second inspection, that he recognized him by his hand. An expression of terror was observed on the countenance of the dead. This evening, at half-past seven o'clock, the Rhone, in its rise, carried away the remains of the vessel.

By the Paris journals of Wednesday morning, and the Etoile dated Thursday, it appears that Don Miguel is coming to Paris, where he will soon arrive, lodgings being taken for him in the Hotel Meurice. The same paper asserts that this hero of the Apostolicals, after making a short stay in Paris, will proceed, not to Brest, but to Madrid. The Etoile however, contradicts this statement:—

(From the Etoile, dated Thursday, March 15.)

LIES OF THE DAY.

Paris, March 14.—The Quotidienne.—It seems certain, that the Infant Don Miguel is expected very shortly at Paris; we can affirm that lodgings are already bespoken for that prince in the Hotel Meurice. It is also asserted, that the noble Infant, after a short stay at Paris, will set out, not for Brest, but for Madrid.

The Augsbury Gazette announces, in a letter from Mentz, that negociations have been opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, between Prussia and the Netherlands, for the conclusion of a treaty of commerce, and the removal of the difficulties relative to the navigation of the Rhine. The conferences are conducted on the part of Prussia by M. Delius, who has given numerous proofs of enlightened views and distinguished talents.

The purchase of the brig on board which Lord Cochrane has sailed, the fitting it out, and arming it, &c., have cost 260,000 francs. His Lordship takes with him, for the purpose of his expedition, a sum of about 200,000 francs. Besides this, his Lordship is to remit to the Committee at Napoli, which is to pay the crew and the troops under his command, 155,000 francs in money and bills of exchange; in all, 615,000 francs. On communicating these particulars to the Committee at Geneva, M. Eynard adds—"In the state of penury in which Greece now is, it was highly important for the success of the projects of Lord Cochrane, and the necessary preservation of harmony, that that Admiral should be able to maintain the crews, and even to pay and support the troops which he might require from the Government." In order that this expedition might not, in any manner, be an expense to exhausted Greece, several cargoes of provisions have been sent for the use of the squadron.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have received so many letters this last week, that it would be impossible to answer them all, owing to a press of other matter—and we will, therefore, postpone the operation until next week, as a partial reply would be unjust to many contributors.

The able review on MATHEWS's capital entertainment reached us too late for insertion this week—but shall be inserted on Sunday next with pleasure.

THE AGE.

LONDON, MARCH 18.

If it were not for some of the misfortunes of their fellow-creatures, we really hardly know what would become of many of our contemporaries—and the affliction, therefore, which has been visited upon our two great Statesmen, is to them so fortunate an occurrence, that it must not be lightly passed by.

No sooner had the disastrous accident, with which the public has been made acquainted, befallen Lord LIVERPOOL, than every engine of opinion was brought into play for the purpose of nominating his successor. Shortly after this dispensation, Mr. CANNING became more seriously ill than he hitherto had been, and consequently "the war of words" has increased to a pitch now, that, with those who use them, appears to admit of little doubt. It is not enough for these distinguished men to be ill, but they must be dead, or the line of succession can in no wise be determined. Our readers will have read, ere this, that several Premiers have been appointed—we have had my Lord BATHURST, the Duke of WELLINGTON, the Marquis WELLESLEY—and Mr. PEEL, transformed into a Peer; and the chances are, that, before this day week is passed over our heads, we shall have another batch made, both of Peers and Ministers. It is perfectly unnecessary for us to enter into particular refutation of these monstrous rumours—but we cannot help entertaining a feeling of commingled anger and regret, that the political principles of any party should be suffered to proceed to that extreme, which regards neither delicacy, taste, etiquette, or common honesty. Of the plain fact, it is only necessary to say, that every rumour respecting a ministerial change at present, is the pure invention of the Stock Exchange, entitled to no belief, and founded on no criterion. Not any change, whatever may be contemplated, has ever been whispered, much less asserted; and, with this conviction, we earnestly caution the people against any belief of this wild rumour, which is set into circulation for particular purposes, in which the public interest is proposed to be sacrificed on the shrine of private advancement, or opinion.

The following are the latest accounts of the state of the Earl of LIVERPOOL and Mr. CANNING:—

LORD LIVERPOOL.—There was no Medical consultation held yesterday at Fife-house. The answer directed by Dr. Drever to be returned to enquiries, was—"That Lord Liverpool had passed a good night, and was going on well."

MR. CANNING.—The report of the Right Hon. Gentleman's medical attendants yesterday, was—"That Mr. Canning had a good night, and was doing well."

BRIGHTON, TUESDAY, MARCH 13.

Brighton is getting thin, although it has now attained such a height, that it can never again be without a considerable portion of fashionable company. Mrs. Coutts arrived here yesterday morning at the extraordinary hour of between four and five o'clock, having left London on Sunday night at eleven, and travelled all night. The servants were drenched to the skin by the rain which fell on the journey!!!

The gossips of Brighton have been in a perfect consternation, during the whole of this last week, by the extraordinary arrival of Mrs. COUTTS in that town, at the early hour of five o'clock in the morning; and conjecture has consequently been much on the "qui vive," to ascertain the cause of such a momentous proceeding. To a staid, sober, set of people, like the inhabitants of those quiet places between London and Brighton, this journey must have seemed singular indeed; and has, no doubt, been attributed to some vast political circumstance, likely to agitate the fate of empires. But, to a metropolitan imagination, all these things appear as a regular matter of course—for not a day happens but some great people take a frolic of this description into their heads. They dine very late, and get very drunk: and then, by way of winding up the evening, start out of town for "a lark!" as Mrs. COUTTS calls these little innocent amusements. We do not presume to say, that both these consequences befel our friend, "HARRY of Piccadilly," on Sunday evening last; because we have reason to believe, that she and her householder invariably devote the whole of that day to the strict observance of religious duties. Still, it is very extraordinary how such rumours get about—for it has been ascertained, from the report of every coachman, that early on Monday morning not a glass of spirits was to be had on the Brighton road—and as the whole party arrived, soaked through with "wet," and according to the statement, at the head of this article, "the servants were drenched with rain," we should be glad to know what became of the "compounds," the consumption of which, from eleven o'clock on Sunday night, created such a scarcity in this road the whole of the following morning?

By accounts received from Ireland, copied into the paper of one of our cotemporaries, it is thus stated:—

DUBLIN, MARCH 12th.—Friday, after the arrival of the packet bringing the account of the defeat of the Catholic Question in the House of Commons, orders were sent down to the Pigeon House, to forward 5,000,000 rounds of musket ball cartridge to the different garrisons throughout the country.—Freeman's Journal.

This is followed by a commentary, couched in very strong language indeed, charging the Orange party in Ireland with the base intention of exterminating their fellow Catholic countrymen, because, forsooth, the latter do not exactly coincide with them in their religious creed—we cannot refrain from pouring out our reprobation on such an unfounded accusation. If we know any thing of the Orangemen of Ireland—and we have not been remiss in our efforts to obtain an intimate knowledge of their principles—we firmly believe a more liberal set of men never constituted the bulwark of any constitution; loyal to their Monarch—firm supporters of the laws—and having in their hearts charity and good-will towards mankind—it is, therefore, monstrous injustice to such men, to assert that they have used language such as our cotemporary has put into their mouths, when saying, "what can we (meaning the Orangemen) do with a Papist, but exterminate him, or be exterminated by him?" We are anxious to be informed, if this be the kind of doctrine which ought to be imputed to the men by whose exertions the country has been delivered from the horrors of rebellion and civil war—who have fearlessly exposed their lives upon all occasions in which the safety of the Constitution was involved, and triumphantly maintained its independence against the assaults of treason and insurrection. We shall beg leave, therefore, to fling back, on the part of the Orangemen of Ireland, the offensive sentence in which their conduct is delineated, as being much more appropriate to the accusing party, and we assert "there is something altogether frightful in this gratuitous imputation of crimes against a whole community, that we may the more plausibly indulge our own vindictive hatred at its expense." We trust we shall not again have to vindicate the conduct of that respectable and valuable body of men, the Orangemen of Ireland, from such foul and unmerited imputations. They have proved, by their loyalty and attachment to the British Constitution, their value in the State, and we are satisfied their services will be always appreciated by their KING and country.

We shall now enter more fully upon the great question itself—the recent defeat of the Roman Catholic petition. We cannot agree with our contemporary when he asserts, "When we look at Ireland, stripped as she now is, of all rational hope from the clemency or wisdom of her conquerors, we cannot help reverting to the memorable declaration ascribed to a certain chieftain of this age, that the Irish must be re-conquered!" On the contrary, we deny that Ireland has been stripped of all rational hope from the clemency or wisdom of her conquerors. By conquerors, we suppose, is meant the English nation; if so, we boldly assert, that the wisdom and policy of the House of Commons was never more fully exemplified than in the recent decision, by which it rejected the claims of the Roman Catholic petition; and that, so far from depriving the people of Ireland of all hopes from the clemency of the British Nation, the recent decision has given them an assurance that, whenever they deserve to have the clemency of the constitution extended to them, they must seek it by constitutional means; and if their previous conduct be marked by disobedience to the laws, and hostility to the principles of that constitution, instead of enjoying its clemency, they must experience its displeasure.

The recent debates on the motion of Sir F. BURDETT has been distinguished by argument founded on the most elaborate research, and aided by eloquence the most powerful—it may be said to have nearly equalled the eloquence of antient, or surpassed that of modern, times, possessing every thing that genius or art could furnish, in order to control or agitate the human mind—and when it is recollected, the men who had been engaged in the discussion, the conflict of high passions and interests by which they were impelled—when we see them all, of all parties, led to the House as it were "under the wand of the enchanter"—when we call to mind the unrivalled talents of the Statesmen, now no more, whose gigantic strength had either advanced or impeded the progress of this measure—when we are told that the salvation of Ireland, nay of England, also depended on its success; it is impossible for the mind of man to imagine a moment of more vital importance to the British nation, or of deeper interest to the cause of constitutional liberty. Never upon any occasion was there excited such an intense interest; nor is it possible to conceive a question discussed with more deep anxiety for its result by all parties—a fearless magnanimity of principle marked the conduct of those who opposed the measure; whilst its advocates seemed to admit, that if the question was carried, the Constitution would be suspended, it might be said, a new æra had arrived; a new order of things had arisen; a new system of political action had presented itself for the adoption or rejection of the British Senate. We would therefore ask any sober-minded member of society, whether the policy of admitting the Roman Catholic to the full enjoyment of unqualified emancipation, has not been fairly, fully, and impartially discussed? We would also beg leave to point the attention of our readers to the line of conduct pursued by the Members of the Catholic Association for the last year. We would earnestly put before the public eye the mischievous domination exercised over the laity at the late election by the Popish priesthood; and lastly, we would implore the attention of the country to the state of Ireland in the short space of ten days; and then put it to any honest-hearted, loyal individual in the community, to say, whether, in any instance, he ever read or heard of the wisdom and policy of the British Senate, and more fully exemplified, than on the recent decision on the motion for enquiry. We fully agree with those who say Ireland cannot continue much longer in her present condition: we should be very sorry she did. We have contemplated with vast delight the rapid strides she is making to shake off the yoke of religious slavery and Popish errors: we are the more fully persuaded of this by every day's experience—it is a counterpoise to the torrent of political resentment, now so alarmingly, but, we trust, only temporarily felt in that country, to find that the great work for the complete delivery of the Roman Catholic population from the gross and abominable errors of their religion, is proceeding with such unprecedented success—that the march of religious and moral improvement is general—that the poor peasant, who hitherto has been a tool in the hands of the priesthood, to be used for any evil purpose, is now awakened to a sense of the blessings that flow from pure Christianity, and that, in renouncing the gross errors of his former religion, he has opened the way to his own eternal salvation. Let the advocates of political reform say what they will, or think what they will, we will boldly affirm it, and maintain our opinion, in defiance of the sneering infidelity of some individuals, that it is not in unqualified concession to the claims of the Catholics of Ireland, Ireland is to be saved, neither is it in the suppression of this society or that society. Political reformation is totally inadequate to produce the end proposed, the evil is much too deeply seated; it lies in the consciences of men, in the religious creed which they have been taught from childhood to look upon as the purest system of Christianity, as the only true religion by which alone salvation can be obtained.

Here is the evil to be removed—it is this monster of idolatry, superstition and intolerance, which must be encountered—unless every follower of the Church of Rome is brought to abjure the Pope's supremacy, transubstantiation, adoration of the host, communication in one kind, invocation of saints, adoration of images, and reliques, purgatory, and indulgences,—unless, we say, all these abominable errors be renounced, political reformation is futile. The people of Ireland—we mean the Catholic population—pant for a reformation. Let them have that which is true and genuine, not that which is counterfeit and imaginary—let them be fully persuaded of the numerous corruptions of the Court of Rome, how dangerous is their nature and consequences to the true Church of Christianity—and what little hopes now remain of correcting its abuses, unless in a total abolition of her power. Let it be further recollected that, if the Church of Rome continued obstinately in error, notwithstanding the frequent complaints that had been made for ages of her corruptions, by so many great men of her own communion, there is little hope for her reformation now left but in the Omnipotent Arm of the Holy Scriptures—if man has hitherto failed in his efforts to oppose the torrent of irreligion that has issued from the Romish Church, it is full time to appeal to Divine aid to check its overruling influence; indeed, it can hardly be supposed that the Popes of past ages were so totally destitute of forecast and discernment as not to have foreseen that the monstrous power which they acquired in an age of gloomy ignorance, and which was founded in an usurpation on the liberty and understanding of mankind, could not be maintained on the dawn of religious and moral education—no, it was morally impossible that the spiritual power of the See of Rome could hold its empire much longer—a power contrary to the safety, dignity, and independence of thrones—a power which carried unbounded influence with it, by reducing its votaries to a state of mental slavery—a power always in direct opposition to the principles of true Christianity, and subversive of those divine precepts in which alone the true faith is to be found. Of the dangerous exercise of the power of the Pope in temporal concerns, it may not be quite irrelevant to give an instance, from amongst the numerous catalogues of political blasphemies of which the Holy See have been guilty. When the Barons laid the foundation of our glorious Constitution, by extorting Magna Charta from King JOHN, that odious tyrant, who had ingratiated himself with the Pope by the degradation of himself and his kingdom, appealed to him, in order to release him from it, and his Holiness accordingly issued a Bull, in which he says, "from the plenitude of his unlimited power, and the authority which GOD had committed to him to build and destroy kingdoms, to plant and overthrow, he vacated and annulled the whole charter, and absolved the KING and all his subjects from any oath which they might have taken to observe it, and he demanded a general sentence of excommunication against any one who should persevere in maintaining such treasonable and iniquitous pretensions."

Can we give a stronger illustration of the dangerous principle of the domination of the See of Rome than this? and it is only one among the many thousand instances recorded. We really cannot but congratulate the country at the recent happy issue of the question of Catholic Emancipation. It has marked the wisdom of the Cabinet and the wisdom of the Constitution. It has proclaimed the opinion of the British nation to be hostile to the policy of unqualified concession, and thereby effectually sustaining the doctrine which we have hitherto so fearlessly contended for—that the British Constitution can only be permanent by continuing in all things Protestant.

CROCKFORD HOUSE.

A clever book, with this title, has just made its appearance, descriptive of that sink of iniquity, governed by the notorious Fishmonger. We would rather let the author speak for himself, than we speak for him, because we have a great respect for the talents of Mr. LUTTRELL, the author of these facetiæ. The following is a description of Pluto:—

Crockford——but some gawk or quiz
Here may ask who Crockford is?
Who, forsooth! The trump of Fame
Seldom celebrates a name
Through the Country, or in Town,
Of more exquisite renown.
All his coaxing manners praise,
All confess his winning ways.
Though 'tis plainly seen with one eye
He's a dab at making money,
Still his taste (one must commend it),
Next to getting, is to spend it.
Let them hoard their coin who love it,
Crockford has a soul above it.
Reckless he of cons and pros,
Lightly as it comes, it goes,
Still ungrudged and unrepented,
So his members are contented.

He can boast of many debtors,
Every one among his betters.
Never of a score afraid,
Always "blushing to be paid,"
'Tis a luxury to owe him;—
None, if happening not to know him;
None their ignorance should own,
Arguing themselves unknown.

They, perhaps, who love him, wish
He had never dealt in fish;
But, excepting when he nabs
Higher prey by means of crabs,*
Ne'er he'll deal in it again,
Fisher now become of men;
One who still, I own it freely.
Hooks and nets them so genteelly,
That they feel it, as they ought,
Quite a pleasure to be caught.
There. You have your answer, quiz:
Now, you know who Crockford is.

Nor is this account of CROCKY's suppers, or the cormorants who devour them, inferior to the foregoing in sprightliness of thought, or ease of expression:—

Midnight sounds!—'Tis twelve o'clock!
See, like pigeons, how they flock
From the opera, or the play,
Or from t'other side the way.
Some, when gossip scarce requites
Those who linger there, from White's;
Others, little to the cook's ease,
From The Travellers', or Brooks's.
Pleased they ply the four-pronged fork,
Pleased they free the fettered cork,
Where, in rich abundance stored,
Every dainty crowns the board,
Heaped together, to entice
Squeamish tastes, at any price.

Some their hunger ill conceal,
Bent upon a solid meal.
Others carelessly discuss
Early peas or 'sparagus:
'Sparagus, which, passion-stricken
For the young and tender chicken,
And, by pitying knife set free
From the fields of Battersea,
Crowd, in hundred, to be near
What they love so fondly, here.

Some, to slake their glass of sherry,
Dally with the hot-house cherry;
Some at strawberries take their fling,
Which the stout-built wenches bring,
While their arms in cadence swing;
While, with firm yet cautious tread,
Nicely balanced on her head
Each conveys her fragrant load
Safe along the Brentford-road.

Scarcely could the gourmand wish,
Or imagine any dish,
But 'twas here, at the command
Of his eager eyes and hand.
While Champagne, in close array,
Pride of Rheims and Epernay,
Not in bottles, but in dozens,
(Think of that, ye country cousins!)
Stood, of every growth and price,
"Peeping forth" its tubs of ice.

* By means of the deuce-ace.

One more extract, and with that we recommend Mr. LUTTRELL's muse to the perusal of our readers, as an amusing, and very talented production. Mr. LUTTRELL very properly imagines, that a time will come when the fortunes of this notorious "leg" will crumble into dust, and gives him accordingly this timely and friendly warning:—

He, the Chief, whose armies went Rough-shod o'er the Continent,
Who, insatiate of renown,
Thrones and Kingdoms crumbled down,
Deeming he had nothing gained
While unconquered aught remained,
By the flames of Moscow crossed
Mourned his fame and empire lost.
You, though all confess your sway,
Sovereign o'er the realms of Play,
Crockford, if you're wise, refrain
From this dangerous new campaign.
Spite of your achievements, tremble—
Lest your fate his fate resemble,
Lest the Palace in our view
Should a Kremlin prove to you.
What though, beaten, you surrender?
We are ruthless and untender,
And have Forts, within a mile,
Strong as St. Helena's isle.

CHIT-CHAT.

(In a letter from one of the élite in Park-place, to his friend Lord H——, abroad.)

DEAR BOB,—I have delayed writing to you for the last few days, that I might give you as much "town-talk" as possible at a breath. We have been amused for the fortnight past with the squibs, or, to speak nearer the mark, the crackers, which have been circulated respecting the affair at Brookes's, and if I were only to tell you half that I have heard, it would fill a quire, instead of a sheet, of paper. They say that little KEATING, CORNWALL'S "classical soul," on hearing of TOM RAIKES's "gallant conduct," made the following classical quotation:—

"Crescit occulto, velut arbor ævo
Fama Glengalli; micat inter omnes
Raikium siclus, velut inter ignes
Luna minores."

—which is very fair for KEATING, "don't you think so?" It was a most absurd thing, from beginning to the end; and poor TOM is certainly to be pitied throughout—his friends, who egged him on to the commission of an offence, deserted him, when he had committed it. TOM tried every one to second him—he made sure of STOPFORD, but the General refused—the KANG is nearly the only one who did not flinch. You of course read his apology to the Club—there will be some others to be made, so the merchant's "circular" will be in great requisition. RAIKES had a half satirical, and half savage, laugh on his countenance, just after insulting BROUGHAM; upon which BROUGHAM said, when mentioning it afterwards, that he literally "grinned through his choler." CHAMBRE is annoyed that THE AGE did not mention his winning a picture from the Fishmonger, as well as LYSTER—lucky for CROCKY the six mains running were not against the bank. PHILLIPS, the auctioneer, has advertised HAYNE's effects, or rather defects, for sale, and among the rest, the portrait of Miss FOOTE, by STUMP. HAYNE asked CARTER (the man that old FOOTE used to call Magna Carter) if he should part with Miss FOOTE's picture for the benefit of his pocket—"To be sure," said CARTER, "she has picked your's enough already." BALL HUGHES imagines the opera of La Schiava en Bagdad to be another version of the Barber of Seville, pronouncing it "The shaver of Bagdad." BALL is really capital fun, as you can swear to. MARTIN did not bring on his motion respecting CLANRICARDE—he was afraid so to do, and would not have had a leg to stand on, had he done it. The pimping parson is in full force at the Opera House, though being cut by CHESTERFIELD, has lessened both his dignity and income.

The rumours about a change of Ministry are all absurd—believe nothing, and you will be sure to be on the right side. I know nothing about theatres, excepting that nobody goes to them. Did you hear of the candlestick story in Pall-mall? S. joins her regards to those of Your's, D.

The CHIEF JUSTICE has bound over the combatants not to leave the kingdom—so, as TOM can't "fight" for a year, in any part of the habitable globe, he'll lead a nice life of it. Remember me to MADEMOISELLE.

THEATRICALS.

"There have been rare doings at the Gordon Arms," since we last gave an account of them—at least plenty of entertainment for the money, though not plenty of money for the entertainment!

PEAKE's farce of Comfortable Lodgings is a very amusing trifle—perhaps not altogether as complete a composition, of the kind, as the £.100 Note, and other pieces of that stamp; but, nevertheless, extremely clever. We have seldom seen LISTON to more advantage than in the character of Hippington Miff; for he hits off his author quite as much, and as well, as his author hits off him. It is a difficult thing to take measure of LISTON—at least to fit him—and the experience of several years has convinced us that every one's measure does not suit him. HARLEY was quite diverting in Rigmarole, and contributed materially to help the farce throughout. These two comedians pull admirably together—they do not interfere with each other, but, on the contrary, form a distinct and individual feature each. Comfortable Lodgings has improved materially upon acquaintance—it was partly condemned the first night—so was the one at the opposite house—but they have since gradually and deservedly worked themselves into favour.

A Gentleman (Heaven help the mark!) made his appearance at Drury Lane on Monday last, in Othello—"there are more fools in this wide world than the Gods ever made"—and this was an excellent sample of one.

Considerable expectation was excited respecting the production of the Wife's Stratagem, on Tuesday last, at Covent Garden. SHIRLEY (on whose Gamester the comedy was founded) was an eminent dramatist of the seventeenth century—Mr. POOLE, the founder, is an eminent dramatist of the nineteenth century—and the play had the advantage of much talent in its representation. We were pleased with the comedy throughout; and if there is not an intensity of interest in every scene, there is never any total want of it. The commission of all those claptraps and equivoques, by which modern productions are crammed down an auditor's throat, has been studiously avoided by Mr. POOLE, to his infinite credit and advantage; and his play may therefore be read with as much gratification in one's study, as it is seen in one's private box. Mr. CHARLES KEMBLE (if he still forms one of the corps dramatique of this theatre) should have played JONES's part, and JONES have played WARDE's—for this reason, that KEMBLE can personate light comedy, and interest—while WARDE fails in the first, and JONES in the latter qualification. We do not, by this remark, mean to disparage either party: for JONES was very diverting, whenever he was left to the volatility of his own mind—and only failed when doomed to the delivery of a piece of sentiment, for which the Gods never decreed him, We cannot abide WARDE out of "a shape"—he has neither legs nor face adapted to modern attire—in tragedy, his true and proper element, he is excellent and noble—in comedy he is neither one nor the other—but WARDE may console himself with the knowledge, that no eminent actor, but GARRICK, was barely tolerable in both. Mr. FARREN maintained the reputation of his unique talent, and the little personage KEELEY was as highly diverting—they played well into each others' hands.

Mr. POOLE was still more fortunate with his ladies, which, we should imagine, he must be desirous should always be the case. The onus probandi lay with Madame VESTRIS, whose performance of Arabella has elicited a degree of comic talent, which her admirers had not hitherto given her credit for; and which is calculated to make her a still more important feature in dramatic annals, than she has been. We are free to confess, that we did not think she could so safely be entrusted with the weight of a comedy on her shoulders—to say that she would eminently bear it, never entered our imaginations. She has done herself enormous credit—for she has laid under considerable obligations the public, Mr. POOLE, and the composer of a ballad, entitled "He's a charming fellow," which she sung with such effect, as to demand an unanimous encore. This is a species of ballad, which none can handle like VESTRIS—its simplicity and her naiveté will verify our prediction, of its being a second Cherry Ripe—a monstrous nuisance to every one, but the publishers and barrel-organists. Mrs. CHATTERLEY was "coldly correct, and critically dull," in Mrs. Wilding, but became for a moment animated in the scene, where she displays the ring to her husband, which he had intended for Arabella. Mrs. CHATTERLEY, would, however, have been seen to more advantage, if she had not been continually in contact with Madame VESTRIS, who is (as WINSTON's ancestor, Hamlet, expresses it) "the admired of all beholders." We cannot compliment the gentlemen on the propriety of their costume, for it would puzzle any one to determine in what æra, since the flood, the coat, waistcoats, and tights of the present day were worn, with a quantity of tinsel at the edges, and a lot of silver frogs for buttons. The personages at the table, who had nothing to do but drink a dilution of ale and water, (your stage substitute for sherry wine) were of better sightliness than such men usually are, and materially aided appearance. It was not to be expected this comedy would bring money—"the times are out of joint" at Covent-garden Theatre, and nothing would be very attractive there now, unless HORACE TWISS were to deliver his late Chancery speech from the stage; and then the few, now in doubt as to how great a fool he is, would instantly go to be convinced of it.

We perceive by the papers, that Madame VESTRIS has been playing fine havoc with the hearts and heads of the Bristol people, at their Concerts—that Miss FOOTE has received 10*l.* at Taunton—that KEAN has failed at Manchester—and Mrs. WAYLETT been astonishing the natives (we mean the inhabitants, and not the oysters) at Lynn, by the simplicity and sweetness of her ballad singing—then we find, moreover, that Sir GEORGE SMART has nearly completed an opera for the King's Theatre, and will also have a tragedy ready for ELLISTON, by the time HIS EXCELLENCY redivivus opens the Whitechapel Theatre. These things, for the most part, look well for the profession and the professors.

THE KING'S COURT.

Wednesday afternoon, at a quarter before two o'clock, his Majesty arrived in his travelling chariot, with outriders, escorted by a party of the 17th Lancers, at his Palace, at St. James's, from his Royal Lodge, in Windsor Park. The King looked pale and indisposed.

Soon after his arrival, his Majesty held a Court, at which, it being the first Court since the lamented decease of the Duke of York, all who attended appeared in full mourning, according to the King's commands.

The Yeomen Guard wore crape round their hats, their partisans were also covered with crape; they had also black stockings, gloves, &c. The Yeoman Usher's Silver Stick was likewise covered with crape.

The Bishop of Chichester was introduced to his Majesty, and kissed hands, upon his being appointed to be Clerk of the Closet.

The Rev. Dr. Lloyd did homage before the King, upon his being elected to the Bishopric of Oxford.

Mr. Secretary Peel, and the Bishop of Chichester, as Clerk of the Closet, assisted at the ceremony.

Dr. Kaye, late Bishop of Bristol, also did homage upon his being translated to the See of Lincoln.

His Majesty then held a Privy Council, at which some alterations were made in the pricked list of Sheriffs for the present year.

Mr. Greville attended as Clerk of the Council.

The Recorder of London was admitted into the presence of the King in Council, when he made a report of the convicts capitally convicted at Justice-hall, in the Old Bailey, at the December and January sessions.

His Majesty gave audiences to the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Secretary Peel, Earl of Harrowby, the Duke of Wellington, and Lord Beresford.

Earl De Lawarr and Sir Andrew Barnard were the Lord and Groom in Waiting.

The Court closed about a quarter before six o'clock, and a few minutes after his Majesty left the palace in his travelling chariot, on his return to the Royal Lodge, Windsor Park.

As the King left the Palace his Majesty was loudly cheered by a numerous assemblage of respectable persons who had collected round the garden gate.

We are likely to be deluged this season with novels, delineating high life, and all written anonymously, but loudly whispered to be by noble authors. Two or three are already announced from the publishers of "Almack's." Let them take care. That novel is now clearly traced to Mr. T—e H—k; and the detector is still in "Cockney Land," and will, we have no doubt, be at their heels at every step they take.

The Revue Encyclopedique of last month, speaks very handsomely of Mr. Boileau's Linguist, which our Reviewers have not yet thought proper to notice, though it is a work of great merit, and well calculated to assist the study of the two most useful languages of the Continent. It is much more entertaining than its title, although very appropriate, would lead one to suspect.

It is not generally known that the only house on the south side of Pall Mall, which does not stand on Crown Land, is owned and occupied by Dr. Heberden, and that property is freehold. On the site of it formerly stood the mansion of Nell Gwynne, which was given to her by that profligate Monarch Charles II., and which was then made freehold, and has been alienated from the Crown ever since.

It will be seen, in the debate of Wednesday, on the state of the Fleet Prison, that the suggestion contained in the THE AGE a fortnight ago, that a medical gentleman should be appointed to attend the prisoners, has been humanely attended to by Mr. Peel. Mr. Hume said it was but just to acquaint the House of the adoption of this salutary hint.

That elegant and beautiful article, British Leghorn, originally introduced by Vyse, of Ludgate-street, (and is still the only house to obtain the finest quality,) is certainly very superior to any thing of the kind that has been inveuted. We have likewise good authority in stating, that it will be most prevalent among the Nobility the ensuing season.

A few nights ago, the residence of a gentleman in Grosvenor-sqnare, was broken into, and a valuable gold watch stolen, together with two gold seals and a key. A considerable reward has been offered for the apprehension of the offenders.

On Wednesday night, the house of Mr. Cauldon, in Paul's-place, Walworth, was broken into, and the bottom part of it completely ransacked, and stripped of plate and clothes to a considerable amount.

In consequence of the recent appointments of Commander-in-Chief and Constable of the Tower, which his Majesty has been pleased to confer upon his Grace the Duke of Wellington, requiring his constant and unremitting residence and attention in town, the Duke has disposed of his farming stock and agricultural implements upon his farms near Strathfieldsay, Hants. The sale took place on Tuesday.

A few nights ago, the house of Mr. Matthewson, in the oval at Kennington, was broken into, and robbed of a great quantity of plate and clothes.

The premisses of Messrs. Snell and Brice, of London Wall, was entered a few days back, and some huudred of pounds worth of satin, silk, and bombazines stolen.

Accounts from Sierra Leone are of the most afflicting description. Most of the remaining Europeans were in a sickly state from the effects of the pestilential climate.

HAYMARKET.—We were much delighted with Mr. HENRY'S Whims and Wonders on Friday night. The entertainment is becoming more mellowed, and went of with increased eclat. The house was fashionably attended. Amongst the company we noticed the Lord Chamberlain and party, who appeared highly amused with Mr. Henry's exertions.

A new edition of Sir John Chiverton is preparing for immediate publication.

The letters from Manchester state, that there was a great revival of trade on the market day (Tuesday). The purchases were extensive. but there was no improvement in the prices, and the goods that were selected were chiefly for the home trade.

The agriculturists of Durham are exulting on the favourable tendency of the proposed alterations in the Corn Laws. A correspondent says, "The agriculturists at Durham are as erect in the stirrups, as a Yeomanry Cavalry Serjeant on a day of review, in consequence of the proposed corn measures, under the expectation of their situation being considerably bettered by them. Indeed the corn on Saturday advanced a shilling a boll. A dinner was given to George Baker, Esq. of Elemore Hall, on that day, at the Waterloo Inn, for his indefatigable exertions in furthering the interests of the agriculturists."—Tyne Mercury.

FROM THE MONTHLY REVIEW.—The new novel of "Almack's" may be said to present masterly representations of the leading features of fashionable existence, the country, and its amusements, the routs, dinners, and the Opera, &c. in town, and the balls at Almack's. It seems to have been the sole object of the writer to give a natural representation of the manners, the conversation, and, in short, the every-day employments of the Aristocratic circles; and she has succeeded to the fullest extent. Readers of every class cannot fail to be amused with a work so full of variety, and of elegant satire, controlled throughout by sound good sense, and informed by a spirit that is remarkable for its accuteness of observation.

Some fresh troops are under orders for embarkation for Portugal, rendered necessary, as is understood, by the last despatch from General Clinton. The force intended to be sent consists of detachments of 12th Lancers, Grenadier Guards, and 4th Regiment of Infantry, which will embark in the course of this week at Portsmouth. Detachments, also, belonging to the 23d and 43d regiments will embark this week at Plymouth for Portugal.

RECORDER'S REPORT.

The Recorder of London Wednesday attended the Council and made a Report to the King of the following prisoners under sentence of death in Newgate, namely—Henry Dunn, aged 21; George Hall, 11; John Smith, 19; Thomas Wilkinson, 17; Henry Wright, 19; Samuel Clarke, 15; Isaac Harris, 13; Ann Garnett, 30; Elizabeth Brown, 52; Honor Baldwin, 28; Samuel Wilson, 34; William Davies, 26; Daniel Burns, 16; William Jones, 14; Richard Hill, 50; and Thomas Vandera, 23, for stealing in a dwelling-house to the value of 40 shillings. Henry Bayley, aged 20; Richard Arnold, 20; John Andrew Meek, 16; Benjamin Brown, 20; John Adams, 18; Joseph Finch, 19; Theresa Davis, 40; Charles Lewis, 25; John Cranley, 23; Edward Webster, 20; Thomas Williams, 20; James Wilson, 18; William Howard, 21; Frederick Langley, 20; and Robert Young, 34, for burglary.—John Bunyan, 25, and George Horne, 19, for horse-stealing. Royal Keats, 31, and William Keats, 19, for sheep-stealing.—William Stevens, 21; Thomas Brakney, 16; Joseph Whitehead, 14; Mary Ann Sullivan, 20, and Martha Bellamy, 16, for robbery on a person. James Wingfield, 25, for rape. Thomas Canning, 22, and Jonathan Batty, 15, for Housebreaking in the day tiue. Daniel Davis, 20, for stealing a letter while employed at the General Post Office. Richard Hayes, 42, for cattle-stealing.

His Majesty was graciously pleased to respite, during his Royal Pleasure, all the said prisoners, excepting Royal Keates, James Wingfield, William Davies, Daniel Davis, and Robert Young, upon whom the law is left to take its course, and they are ordered to be executed on Tuesday next, the 20th instant.

THE LATE STORM.

The accounts that are daily reaching us of the effects of the late storm are very distressing. A number of people are missing; but as it is only in some places the thaw has cleared the ground, their friends are still in uncertainty as to their fate. The town of Lanark was for a whole week entirely shut up: not a vehicle of any description either arriving or going away; nothing but the dreary appearance of an almost worn out pedestrian rendered the already dismal appearance of the town more affecting; not a church door was opened on the 4th, and at Lesmahagow, the sacrament was put off. About 250 men were employed clearing the roads in the Glasgow direction, and corresponding numbers in others. The Strathaven carriers all left Glasgow together; when about half way, they found their strength failing and their horses worse; they left their carts and were driving their horses to the nearest farm-house; they suddenly missed one of their number, when they went back, and by his cries, found him covered with snow and nearly dead. They were not, however, able to extricate his horses. On returning in the morning, they found one of them dead. The other they got out and restored with difficulty. The unfortunate young men, sons of Mr. Jamieson, the proprietor of the farm of Craigton, both of whom perished near Largs, in the storm of Saturday week, were interred on Wednesday. Mr. Jamieson is recovering, but was unable to attend their funeral. We understand that the elder of the two expired first, and the other laid himself down beside him, in the vain attempt to reanimate the vital spark by the warmth of his own body, but he too soon sunk under the "pelting of the pitiless storm." Mr. Jamieson, the father, had left them to seek his way to and obtain assistance at the farm of Knock, and had stripped himself of his great coat, to enable his sons the better to bear up against the cold in his absence. It is therefore the more extraordinary that he should have been the survivor; but this is partly accounted for by the circumstance that he wore a very thick flannel under-vest. He had not proceeded far, when he got immersed in a wreath of snow, and lost all recollection, till revived by the humane efforts of those who discovered him in the morning. The trustees on the Glasgow and Carlisle road have been using every exertion to clear the roads of snow, so as to allow the regular passage of the mails. The whole road was cleared on Wednesday forenoon, but the second storm rendered it necessary to begin the work anew, and it is to the exertions of those employed by them that the mails have been enabled to get forward. The snow has been equally heavy in the sister island as it has been here. At mid-day, on Friday, all the roads round Belfast were impassable, and a number of the mails were due.—Glasgow Chronicle, March 13.

Among the melancholy accidents occasioned by the storm, is the lamented death of a respectable couple who resided near Holytown. They had a daughter who had gone to Wishawton on Saturday, and becoming alarmed for her safety, they went out to meet her. The storm increasing, they left their daughter at a friend's on the road, and intended to make home themselves. It appeared, however, that they had been overcome within about five hundred yards of a house; for on Sunday morning the man's hand being seen beneath a wreath of snow, led to a search, and the unfortunate pair were found within three yards of each other.—The snow has already disappeared from our streets, though the cold boisterous winds, that have done so much damage of late, still continue. The adjacent country is also partly uncovered, and the mails now arrive with nearly their usual regularity. So completely were the roads blocked up with the snow on Friday, that only six carriers from the country were in the market in the High-street on Saturday morning; and, in consequence, the prices of eggs, butter, and poultry, were greatly raised. A dozen of eggs, which on the preceding Saturday sold at 8d. was raised to 1s. 6d. and an additional 1d. was put on the pound of butter.—Edinburgh Observer, March 13.

OPENING A MUMMY.

On Sunday the Duchess d'Angouleme, the Foreign Ministers, and several curious persons, attended the opening of an Egyptian mummy, in the Gallery of Egyptian Antiquities.

After opening the exterior coffin, which presented many difficulties, they proceeded to take off the bandages, which, from the head to the feet, made at least twenty turns. The body, thanks to the bituminous substances used for embalming, was in a perfect state of preservation. All the parts were distinct—the nails of the fingers were remarkably long, and the hair had retained its fair colour; the eyes had been replaced by enamel. This singularity had only been observed in one instance before.

The following circumstance made the operation very remarkable: They found two manuscripts upon papyrus—one round the head, the other round the breast. The perfect state in which these manuscripts were found enabled M. Champollion, jun. to read the precious inscription. The body is that of Tete-Muthis, the Minervienne, or Athenean Girl, Keeper of the little Temple of Isis, at Thebes. A necklace, or collar of serpents, forming circles, which, with the Egyptians, was a symbol of Eternity, was found among other emblems.

After the application of boiling water during a quarter of an hour, the attentive reader of the manuscripts could not discover any date; it is, however, believed, that this Mummy was made 300 years since. The skin, which is still brown, retained its elasticity. Several of the parts were also humid. The membrane of the brain was in a state of preservation. They had broken the spheroid of the superior part of the pharynx, to introduce to the interior of the head a considerable quantity of linen.

ACCIDENT AT LONDON BRIDGE.—An Inquest was held at St. Thomas's Hospital on Tuesday on the body of a man named Ward, who, while employed with two others in pulling down part of one of the arches of Old London Bridge, on Saturday se'nnight, was buried under a quantity of brickwork and rubbish which fell upon him, by which his skull was fractured, and both his arms, his right thigh, and several ribs were broken. When dug out he was quite dead. Verdict, "Accidental Death."

LENT ASSIZES.

WESTERN CIRCUIT—SALISBURY, MARCH, 13.

Thomas Moller and James Cadell were indicted for uttering a 5l. Bank of England note, well knowing the same to be forged.

From the evidence it appeared that the prisoners went to the house of a Mr. Wix, a hatter, residing at Trowbridge, and purchased a hat for a guinea, which was paid for with a 5l. Bank of England note, and the change received; the hat was left for a short time at the hatter's, but shortly after Cadell returned for it, and took it away. The note being discovered to be a forgery, the prisoners were pursued and taken into custody, and, on being questioned, readily admitted that they had purchased the hat, and paid for it with a 5l. note. In being brought back to Trowbridge, Mr. Wix walked foremost with Moller, and another person behind with Cadell, in custody. On their way thither, the person with Cadell observed him shift his arm, but thought it was only to ease his arm, as his great coat was resting upon it. A person, however, who passed by a moment afterwards, perceived some paper floating on the road-side ditch, and on examining it, it proved to be a forged 5l. note.

Amongst the other evidence, it appeared that Moller had passed a forged 1l. note to a travelling linen-draper in the purchase of five handerchiefs, and that on the preceding day, Cadell had purchased of the same person a shawl for thirty shillings, and had tendered in payment a 5l. note, in change for which the 1l. note of the day before was given; to this note Cadell objected, as it was a little torn, but as the pedlar did not change it, he subsequently bought handkerchiefs to the amount of 18s., and gave that torn note in payment, receiving 2s. in change.

The Jury, after five or six minutes' consultation, returned a verdict of guilty against the prisoners, who were told by Mr. Justice Park that he felt himself justified in promising to recommend their lives to the mercy of his Majesty, and he had no doubt that that recommendation would be attended to; but beyond that he could give them no hopes—next to death they would be sentenced to the severest punishment.

A young gentleman of the name of Dash, of Wootten Bassett, apparently about ten years of age, was arraigned for felony. His childhood attracted the attention of the court. On examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, it appeared that he had taken a rabbit from his master's rabbit-house (with whom he went to school,) because another boy, also at school, had taken from him a ball of string, value 6d., and had killed the rabbit in revenge. When charged with it, he denied the fact, and was taken before the magistrates, who bound him over to the assizes, for felony!!!

The Judge said, "This is no felony—the boy ought to have been whipped by the master, but not to have been brought here. The magistrates ought not to have bound him over." To the jury, "Gentlemen this is no felony—you must acquit him."

Mr. Gunning applied for the expenses.

The Judge.—No, I shall not allow them in this case. A mere school boy to be indicted for felony!

His Lordship complained greatly of the Courts, and said he would never come the circuit again, if better accomodations were not secured. The Courts would not hold a tenth part of those who wished to get in, and, as to passing from Hall to Hall, it was utterly impossible.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14.

Henry Smith was indicted for carnally knowing Ann Fleck, a child under ten years of age.

Sarah Barratt examined by Mr. Bingham—I am twelve years of age; I live at Swindon; in July last I was employed by Mrs. Fleck to take care of her two children, while she went out to work in a field at Rawton. She told me to bring the two children to her between nine and ten o'clock; one was Ann Fleck, near six years old, and the other a child in arms. I set out with the two children; on the road I saw the prisoner; he was sitting on the side of the road with a little boy, named Edwards, who is here. The prisoner came and took Ann Fleck away; he said he wanted her to hold a gate open. He took her in his arms half way down the lane, and then put her down and let her walk. They walked into some stalls on Mr. Butler's ground; the stalls are to keep cows in; they were some time in the stalls, and I went down because they were gone so long; without going away from where I was sitting, I could not see them; I cannot tell how long the time was that they were in the stalls; when I came there, I looked through a hole; the prisoner could not see me. [Here the witness described the situation of the prisoner and child.]

Elizabeth Fleck, the mother of Ann Fleck, proved the accomplishment of all that was necessary to constitute the capital offence.

The prisoner was then called on for his defence. He stated that he never saw either of the children, first or last, until he was taken before the magistrates, and if he had been guilty of the crime he would not have got work in the neighbourhood where it was committed.

The Learned Judge then summed up; and the Jury immediately found the prisoner Guilty.

The Judge then proceeded in the usual form to pass the sentence of the law. He said, I am quite satisfied with the verdict given by the Jury, and of your guilt. It is a most heinous offence, and one which requires the utmost extent of the law to be exercised. This is not the first time you have been convicted of a similar offence, although the capital one had not been brought home to you. In the Lent Assizes of 1824, I find you were sentenced to suffer imprisonment for 18 months, for an assault with intent; and since this trial has been going on, the Grand Jury has found a true bill for another assault, which, I doubt not, would have been brought home to you. I dare not allow you to live any longer, and therefore most earnestly entreat you to prepare for your great account. You have been in prison ever since August last, and under a person capable of giving you that instruction that is necessary to prepare you for that account which you will shortly have to give. You will yet have some short time to live, which time I entreat you to prepare for another world. The sentence of the Court is, and I adjudge, that you, Henry Smith, be taken from hence to whence you came, and from thence to the place of execution, and that you be hanged by the neck till dead.

WINCHESTER, MARCH 9.

CROWN SIDE.

David Allee was indicted for cutting and maiming John Hall, under Lord Ellenborough's Act.

It appeared that the prisoner, with others, made an attempt to break into the house of a Mrs. Osgood. During their attempt the alarm was given, and the prosecutor, Hall, with one or two others, endeavoured to seize him and the gang. The prisoner struggled extremely, and with something (the prosecutor could not see what, owing to the darkness of the night,) that he had in his hand, he struck him a furious blow across his bat, which went through the beaver and lining, and inflicted a wound on his head, from which there was a considerable effusion of blood.—The Jury, without hesitation, found the prisoner Guilty.

Mr. Justice Burrough immediately ordered him to be brought up for judgment, and proceeded to pass sentence of death upon him, giving him no hopes of mercy. He said that his case was much too aggravated to have any mitigation of his sentence extended towards him; and he therefore entreated him to make a good use of the ten days or a fortnight which there remained for him in this world.

HERTFORDSHIRE.

DENHAM V. RAMSAY AND ANOTHER.

This was an action on the statute 57 Geo. III. c. 19, against two of the inhabitants of the hundred of Hertford, to recover compensation for the destruction of the plaintiff's property, by a riotous mob, at the late General Election for the borough of Hertford.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Denham, keeps the Salisbury Arms Inn, at Hertford. At the last General Election for the borough, the candidates were Mr. Byron, Mr. Duncan, and Mr. Bulwer. The party of the first named Gentleman held their meetings at the plaintiff's house. On the 14th of June the poll closed, after three days contest, and Mr. Byron, and Mr. Duncan, were declared duly elected. The former Gentleman was three a-head of the latter upon the poll. About seven o'clock in the evening, whilst Mr. Byron and his friends were celebrating their triumph at the Salisbury Arms, Mr. Duncan and his party paraded the town with a band of music, playing the tune of "See, the Conquering Hero comes." As the procession was passing the Salisbury Arms, some one of Mr. Byron's party threw out of the window a piece of paper, on which was written the state of the poll, and the paper lodged on Mr. Duncan's hat. This was construed into an insult by the latter Gentleman's party. The windows on each side of the house were broken. The injury to the plaintiff was not confined to the destruction of her windows, but several valuable looking-glasses, the tables and chairs, and a large quantity of wine glasses and decanters, were destroyed by the showers of paving-stones which were hurled into the room. The damages sustained by the plaintiff, amounted to about 70l.

The Jury, under the Learned Judge's directions, found their verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, Seventy Pounds.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—LANCASTER, March 12.

CROWN COURT.

Mr. Justice Bayley entered the Court at ten o'clock this morning, and immediately proceeded to charge the Grand Jury. His Lordship observed that although the calendar was filled with offences of a serious description, all of which would require their attention, yet there was only one case which would require particular observation from him. The case to which he alluded was an indictment which he understood would be presented, founded on the 48th Geo. III., for maliciously shooting with intent to kill or do some grievous bodily harm. His Lordship minutely explained the law upon the case, and the Grand Jury then withdrew.

CIVIL SIDE—(Before Mr. Baron Hullock.)

MR. WAKEFIELD.

Mr. Sergeant Cross, at the rising of the Court, stated to his Lordship that there were two indictments standing at the head of the second list, for the trial of which it was extremely desirable that a particular day should be fixed. He wished to know if it would suit his Lordship's convenience to take them on Monday next.

Mr. Baron Hullock.—I fear not. They are special juries, I suppose.

Mr. Sergeant Cross.—They are, my Lord. As they stand at the head of the second list, it is probable that they will come on in regular order before that day; but we wish to have a day fixed, in order to let the witnesses know when they ought to be in attendance.

Mr. Baron Hullock.—My fear is, not that Monday will be too late, but that it will be too soon. Of course I cannot delay the other suitors of the Court on account of these trials. Would it not be better to fix a later day?

Mr. Parke suggested Wednesday or Thursday. The object of the application was only to have some day fixed.

It was ultimately arranged that the trial should stand fixed for Thursday the 22nd of March.

The cases tried in this court to-day were, with one exception, undefended, and did not possess the slightest interest.

NORFOLK CIRCUIT.—AYLESBURY, March 13.

Ambrose Lester and John Lester were indicted for an assault, committed on George Ayling, on the night of the 19th of December, 1825.

The prisoners had been tried, in an earlier part of these Assizes, for entering a certain close belonging to the Duke of Buckingham, with intent to destroy game, and for being afterwards found armed, in the night, in the same close. The proof that it was the same close not being sufficiently strong, they were acquitted.

Daniel Humphries deposed that he was out on the watch for poachers on the night of December 19, 1825, in a place called Welsh-lane, about half a mile from Stowe-gardens. George Ayling, John Turpin, and Jas. Beckett were with him. Ayling and Beckett were gamekeepers to the Duke of Buckingham. Between ten and eleven o'clock they heard a hare cry out, as if in a snare, and went in the direction of the noise. They then heard a second cry, and saw some men near the hedge, on the opposite side of the road, and heard a dog pant; the keepers took off their great coats, and got over the hedge into the road, on which the men ran away to a gap in the hedge, through which they got into the field. Witness caught the last man as he got through the gap; one of the men said, "Let that man go, you are not going to have him." A fight took place directly, and the other men came up, armed with bludgeons, and knocked witness down; he let the man go; saw Ayling and Turpin lying on the ground, much beaten; Turpin was cut across the head; the night was moonlight; the men all got away.

Cross-examined—They were all four together; three of them had sticks, and Ayling had a flail.

By the Judge—Could not see who gave the first blow.

James Beckett confirmed this account.

John Turpin was knocked down, and got his head cut.

George Ayling had a flail when he came up with the prisoners. Ambrose Lester hit him, and knocked his teeth out; John fell on him, and knocked him down; they left him senseless on the ground.

By the Judge—Did not know the men before.

Mr. Justice Gazelee charged the Jury. They would have to consider whether these men were out for the purpose of killing game; if so, the keepers were justified in taking them; and if not, they would determine whether the violence used was not more than necessary to rescue themselves out of the hands of the keepers.

This being the last trial, the Court waited a considerable time for the verdict, when the foreman addressed the Judge, and said he was sorry to say that they could not agree on the verdict; eleven of them were one way, and one was the other.

On this, the Judge said they must retire, and directed an officer to keep them without meat, drink, or fire, till they agreed on a verdict.

The Court then adjourned till eleven o'clock at night, but the Jury had not come to a decision; however, a little before one o'clock, the Juryman who stood alone for an acquittal, gave way, and a verdict of guilty against both prisoners was returned.

The Judge sentenced the prisoners to three months' imprisonment, and to enter into recognizances to be of good behaviour for two years, themselves in 40l. and two sureties in 20l. each.

CARLISLE, March 9.

Phillip Finnancy, a wretched guilt-struck-looking man, was put to the bar, charged with the dreadful murder of Mary Brown, in the parish of St. Cuthbert's, Carlisle, on the 7th of September last.

When called upon by the Associate, he held up his right hand, but to the inquiry "How say you, are you guilty of this felony and murder, with which you stand charged, or not guilty?" Finnancy said, "I don't wish to answer that questiou."

Mr. Baron Hullock—You must plead, Sir, to the indictment.

Finnancy—I have two causes for refusing to plead.

Mr. Baron Hullock—You must plead, Sir; why do you act in this way.

Finnancy—I won't plead, my Lord.

Mr. Baron Hullock—You must plead; you have been very badly advised to this; whoever recommended you to do this, was, I should think, a most incompetent person to advise you. Take my advice, and plead not guilty at once, and take the chance of your trial.

Finnancy—No, I will not plead at all; and I cannot say that I am not guilty either.

Mr. Oridge said, he really thought that the prisoner's objection was founded on a religious principle.

Mr. Baron Hullock told the prisoner that by pleading not guilty he would only put himself on his trial; and he need not be afraid of entering that plea, because it might not be considered an untruth; such obstinate perseverance would be of no service to him here, and would not be the means of his obtaining salvation.

Finnancy—No, Sir, I will not plead; let somebody else do it for me; I will not do it.

The Jury, by the direction of the Judge, then found that he was mute wilfully and fraudulently.

Mr. Oridge said the prisoner wished it to be understood that he did not refuse to plead through obstinacy, but solely from religious scruples.

After some other objections, the prisoner nodded assent to the plea of not guilty, and the trial proceeded.

Mr. Courtnay detailed the circumstances of this awful case.—The prisoner had cohabited with a bad woman, the deceased, and continually quarrelled with her, and in a fit of jealousy beat her head to pieces with a hammer, in the fields below Carlisle; he then wandered about and surrendered himself.

The Jury, without hesitation, found him Guilty.

Mr. Baron Hullock ordered him for execution on Monday. He received the sentence upon his knees, and prayed with much fervour in the dock.

COURT OF COMMON COUNCIL.

Thursday a Court of Common Council was held for the dispatch of general public business.

On the opening of the Court,

Mr. Favell rose, and stated, that as he was coming to the Court, a minute before, he met a worthy Alderman, one of their Representatives in Parliament, who, at the last election, (it might be mentioned as a proof of the confidence of his fellow-citizens,) was placed at the head of the poll. He complained that, on the question of the Corn Laws, he had not been able to obtain a fair hearing. This he (Mr. Favel) considered to be a breach of the right of the subject to be heard by their Representatives; and he was determined, if the House of Commons sent him to Newgate for it, to bring the matter before his fellow-citizens, for their consideration. He now stated the circumstance. (Alderman Thompson is supposed to be the Member referred to.)

The Lord Mayor said, he did not see that the Court could in any way interfere.

One of the Members suggested, that it was a subject which would be best brought before the citizens at large in the Common Hall. (Hear.)

Mr. Favel was inclined to believe that the course suggested by the worthy Member was the best.

Here the conversation terminated.

IMPROVEMENTS IN THE CITY.

A petition was presented by Mr. Tickner, from a number of inhabitants of the houses ajacent to Fleet-market, complaining of the works for the formation of the intended new market, not being proceeded with.

The Report of the Committee for conducting Improvements in the City was read. They recited the heavy and unexpected expences which had been incurred, in compensating individuals for the losses they were supposed to be likely to sustain by their removal from it. The total expenditure for compensation amounted to the sum of 114,000l. The Committee had agreed to recommend the completion of the work on a smaller scale than was originally intended. By doing this they might effect the work for the sum of 150,000l. which they were enabled to borrow, and would have a surplus of 1000l. after having completed all their engagements.

Alderman Wood said the restriction of the size of the market would defeat the original object of giving increased accommodation to the trade, and would prevent the compensation which might otherwise have been derived from the measure. He considered that the opening of the great North Road through Fleet Market to Islington would be an improvement materially benefitting the neighbourhood, and rendering the increased size of the market particularly necessary.

Mr. Dixon referred to the great expence which the City had been put to, beyond the estimates, in executing several of the worthy Alderman's favourite plans of improvement. He did not mean to use it as a threat, but he begged to state that next June, when the Chamberlain came before the Common Hall to be re-elected, he should, if more money was intended to be taken by the Court, move the body of the Livery to advise him, or to order him, not to allow the City funds intrusted to him to be withdrawn. The ruin of the City finances was inevitable, if some check was not put to this rate of expenditure.—(Hear, hear.)

Mr. Deputy Oldham did not hesitate to say that most exaggerated claims for compensation had been successful against the public purse, and that juries and the public at large should be put upon their guard against the designs of such persons. (Cheers.)—Report agreed to.

CITY POLICE.

A Report was brought up by Mr. N. Saunders from the General Purpose Committee, respecting the conduct of two Marshalmen, which had been referred to them for investigation on the motion of Mr. Alderman Lucas. The Committee considered the complaints well founded, and would have recommended the suspension of the officers, but that the Marshalmen promised amendment, and Alderman Lucas recommended their promises to be taken.

Mr. Deputy Oldham considered, that to make the Police of the City efficient, it was requisite to place the Marshalmen more completely under the controul of the Court of Aldermen. He, therefore, moved, as an amendment, that the Report should lie upon the table, and that it should be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the Aldermen present, and six Members of that Court, to consider of the expediency of placing the Marshalmen under the appointment of the Court of Aldermen.

A long discussion ensued upon this subject, when it was agreed that the matter should to be referred to the Committee of General Purposes.

Mr. Alderman Venables gave notice of a motion for the consideration of the present state of the nightly watch of the City, with a view to its improvement.

Mr. Hathway, of Queenhithe, brought up the Report of a Committee appointed to inquire into the present state of the bankrupt laws, and report to the Court on the propriety of petitioning the Legislature for their revision.

The Committee recommended that a petition, praying for a revision of the bankrupt laws, should be presented to the Legislature.

Mr. Hathway said, the question was one of the highest importance to the Court, either individually or collectively. The Report contained a great body of interesting testimony, and that they might not discuss this important subject without due preparation, he moved that the consideration of the question should be adjourned, and that in the mean time the evidence contained in the Report should be printed.

This motion was agreed to, and the Court adjourned.

It is with extreme regret we have to announce that Mr. Edward Turner, the respectable banker of Warrington, has been obliged to suspend his payments for the present.—Leeds Intelligencer.

A MIDDLESEX MAGISTRATE.

We lately noticed a charge that had been preferred against a Magistrate for the county of Middlesex, in which he was accused of accepting and demanding a fee of one guinea for his trouble in dispensing justice to a complainant, in a case of assault that had come on to be heard before him. The Magistrate in question had been served with a notice to attend the then approaching county meeting of his brethren of the Bench, in order to account for or explain the unseemly sort of conduct that had been so unequivocally attributed to him, and which was considered by the whole Body as casting a shade upon the Magistracy in general, and particularly upon those of the metropolitan county. The meeting at which the accused Magistrate, whose name it is no longer necessary to conceal (Mr. Hanson, of Hammersmith) was expected to attend, according to the notice he had received, took place a few days ago, at the Sessions-house, Clerkenwell-green, and the appointed hour for the attendance of Mr. Hanson having some time elapsed without that gentleman making his appearance, considerable surprise was expressed, when a letter was handed to the Bench, addressed to the meeting, from Mr. Hanson, in which he begged to decline appearing before them; and in allusion to the accusation made against him, stated, that although it was not altogether without foundation, yet that the case was much exaggerated as represented, for that a part of the guinea fee was intended for a constable who had had some trouble in the matter; but that, however this might be, he, Mr. Hanson, did not think it necessary to enter into any further explanation, the more particularly as he was about to expatriate himself, and pass the remainder of those days which Providence might be pleased to allow him, either as a Magistrate or a man to stay upon earth, on some part of the Continent of Europe, more congenial to his present state of health than the soil and climate of England. As, therefore, he never again intended to wield the sword of justice in this country at any price, or by thought, word, or deed to come in contact with his brother Magistrates, he trusted they would suffer him to retire in the full enjoyment of that esteem and respect which he knew they all entertained for him, as strongly, as he himself felt conscious of having at all times performed the duties of his office with credit, and with honour to himself: concluding by wishing them all every happiness, and that they might ultimately end their Magisterial course with as high a character as he did!

The meeting seemed for a time amazed and at a loss how to deal with this strange letter or its author, until Sir George Farrant got up with much indignation, and, declaring that it was too much to allow Mr. Hansan, after having brought by his conduct a certain degree of discredit upon the whole corps, to march off in this triumphant manner with all the honours of war, proposed a resolution that a brand should be set upon Mr. Hanson's name as a Magistrate of the county, so as to prevent his coming in contact with them again in their meetings, and that his name, with that view, should be at once struck out of the lists of all committees of Magistrates meeting for county purposes. This resolution being seconded, was put to the meeting and carried unanimously, which ended all proceedings of the meeting upon this subject.

EXECUTION OF ROBERT FOX AND P. FINNACEY.

CARLISLE, March 12.—At five minutes before twelve, they were summoned by the prison bell to make their last preparation for death; exactly at the appointed time they were seen proceeding slowly along the middle court of the gaol, towards the place of execution. Fox walked first, accompanied by a single turnkey; then followed Finnacey, with the Governor of the Gaol; and they were succeeded by the Reverend Ordinary, in canonicals, the Rev. Mr. Marshall, and the Sheriffs. The prisoners walked with a firm pace, and raised their eyes till they beheld the engine of death, which they surveyed with a seemingly unshaken fortitude; and then, with downcast countenances, moved on till they arrived at the door of the stairs by which they were to ascend to the roof of the prison. Here the Governor of the Gaol took the charge of Fox, and the turnkey held Finnacey as if to assist him up the stairs of the prison, and up the ladder of the machine, if he should require assistance. They arrived in this order upon the drop. The ropes had been adjusted about their necks before they left their cells, and their arms were pinioned above the elbow. Fox's rope was now immediately attached to the chain; but Finnacey knelt down with his minister on stools that had been provided, for the purpose of concluding his devotion with his latest breath, and prayed aloud for nearly ten minutes. During this time, Fox held some conversation with the Ordinary in a whisper or under tone, that was inaudible even to those immediately below the drop, and he trembled very much. Finnacey's devotions being concluded, he rose up, and was placed by the side of his fellow-sufferer; his rope being attached to the chain, at about twelve minutes past twelve, the executioner did his duty. A slight tremulous motion, probably resulting from that which had been previously observed in Fox, agitated his body for several minutes during its suspension; but nothing like a struggle, nor even the ordinary contortions which might have been expected in bodies dying by suffocation, could at any time be perceived in either of the present cases. It is, therefore, rather conjectured that death was immediately caused in both by vertebral fracture. The bodies are to be dissected this afternoon.

Fox appeared a man who had acquired, by a gross life, an habitual insensibility to the common sympathies of our nature. He had contracted an illicit intercourse with a young woman, whom, in the seventh month of her pregnancy, he was induced to marry, after the parish-officers had interfered in the matter; and whom, with a cold-blooded purpose, he deliberately poisoned in the ninth month.

The Oratorio on Friday last, at Drury-lane, went off with uncommon eclat. Amongst the most splendid musical triumphs of the evening may be fairly ranked. Miss Paton's execution of a new Scotch Ballad, entitled "The Moons on the Lake." or the "Macgregor's Gathering," composed by Mr. Alexander Lee. It was given with such science, taste, energy, and spirit, as produced the most electrical effect. We never heard an encore so universal or deserved. It is a song of real excellence. Both the melody and orchestrial arrangements reflects the highest credit on the talent of Mr. Lee.

FORGERY.—John Cockran was examined on Tuesday at the Mansion House, charged with having uttered a forged cheque, purporting to be drawn by Messrs. Young and Donaldson, spirit-merchants, at Leith, upon the Commercial Banking Company of Scotland, for 510*l.* Mr. Donaldson stated that the prisoner was a clerk in the employment of the firm, and nephew to Mr. Young. Having proved his hand-writing, he was remanded for eight days to give the opportunity of a warrant being sent from Scotland for his apprehension. The prisoner absconded on Sunday fortnight, went to Paris, and was apprehended at the Blossoms Inn, Laurence-lane, on Monday. Notes amounting to 161*l.* and 202 sovereigns were found upon him.

There exists at present, in Prussia, according to the report of the physician Grafe, a remarkable instance of obesity in the person of a butcher, named Trocher. Up to the age of thirty years he was there, and at that time he was a great dancer. On his return from a journey which he made to Russia, he was seized with a devouring appetite, especially for animal food. He once gained a wager that he would eat a whole calf in twenty-four hours, merely cooked with water and salt. His voracity, seconded by extraordinary digestive powers, made him attain, at the age of thirty-seven, so excessive a fatness, that he could neither sit down nor stand upright. Dr. Grafe, whom he called in, found him in imminent danger of suffocation. Frequent bleedings, Goulard's Lotion, extracts of belladonna, repeated laxatives, and a rigid vegetable diet, reduced in six months from forty to twenty stone the weight of this living column of fat, and he is now in a condition to attend to his ordinary business.

Advices received yeterday from Guatemala to the 18th of November, give a very stormy picture of the state of political affairs. The misunderstanding between the House of Representatives and the Executive had broken out into acts of open violence. On the 10th of October the President issued a decree, summoning, on his own authority, a new Congress, to meet at Cojutepequi. It would appear that he had put some of the Deputies under arrest, and had disarmed the militia both in the capital and the provinces. The House of Representatives met, and determined to resist his authority; they decreed that his acts were illegal and despotic, and serious infractions of the constitution. These disputes appear to have had their origin in discussions between the Provincial and the Central Governments.

A letter to an eminent house in the City, dated Milan, 4th inst., mentions that dispatches had been received from Vienna, which had excited some interest. The troops on the march from Naples had received orders to halt, and the garrison of Milan, about to be relieved, received orders to remain in that city, as it had been determined to form a camp of 25,000 men near Milan.

The Secretary to the Post-office, Sir F. Freeling, has addressed a letter to the Committee of the Brazil Merchants, stating that the Post-Master-General had determined to comply with the requests made to him as to further fecilities to the communication with the Brazils. The letters to the northern ports of Brazil will be immediately detached on the arrival of the English packet at Rio Janeiro, and the letters from the northern ports will be dispatched for England by the first packet, in place of being detained, as formerly, two weeks at Rio.

The following are extracts from the latest German Papers received:—

TRIESTE, MARCH 2.—A private letter from Corfu, of the 13th of February, affirms that the ruins of Missolonghi were taken possession of on the 5th of February, in the evening, by the Greeks, in whose eyes they must be classic ground.

BUCHAREST, FEB. 20.—A courier, who left Constantinople on the 8th inst., has passed through this city; but the Austrian post from that capital, which we have expected these two days, has not yet arrived; it is probably detained by the rising of the rivers.

STUTTGARDT, MARCH 8.—Accounts from Switzerland give the following particulars respecting the severity of the winter:—

"In the higher parts of Switzerland the mercury in Reaumer's thermometer fell in several places to above 30 degrees below the freezing point. The fate of the innkeeper of Schwarenbach has excited very general interest. His house was buried under an enormous mass of snow, and he remained with his family in that dreadful situation during the whole month of January, deprived of all communication with his neighbours, and in danger of perishing with want. Two avalanches added to the distress of these unfortunate people. Many attempts were made from Kundersteig to save them, but it was not till the last day of January that they could be extricated, and conveyed to a village at the distance of two leagues from Schwarenbach."

ST. PETERSBURGH, FEB. 21.—A letter from Odessa, of the 30th ult. says, that the navigation continued without interruption. The Odessa shipping-list, for last year, does not mention the loss of a single ship, though many sailed late in the autumn, at which season the navigation of the Black Sea is very dangerous.

STOCKHOLM, FEB. 23.—An estate has been purchased in Scania for the widow of Marshal Ney; whence it is presumed that she intends to fix her residence in Sweden.

Yesterday, in the Insolvent Debtors' Court, Benbow, the celebrated bookseller and publisher, came up to be heard in the matter of his petition, to be discharged, when he was opposed by Mr. Pollock, on the behalf of William Warburton, the keeper of a lunatic asylum in Bethnal-green, who recovered, in an action for libel, damages to the amount of 500l. The Learned Gentleman said, that under the 49th section of the present Act (7th Geo. 4), he had no doubt but the Court would have visited the insolvent with exemplary punishment; but he was instructed by Mr. Warburtonto say, that he should not press a judgment against him on that account. The libel in question was contained in a book called "Mitford's Observations on the Horrors of a Madhouse." The sense the Jury entertained of the malignity of the libel was clear, by the damages they gave on the trial; and his client had been induced to bring the action solely to vindicate his character from such foul aspersions. To show with what lenity Mr. Warburton had acted towards the insolvent, he had not even entered up judgment against him. The insolvent was then examined as to the property, viz. as to what had become of 1000 copies of "Moore's Melodies," "Gibbon's Rome," &c. He said all his type had been taken in distress, and the copies taken were merely waste paper. His case was adjourned, to give a better account.

A large fleet has sailed from Alexandria with supplies of arms, ammunition, and money, for the supply of the Egyptian army in Greece.

THE ARMY.—The 1st division of the 21st (Royal North British Fusileers) will arrive on Monday next at Windsor, from Portsmouth. The 1st division of the 67th South Hampshire regiment of infantry has received orders to march on Monday next from Windsor to Weedon; and the 2d division of the same corps is ordered to march on Tuesday next from Windsor, for the same destination.

A lieutenant of the Dutch ship of the line at Sheerness named Petit, has been found dead in his cot. The body has been opened and poison found in his stomach, but how administered is not yet ascertained.

The stuff weavers in Leeeds, to the number of from five to six hundred, have struck work to resist a reduction in the rate of wages.—Leeds Intelligencer.

HOOD'S NATIONAL TALES.—These are two very clever volumes, and bid fair to rival in popularity the "Whims and Oddities," of the same author. They are delightful parlour table books, as Mrs. Piozzi would have said, or as we should say, born companions for the luncheon. So the Adelphi has taken the hint thrown out by Hood, and "prepares for immediate representation the Lady in Love with Romance." We were told that Beasley had an eye to the Spanish Tragedy. An excellent ground work for a Melodrama.

SUICIDE.—A suicide of a distressing nature occured on Thursday, in Abchurch-lane, Cannon-street. Mr. Haywood, of the firm of Haywood and Walleson, surgeons and cuppers, was found in bed that morning, dead; it is supposed from the effects of poison, which, it appears, he administered to himself the previous evening. He was observed to be, for some time previous, in a state of much depression of spirits and melancholy, which was attributed, by his acquaintance, to the unsettled state of his affairs, in consequence of his having, a short time since, become a bankrupt. He attended the funeral of a friend the evening previous to this melancholy event.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In consequence of what lately passed in the Rolls' Court between Mr. Sugden and Mr. Skirrow, the former Gentleman demanded an apology of the latter, or, in the event of a refusal, the satisfaction due to a Gentleman: upon which Mr. Skirrow had a meeting with the Gentlemen of the Bar, when they unanimously agreed that Mr. Skirrow had been decidedly in the wrong, and that it was highly proper that he should make an apology in writing; which Mr. Sugden readily accepted, and here the matter rests.

THE EXECUTIONS NEXT WEEK.—The names of the five unfortunate men who are to expiate their offences against the laws, on Tuesday next, are—Royal Keats, James Winglefield, Daniel Davis, Robert Young, and William Davis. The two first were found guilty at the December Sessions, last year, and the others in January. Keats, and his brother William, who has been exempted from the punishment of death, were found guilty of stealing five sheep, on the 22d of November last; and the only defence they could set up, when the property was found upon them, was, that they found them on the road. The younger Keats evidently acted under the guidance of his brother, and it was on this principle that mercy has been extended to him. James Winglefield is a labourer, and worked some years at Harrow. He was convicted of violating a child, named Sarah Weatherly. Daniel Davis was a letter-carrier in the General Post Office, and secreted a letter entrusted to him for delivery, containing a 10l. and a 5l. note. Robert Young's offence was a burglary in the House of Robert Bernal, Esq. of Feltham-hill, on the 31st of December last. The property taken away was considerable, and valuable. William Davis was convicted of a robbery in the house of his master, Mr. Knox; and a female accomplice, Catherine Williams, was at the same time found guilty of receiving the property, which was valuable. Davis had, previous to this affair, borne a very good character, and was, on that account, recommended to mercy by the Jury to the Judge who tried him.

YORKSHIRE.—We may mention, as a proof of the avidity with which the Huddersfield Joint-Stock Bank is received, that 2,000 shares were subscribed for within half an hour of the close of the meeting. We hear that it proceeds most prosperously, and it is probable that the example will be followed in one at least of the manufacturing towns in the West Riding. The stuff weavers in Leeds are now generally unemployed,—some of the workmen struck with their masters last week, in consequence of a further attempt, by two of them, to reduce their wages. Many of the masters are careless about employing hands, and the workmen, particularly those with families, are willing to submit to every privation, rather than toil a tedious day for what will scarcely keep them and their dependents from starving. The number of stuff weavers in that town is calculated to be about 700. On Thursday last the woollen weavers in the employ of Messrs. Willans and Rawson, at their mill at Kirkstall, turned out for an advance of wages, which being resisted by the firm, the men generally continue out except those that had work in the loom, who have for the most part returned to finish it.—Doncaster Gazette.

SHIPWRECK.—The committee of the Royal National Institution for the preservation of lives from shipwreck, have voted a gold medallion to Lieutenant Christopher Jobson, R. N. chief officer of the coast guard at Arbroath, for having, by means of Manby's mortar apparatus, together with his own personal gallant exertions, rescued several people from the sloop Clyde Packet, of Aberdeen, wrecked near Arbroath, on the 17th ultimo. The Committee have also awarded four pounds each to Robert Ormond, David Shields, and T. White, who particularly distinguished themselves on the above occasion; and have conveyed their very best thanks, together with four sovereigns, to Mrs. Jobson, as a mark of their approbation of her laudable and humane exertions to restore to life two infants, who were washed on shore, the boat which took them, with three men, and two women passengers, from the wreck, having swamped.—Scotsman.

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF THE LATE STORM.—From the districts of country situate to the southward and eastward, we continue to receive melancholy details of the fatal sweep of the late storms. The Dumfries papers supply us with a sad list of accidents and losses. Severe as the tempests here were, still from every account we can glean, the severity which we witnessed, gives us but a faint idea of the terrors of the tempests in those parts of Scotland situate from thirty to eighty miles to the south of this city. Along the high lands which give rise to the Esk, the Tweed, the Annan, the Clyde, the Ayr, and the Nith, and their tributary streams, the tempest has ravaged with a fury almost unprecedented. The loss of human life has, in consequence, we regret to say, been exceedingly great. The destruction amongst the herds is extensive and severe, but as yet imperfectly ascertained. The dangers and difficulties to which those, who were compelled to brave the fury of the tempest, were exposed on the nights of the 3d and the 7th, are such as stagger credibility. Amongst those more particularly exposed, were the guards and drivers of the mail coaches, whose exertions amidst the dangers which they encountered, deserve the greatest commendation, while the dangers which all of them had to contend against are really frightful to hear recapitulated. The coach with the mail of the 7th, from this city, and also with the mails of the four preceding days, and five passengers, proceeded from Douglas Mill, South, a little past the usual time. They had only advanced about five miles when the second storm became so fierce, and the drift so dreadful, that they could not see the leading horses. In this state they lost the road, and the coach got overset amidst the increasing heaps of snow, and two of the passengers were considerably bruised by the accident. Far from assistance, the guard and driver strangers to the country, the whole must have perished amidst the accumulating snow wreaths, and the piercing furious blast, had not Mr. Cranston, of the New Inn, Crawford, fortunately been one of the company, and who knowing the country well, succeeded in piloting the whole back to Douglas-mill, where they arrived after three hours dreadful march, almost exhausted with fatigue, and where they received every attention from Mr. Lambert. The coach, after a previous unsuccessful attempt to find it out, was, with much exertion, found next afternoon, and the packages brought to Douglas Mill in safety. The mail coming north on the same night, was placed in a similar perilous state about two miles beyond Elvanfoot.—The drift was so dreadful that they lost the road—the horses pulled till they broke the traces, the coach was overwhelmed in the snow, and with the greatest difficulty the passengers, guard, and coachmen, succeeded in reaching the house at Bodsberry-end, where the mail usually changes, and where they were compelled to remain till the tempest abated.—Glasgow Courier.

CONVICT HULK ESTABLISHMENT.—From returns ordered to be laid before the House of Commons, by Mr. Capper, Superintendant of the Convict Hulk Establishment, it appears that it consists of ten ships, stationed at Plymouth, Portsmouth, Sheerness, Chatham, Woolwich, and Deptford, together with two ships stationed at Bermuda. For the half year ending Dec. 31, 1826, it appears that the total number of convicts employed on board these ships was about 3,700, that the expense of the establishment was was 44,328l., that the earnings of the ships were 32,551l., and consequently the clear cost to the country was about 3l. 3s. for each convict. This is exclusive of the establishment at Bermuda, where there are 700 convicts, and where the average expenses and earnings are in about the same proportion as at the home establishments. The convicts are employed in the Royal dock-yards, and in the construction of public works, with the exception of the boys in the Euryalus hulk at Chatham, who are employed in making clothes and other articles for the prisoners. It appears, that on one or two occasions, these boys have been very refractory, in consequence of the ship being too small to effect a due classification—a measure which Mr. Capper states to be absolutely necessary to keep them in a proper state of discipline.

ARTIFICIAL TEETH.—Mr. HOWARD, Surgeon-Dentist, 33, Fleet-street, respectfully acquaints the Nobility, Gentry, and his Friends, that he continues to fix Natural and Artificial Teeth, on his improved principle, without the least pain, from a single tooth to a complete set which he guarantees shall restore to the wearer every comfort in articulation and mastication, and at the same time preserve the original form of the mouth. Extracting, Scaling, and every other operation on the Teeth and Gums. Mr. H.'s terms are little more than half the usual charges.

HORSES.—WORM and CONDITION BALLS. They will effectually destroy every species of Worm to which Horses are subject, without requiring any alteration in Food or intermission of Labour. If these Balls be given two or three times a year, they supersede the use of other Medicines, as they not only improve the health and vigour of the Animal, but also purify the blood and materially add to the glossy appearance of the coat. The Proprietor, who is known as having himself kept a numerous Stud, has used them for Thirty Years with the most satisfactory results. They only require a trial to prove their efficacy. References can be given—Sold in Packets at 9s. containing Nine Balls, with Directions for Use, by Courtney, Regent Circus, Oxford-street; Sanger, 150, Oxford-street; Smith, 29, Haymarket; Prout, 226, Strand; Butler, corner of St. Paul's Church-yard; Rogers and Co. 93, Cheapside; Wilmott, 63, St. Margaret's Hill, Borough.; S. Smith, Druggist, Windsor; and Mr. Dycer, Repository, Grafton-street, Dublin. Also wholesale by T. Jackson, No. 10, Golden-square, London.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 228, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for £1., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

NEW EDITION, THE TENTH, ENLARGED,
With Observations on the Danger of trusting to Nostrums, as an Internal Remedy for the Cure of Strictures. Illustrated by Cases. Price 3s.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS on STRICTURES of the URETHRA and RECTUM, recommending an improved system for their Treatment and Cure; illustrating its efficacy by numerous remarkable and highly important cases, in some of which, Strictures of from ten to twenty years duration have been totally removed in a few weeks, and its superiority thereby fully established over every other method hitherto practised. By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. To which are added, Observations and Practical Comments on Gleet, Seminal Weakness, and the miseries occasioned by Self Abuse, for the cure of which a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author.

Printed for the Author, Robert-street, Adelphi: and published and sold by Jones and Sherwood, Paternoster-row; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand; Chapell, Royal Exchange; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street; Walker, 90, High Holborn; Chappell, 94, Pall Mall; Sutherland, 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh; and may be had of all Booksellers.

"We earnestly recommend the cases related by Dr. Courtenay to the perusal of such of our readers as are afflicted with the complaints which the Author has made the subject of these Observations. Several instances are adduced of the recovery of perfect health from states which were considered hopeless by Practitioners of eminent talents, and very extensive experience. We entertain the highest opinion of Dr. Courtenay's professional skill, and congratulate him on his successful and judicious application to these severe and often fatal diseases."—European Magazine.

SUPERFINE IMPROVED BEAVER HATS, 21s.

FRANKS, of WELLINGTON HOUSE, RED-CROSS-STREET, BARBICAN, respectfully acquaints the Public that notwithstanding the great rise in the price of Beaver, he is enabled to sell his Superfine Improved Beaver Hats at the very low price of Twenty-one Shillings. These Hats are warranted to retain their shape and incomparable lustre in all climates; they do not spot by exposure to the most violent rain, and will be found very superior to the ordinary Beaver Hats selling at considerably higher prices.

THE PATENT IMPROVED HATS (as originally introduced) have all the appearance of the finest and most expensive Beavers; are extremely light, and from the elasticity of the bodies, admit of being manufactured into shapes superior to any other kinds of Hats, the colour never changes if worn for Twenty Years; they are found to be the most economical articles ever produced, price 16s.

CAUTION.—The above Hats are distinct from those selling under the denomination of "Patent Silk Hats," which in fact are made from glossy Cotton or common Silk Shag, on purpose to deceive purchasers by an apparently low price.

LIVERY HATS, (very superior Beaver) of good shapes and great durability; the more they are exposed to the rain, the more impervious they will prove to it.—Price 16s.

JAPANNED LIVERY HATS.—Japanned on the pelt of Beaver, far more durable than any made of papier mache, price 10s. 6d.

MERCHANTS, CAPTAINS, and DEALERS SUPPLIED.

N.B. The Public, to whom this advertisement is generally addressed, will have an opportunity of selecting from the largest and cheapest stock of Hats, Bonnets, and Caps in this Kingdom; the assortment is of a general kind. As the limits of an advertisement will not admit of such a detailed enumeration as could be wished by the Proprietor, he most respectfully solicits an early inspection.

Gentlemen writing from the Country can be correctly fitted by sending the circumference over the hand in inches.

TRUCKLEBOROUGH HALL;—a Satirical Novel.

"This is an extremely piquant and ingeninus satire on politicians of all parties and denominations. In its pages, the aristocratical, gentlemanly, twaddling Whig; the interested, profligate Tory; the democratical declaimer; the pompous, empty man in office; and though last, not least, the surfeited and satisfied high churchman; all figure in the most ludicrous phases—nor should we omit to mention, that the conceited utilitarian comes in for his share of ridicule; which, though brief, is of a pleasant pungency. Such a book is much to our tastes, as we infinitely prefer laughing at the extravagancies of the world to bewailing them."—London Magazine.

CONSOLATION to the TREMULOUS WRITER.—The Public may look to this most singular and unique invention with confidence, as an inestimable source of comfort to those who experience any difficulties in the command of the Pen, occasioned by tremor in nervous affections, heat of climate, agitation of spirits, excess or over exertion, weakness of age, injury of the thumb or fingers by sprain or otherwise, even to the loss of part. This happy relief consists in a little INSTRUMENT, the appearance of which, when in use, escapes observation, is capable of giving firmness, confidence, and freedom, and cannot fail to assist the declining powers of a good Penman, and would materially improve the performance of a bad one. It is honoured by the patronage and recommendation of Sir Astley Cooper, and other highly respectable professional gentlemen. A few minutes' practice will prove its efficacy, and it has the advantage over all medicine, its power increases by use, and one prescription will last for life. Made in elastic gold, price 25s. each.—Sold for the Patentee, by T. Tucker, 268, West side of St. Clement's Church-yard, first house from the corner of the Strand.—Letters from any part of the country, post paid, will be promptly attended to. Name and number on the front of the house.

SUPERFINE IMPROVED BEAVER HATS, 21s.

FRANKS, of WELLINGTON HOUSE, RED-CROSS-STREET, BARBICAN, respectfully acquaints the Public that notwithstanding the great rise in the price of Beaver, he is enabled to sell his Superfine Improved Beaver Hats at the very low price of Twenty-one Shillings. These Hats are warranted to retain their shape and incomparable lustre in all climates; they do not spot by exposure to the most violent rain, and will be found very superior to the ordinary Beaver Hats selling at considerably higher prices.

THE PATENT IMPROVED HATS (as originally introduced) have all the appearance of the finest and most expensive Beavers; are extremely light, and from the elasticity of the bodies, admit of being manufactured into shapes superior to any other kinds of Hats, the colour never changes if worn for Twenty Years; they are found to be the most economical articles ever produced, price 16s.

CAUTION.—The above Hats are distinct from those selling under the denomination of "Patent Silk Hats," which in fact are made from glossy Cotton or common Silk Shag, on purpose to deceive purchasers by an apparently low price.

LIVERY HATS, (very superior Beaver) of good shapes and great durability; the more they are exposed to the rain, the more impervious they will prove to it.—Price 16s.

JAPANNED LIVERY HATS.—Japanned on the pelt of Beaver, far more durable than any made of papier mache, price 10s. 6d.

NARRATIVE OF

THE LATE DUKE OF YORK'S ILLNESS,

By SIR HERBERT TAYLOR.

A detailed account of the last moments of his late Royal Highss the Duke of York has been published, drawn up by Sir erbert Taylor, who was in constant attendance upon his Royal ghness, and intended, by that Gentleman, for distribution among e more immediate friends of the deceased Prince. It exhibits affecting picture of manly fortitude—of Christian resignation d of pious confidence.

The following are extracts :—

The interest excited by the situation of the late Duke of York, d by every circumstance connected with his long, painful, and gering illness, from its commencement until the fatal hour which osed his valuable existence, has been so great, and the general bling which it produced, has caused so many particulars to be culated and received by the public as authentic, for which there her was no foundation, or at least very imperfect foundation, at I have, upon due consideration, been induced to draw up from notes taken during this distressing and trying period of my endance upon his Royal Highness, a statement, not of the proess of the disease, or of the treatment pursued, but of such circumstances and facts as will shew the condition of his Royal ghness's mind under this awful visitation of Providence, and ll do justice to the exemplary resolution and pious resignation th which he met and submitted to it.

The state of his Royal Highness's health had, for some time, peared far from satisfactory, and had occasioned more or less easiness to those about him, but the first indications of serious lisposition such as to produce alarm, were upon his Royal ghness's return from Ascot to his residence in Audley-square, the 9th of June, 1826, and Mr. Macgregor, who then saw him, ged him immediately to send for Sir Henry Halford.

From that period his Royal Highness continued more or less an valid, and was occasionally confined to his house.

Upon the 24th June, his Royal Highness removed for change of to Brompton Park, the residence of Mr. Greenwood, who ndly lent it to him, and upon that day he sent for me, and told me at he had been unwell for some weeks, and that he did not think at he gained ground—that he did not feel alarmed—and that he d perfect confidence in the attention given to his case, and the ill of his medical advisers; but that he knew that they might tertain apprehensions, which they would consider it their prosional duty not to communicate to their patients, and he might, erefore, remain ignorant of that which ought not to be conaled from him, and which he trusted he should learn without apehension, although he did not deny that he should learn it with gret—that there were duties to be performed, and arrangements be made, which ought not to be deferred to the last moment, and felt that it was due to his character and station, to his comfort, d even to his feelings on this subject, that he should not be ken by surprise upon so serious an occasion. He considered it obable that the physicians would be less reserved with me than th him, and he charged me, if I should learn from them directly, should have reason to draw such inference from any expression at might drop from them, that his situation had become one of nger, not to withhold such knowledge from him. He appealed me upon this occasion for an act of friendship, he would add, r the discharge of a duty, which he claimed from the person who d been with him, and enjoyed his confidence during so many ars; he called upon me to promise that I would perform it henever the period should arrive to which he alluded, and he sired that I would bear in mind that he wished me to deal by m as he was certain I should desire, under similar circumstances, be dealt with.

I made the promise without hesitation, and it was received with warm expression of thanks, and an affectionate pressure of the nd.

This was repeated in allusion to what had passed at a later riod of the day, when he got into his carriage to go to Brompton, d he then said that he felt relieved from great uneasiness by the romise I had given him.

His Royal Highness removed to Brighton on the 14th of August, r the benefit of further change of air; and I learnt from Mr. acgregor, on the 17th of that month, that a change had taken ace in his general state, and that symptoms had appeared which ndered his situation one of danger.

This distressing information was confirmed to me from other uarters, and I determined immediately to go to Brighton, and to scharge my duty, but to be guided in the character and extent the disclosure by such further communication as might be made me by his Royal Highness's medical attendants, of the nature d pressure of the danger. I pleaded business rendering personal mmunication necessary for my visit to his Royal Highness, and went to Brighton on the 19th of August. Upon my arrival, I arnt from Mr. Macgregor that a favourable change had taken ace, that his Royal Highness's situation might, therefore, be nsidered far more encouraging than when he wrote to me, but at it was impossible to consider it free from danger, although at danger had ceased to be immediate, and although there was ason to hope that the cause of alarm might be removed. He ded that, from observations which his Royal Highness had ade to himself, he was convinced I would find him prepared for y communication I might feel it my duty to make to him, and at, under all circumstances, I must exercise my discretion.

I saw the Duke of York, who entered fully into his situation, d told me that, although much better then, and, he believed, ing on well, he had reason to think, from the manner and looks his medical attendants, that they had been alarmed, and felt ch greater uneasiness than they had expressed, or might el at liberty to express, and he wished to know what I had arnt.

I did not disguise from him that, bearing in mind the engagent I had contracted, I had determined to go to Brighton in conquence of the accounts I had received on the 17th, which had armed me, but I was happy to find, on my arrival, that his Royal ghness's state had since been improving, and that much of the easiness which then prevailed had been removed; at the same e, it was my duty to confirm the impression which he appeared nself to have received, that his complaint had assumed a more rious character, although great confidence appeared to be felt, t the extraordinary resources of his constitution, and the ength he had gained since his removal to Brighton, would enable n to struggle successfully with the disorder. Then, said he, as not mistaken in my suspicion, and my case is not wholly e from danger; but I depend upon your honour, and you tell there is more to hope than to fear.

His Royal Highness returned from Brighton on the afternoon of 26th of August, to the Duke of Rutland's house, in Arlington-eet, having come in five and a half hours. He did not seem ch fatigued, looked well in the countenance, and conversed erfully with Sir Henry Torrens and me, who were in waiting receive him.

n the course of conversation, I told him that I understood Sir ary Halford would be in town on the following day, and did mean to return to the country. He observed it was very kind im, but immediately added, "by the bye, not a very good sign ier."

le then proceeded very quietly to official business, but Mr. egregor coming in, he, in the most calm and collected manner, ed him before me, very closely, as to his state, beginning e words, "Tell me honestly, do you consider me in dan- Not in 'immediate' danger, was the answer. "But," said his Royal Highness, "you do consider my situation to be one, not free from danger?" Mr. Macgregor admitted it to be by no means free from danger; but proceeded to state the grounds which justified his medical attendants in indulging hopes that his Royal Highness might look forward to a favourable issue.

Mr. Macgregor's answer produced further questions, all put with a view to obtain positive and accurate information as to the extent of danger, and he concluded by thanking Mr. Macgregor for the fair manner in which he had met them, and by saying, "I know now what I wished to know, and I shall be able to govern myself by that knowledge." During the whole of this conversation, which was of some length, his manner was firm and collected, though very serious, his voice free from agitation, his questions were put quietly at intervals, as if well considered by a man who was determined to ascertain his own situation, and his words were measured.

On the following day, Sunday, the 27th of August, his Royal Highness again spoke to me very quietly, in regard to his situation, and told me that although not alarmed, and although he had heard nothing that should shake his hopes of ultimate recovery, he could not conceal from himself that his situation called for serious contemplation. Whatever might be the result, there would be time for certain arrangements, and the settlement of his affairs, but there was one duty he did not wish to defer; he felt, indeed, that it ought not to be deferred until it should seem to be imposed by a conviction of immediate danger, and resorted to when hope had ceased to exist. He had, therefore, determined to take the Sacrament upon an early day, and to request his friend the Bishop of London to administer it to him; but he was anxious that this should not be known, as the alarm would be sounded, and various interpretations would be put upon an act, which was one of duty, resorted to on principle, and not from apprehension or affectation.

I went to the Bishop of London (at Fulham), who received the communication with great emotion, and spoke in the highest terms of the exemplary feeling which had dictated his Royal Highness's wish, and said that he would come quietly to Arlington-street on Tuesday, at twelve, without robes (as upon ordinary occasions,) and without notice to any one, and I engaged to have all prepared.

When I saw Batchelor, I learnt from him (what I had never previously known) that his Royal Highness, when he did not go to church, never missed devoting some time to his prayers, which he read to himself, in general early, that he might not be disturbed, but if disturbed in the morning, in the afternoon, or evening; and, that when travelling on Sunday, he always took a Bible and Prayer-book in the carriage, and was very particular as to their being placed within his immediate reach; and that although he did not object to a travelling companion on other days, nothing annoyed him more than any one proposing to be his companion on a Sunday.

His Royal Highness continued in good spirits, and in the same composed state of mind, on the 28th and 29th.

On the latter day the Bishop of London came, at a little before twelve, and his Royal Highness was alone with him for a short time, after which I was called in, and his Lordship administered the Sacrament to us.

In the afternoon, when I saw him again, he expressed to me how much he had been pleased with the Bishop of London's mild and encouraging discourse; that he had stated to his Lordship unreservedly, that he knew his situation to be a very serious, though, he trusted, not a hopeless one; but that he did not choose to postpone a duty which he conceived ought to be performed while he was in the full possession of his faculties, which might yield to disease sooner than he was aware of; that he had, in the course of his life, faced death in various shapes, and was now doomed to view its approach in a slow and lingering form; that he did not deny that he should resign his existence with regret, though he felt no alarm, he admitted, that his life had not been pure; and that there had been much in his course of life he wished had been otherwise. He had not thought so seriously on some subjects as he might have done, still he had endeavoured to discharge his public duties correctly. He had forborne from injuring or deceiving any one, and he felt in peace and charity with all.

Under these circumstances he hoped he might look with confidence to mercy, through the merits of his Redeemer; and he had appealed to him (the Bishop) on this occasion, not only to receive the confession of his unworthiness, but to administer that comfort which his situation required. His reliance and his faith in the Christian Religion were firm and decided, and that his adherence to the pure doctrine, professed and established in this country, was unshaken as it had ever been. As he had declared these sentiments in a political discussion of the question, he was anxious that it should be understood, and that the Bishop of London should be enabled to state hereafter, if the occasion should call for it, that those sentiments were not professed in a political sense, and from prejudice and party feelings, but they were firmly fixed in his mind, and were the result of due consideration and conviction, and produced by an earnest solicitude for the continued welfare of his country.

After saying this, his Royal Highness told me that he felt very comfortable; and that if it should please God to restore him to health, he was sure he should be a better man ever after. He considered this trial as a mercy, for which he ought to feel grateful: it afforded him time for serious reflection, and he trusted that the time would not be ill applied. He then entered into some questions of military business, with great composure.

His Royal Highness underwent the operation of tapping, on the afternoon of the 3d of September.

Between the 12th and the 18th, his Royal Highness gained strength, and his appetite and sleep improved, but the state of his legs continued satisfactory. On the 19th, he began again to take his airings, but the improvement had not been such as to induce his medical attendants to consider his state otherwise than very critical. He continued to take daily airings, until the 16th Oct. During this interval, he rallied occasionally, and his general health appeared, at times, to be improving, notwithstanding the state of his legs, which became gradually more unsatisfactory, and often occasioned excruciating pain throughout great part of the day.—His Royal Highness frequently spoke to me of his own situation and feelings, more especially on the 22d of September, when he told me he did his best to submit with patience and resignation; that he tried to keep up his spirits, he met his friends cheerfully, endeavoured to go correctly through what he had to do, and to occupy himself at other times with reading; but when left to his own thoughts, when he went to bed and lay awake, the situation was not agreeable: the contemplation of one's end, not to be met at once, nor within a short given period, but protracted possibly for months, required a struggle, and tried one's resolution. But, after all, he did not know that he regretted it, or that he regretted that time was given to him which had turned his mind to serious reflection, and which he was certain had been very beneficial to him. If it should please God that he should recover, he would become a better man; if he did not recover, he would have to thank God for the time afforded for reflection.

Between the 8th and 17th December there was again a sensible improvement in the legs, which might have raised the hopes of his Royal Highness's attendants, if the return of strength had kept pace with it; but he was visibly losing strength and substance, and on the 20th the legs resumed the appearance of mortification to an alarming extent, and the medical attendants agreed that his situation had become very critical.

Their apprehensions were still further excited on the 22d: his appetite had totally failed him, and other symptoms were equally unfavourable; still he kept up his spirits, and although my language was any thing but encouraging, he appeared to feel sanguine of recovery. This impression was not justified by the opinion of the medical attendants, and I became very anxious that his Royal Highness should be made aware of the increased danger of his situation. I urged this point with Sir Henry Halford and Sir Astley Cooper.

I spoke to him, as had been agreed with Sir Henry Halford, adding, that my own anxiety and the uneasiness I had already expressed to him, had led me to watch the Physicians, and to endeavour to extract from them what their real opinion was, but that they were cautious, and were evidently unwilling to authorise me to express their alarm. I could not, however, forget his Royal Highness, his appeal to me in Audley-square, nor the pledge I had given him; that I knew his Royal Highness did not wish to be taken by surprise; that I felt he ought not to be taken by surprise; and therefore I had considered it my duty to disclose to him the uneasiness I felt. He listened with composure, and without betraying any agitation, but asked me whether the danger was immediate, whether it was a question of days?

I repeated that I was not authorised to say so, and I trusted it was not. He said—"God's will be done, I am not afraid of dying, I trust I have done my duty; I have endeavoured to do so: I know that my faults have been many, but God is merciful, his ways are inscrutable; I bow with submission to his will. I have at least not to reproach myself with not having done all I could to avert this crisis; but I own it has come upon me by surprise. I knew that my case had not ceased to be free from danger; I have always been told so, but I did not suspect immediate danger, and, had I been a timid or a nervous man, the effect might have been trying. I trust I have received this communication with becoming resolution." I observed that I had not for many days seen his Royal Highness more free from nervous agitation, and that I had not been disappointed in my expectation that he would bear this communication as he did that which I had been called upon to make to him at Brighton. He desired me to feel his pulse, which was low, but even and steady.

He then put various questions to me, with a view to ascertain the causes of what he considered so sudden a change in his state. I accounted for it by what I had learnt from the Physicians, and ended by repeating that I had felt it my duty, however painful, to speak out. He thanked me, gave me his hand, and said I had acted as I ought, and as he expected, but he pressed me again to state "what was the extent of danger, and whether immediate?" I repeated, that I had been assured it was not immediate: "whether his case was without hope of recovery?" I gave no decided answer, but said, that I could not extract from the physicans any positive opinion, but that their language was not encouraging. He said, "I understand you; I may go on for a short time, but may end rapidly; God's will be done, I am resigned." He then called for his official papers, and transacted his business with composure and his usual attention. He afterwards resumed the previous painful subject. I spoke to him about his private papers, and he confirmed some of the directions previously given to me upon that subject. He then spoke most kindly, took me again by the hand, and said, "thank you, God bless you." I had hitherto succeeded in controlling my feelings, but I could do so no longer, and I left the room.

On the following day, 24th December, he appeared better, and in good spirits, though incapable of much exertion.

On the 25th, he was weaker, having had a very indifferent night. He saw the Duke of Wellington early in the day. The physicians told me, that his Royal Highness's state was becoming daily more critical, and that it was desirable that I should avail myself of any opportunity which might offer, of drawing his Royal Highness's attention to the necessity of settling his affairs. I embraced it that very day, and proposed to him to send for his Solicitor, Mr. Parkinson, to which he agreed, and I appointed him at ten o'clock on the following day; he afterwards went through his official business very quietly.

His Royal Highness saw Mr. Parkinson on the 26th, and signed his will, after which he shook hands with him, as if taking final leave of him. He afterwards saw the Bishop of London, who had, at all times, free admission to his Royal Highness and had had frequent conversations with him in the course of his illness, and the result of this interview was, that his Royal Highness should take the Sacrament, on the 28th, which his Royal Highness mentioned to me afterwards, adding, that he meant to ask the Princess Sophia to take it with him. I saw him again in the evening, and he appeared very cheerful. On the 27th he appeared better early in the day, but became more weak and languid afterwards. He saw Mr. Peel, who told him he had been much shocked by his Royal Highness's altered appearance. The Duke, however, spoke to me of himself in a more sanguine tone than usual.

His Majesty came to his Royal Highness in the afternoon, and found him very weak and languid, but he rallied in the evening, and looked over his official papers.

On the morning of the 28th, his Royal Highness appeared very weak, and had some attacks of nervous faintness, which, together with other unfavourable symptoms, satisfied the physicians that the danger was becoming more imminent. The Bishop of London came at twelve, and desired that three persons should assist at the holy ceremony, and proposed that Sir Henry Halford and I should be added to the Princess Sophia, which was mentioned to his Royal Highness, who readily agreed. Upon this occasion he came publicly, and put on his robes; his Royal Highness was quite composed, and nothing could exceed his pious attention and calm devotion throughout the solemn ceremony. He repeated the prayers, and made the responses, in a firm voice. Part of the prayers for the sick were read, but the service was, at the suggestion of Sir H. Halford, the short service. The Bishop was very much affected, particularly when pronouncing the concluding blessing. The Princess Sophia supported herself wonderfully throughout the trying scene, and the Duke was quite free from agitation. After the service was over he kissed his sister, and shook hands most affectionately with the Bishop, Sir H. Halford, and me, thanking us, and as if taking leave of all.

On the following day, the 29th, his Royal Highness, after passing a tolerable night, appeared better. He had taken some nourishment, and his pulse was steady. He sent for me soon after ten, and spoke very seriously of his situation, but without alarm or agitation. He appeared very desirous of extracting very direct and unreserved answers; often fixed his eye upon me, as if to search my thoughts, and made me change my position, that he might see me better. I appeared not to notice this, but kept up the conversation for an hour and a half, on various subjects of business, &c. This succeeded, and he gradually became more at his ease. He was quite equal to any exertion of mind. When Sir H. Halford came, he announced to his Royal Highness the King's intention to pay him a visit on that day, and his Royal Highness dressed and shaved himself, which he had not been able to do on the preceding day.

The physicians told me that the state of the legs had become more unfavourable. His Royal Highness saw the Adjutant-General and Quarter-Master-General, and transacted business with them as usual.

His Majesty came at two, and staid an hour with his Royal Highness. His Majesty thought him looking better and stronger than on the 27th, but this was the last time he saw him, his Majesty's own indisposition having disappointed his anxious wish to have come again to him.

I learnt early in the morning of the 30th, from Mr. Macgregor, that his Royal Highness had had some sleep at intervals, but that he appeared much weaker, and that there were other indications of increasing danger. His Royal Highness had determined not to quit his bed-room.

He passed a restless night, and appeared much weaker on the following morning (Dec. 31), but continued perfectly sensible, took nourishment when offered to him, but showed no inclination to speak, unless spoken to. His medical attendants apprehended, from the increased weakness, the rapid approach of dissolution. I went to him by desire of the physicians between one and two. He took my hand, and received me most kindly. He said, "Here I am; I feel weaker, but not worse, and I do not suffer pain."—He moved his lips occasionally, but I could not distinguish what he said. He appeared quite sensible, very composed, and twice looked at me, the first time seriously, the second time with a placid, almost a cheerful smile, and I came away perfectly satisfied that his mind was free from anxiety and uneasiness. The Princess Sophia came in, and the manner in which he roused himself when she was announced was very striking. Her Royal Highness stayed with him about twenty minutes. He continued very quiet throughout the rest of the day, and at half-past seven desired Sir A. Cooper, who was going to Windsor, to give his affectionate duty to the King, and to tell him he was very comfortable.

On the 1st January I learnt that his Royal Highness had passed a very quiet night, with four hours' good sleep, and that no material change had taken place in his state; that he continued perfectly sensible, took sufficient nourishment, and spoke whenever roused; nor were the legs in a worse state; on the contrary, their appearance had become more favourable.

Upon the whole, the physicians though he might linger on longer than they had expected, such was the extraordinary resistance which his constitution opposed to the progress of the disease. The Dukes of Clarence and Sussex again saw him, and he received them affectionately, but did not speak, and they left him immediately. The Princess Sophia then went to him; he kissed her, and said, "God bless you, my dear love—to-morrow, to-morrow"—and she left him. He continued in the same quiet and composed state throughout the day, and occasionally told his medical attendants that he felt no pain, and was very comfortable. I did not see him.

The report on the following morning, the 2d January, was, that the night had been quiet, and that he continued free from pain, and perfectly sensible, though he seldom spoke. Soon after nine he had a shivering attack, which was very alarming, and his pulse was hardly perceptible, but he rallied. He had been moved nearer to the window, was quite himself, and asked whether the day was not a frost, which was the case. He became slightly delirious at twenty minutes past one, and other symptoms had become more alarming; still he was quite sensible at intervals. The Princess Sophia was with him for a short time, and he knew her.

I learnt at six on the following morning (the third), from Mr. Macgregor, that, notwithstanding a restless and uncomfortable night, his Royal Highness had rallied.

His Royal Highness passed a very restless night, with occasional attacks of faintness and spasm. His breathing had become more difficult, his pulse more feeble and irregular, but yet there were no symptoms of rapidly approaching dissolution. Sir Astley Cooper had sat up with him to relieve Mr. Macgregor, and when the latter went to his Royal Highness, he desired him to thank him, and say he was very kind.

Between one and two, Mr. Macgregor came to tell me that his Royal Highness had named me frequently, and at last made them understand that he wished to see me. I immediately went to him. I found him dreadfully changed, very feeble, much oppressed, and evidently unable to distinguish objects clearly. Batchelor named me to him, and I sat down close by his right side. He looked at me with a kind smile, took me by the hand, and I told him I had not left the house since I had last seen him. He asked me with difficulty, and in faint, though steady voice, whether Colonel Stephenson was in the house. I said he was, and asked whether he wished to see him; he nodded assent, and I immediately sent for him. Colonel Stephenson went to his left side; but, as his Royal Highness could not see him, I beckoned to him to come to the right side, and I moved back, so as to enable him to come close up, while I supported his Royal Highness, by placing my hand against the pillow, behind his back. He then gave his hand to Colonel Stephenson. After some interval, during which his Royal Highness breathed with great difficulty, and was very faint, and during which Batchelor bathed his temples with Cologne water, he collected his strength, and said in a steady, firm tone of voice, but so low as to be hardly audible to Colonel Stephenson, whose head was further removed than mine, "I am now dying." After this, he dropped his head, and his lips moved for about a minute, as if in prayer. He then looked at us again, and appeared to wish to speak, but an attack of faintness came on, and his respiration was so difficult, and he seemed so weak and exhausted, that I thought he was dying, and expressed that apprehension to Colonel Stephenson, who partook of it. Batchelor bathed his temples again, and he rallied, after which he took Col. Stephenson's hand, and nodded to Batchelor, who told me he meant we should leave him.

The scene was most affecting and trying, but yet in some respects satisfactory, as it shewed that he was perfectly aware of his situation, and we concluded that he had seen us together, as being his executors, and meant to take leave of us. I heard afterwards that he had appeared much exhausted by the effort, but he subsequently took some chicken broth, and became composed, without having any return of faintness. Towards the evening, he rallied again, and had some sound and comfortable sleep, and his attendants separated under the impression that his Royal Highness's life would be prolonged at least another night.

In the course of the night he had so serious an attack of faintness, that Mr. Macgregor though he would not have recovered it; but he rallied again towads the morning of the 5th, and had taken some nourishment. The breathing had, however, become extremely difficult. About eleven Mr. Simpson came to me to say that the symptoms of approaching death had come on, and that the medical attendants wished me to be in the room adjoining that in which his Royal Highness lay. I brought in the Dukes of Clarence and Sussex, and Colonel Stephenson, and we continued in the room, expecting every moment to be called in by the medical attendants (who were all with his Royal Highness) to witness his death. Sir Henry Halford came to us occasionally, and stated, that his Royal Highness's pulse was hardly perceptible, his extremities were cold; he was speechless, and had, with difficulty, swallowed a little milk and rum, but, nevertheless, appeared to retain his senses. Of this, indeed, he gave proof at twelve, for Mr. Macgregor came in to say that his Royal Highness had insisted on having his legs dressed (which they naturally wished to avoid at such a period,) for he had looked at him several times, had pointed at the clock, then at his legs, and had pushed off the covering, thus showing his determination to go through all that was required to the last moment. When he found that he was understood, and that Mr. Macgregor was preparing for the dressing, he signified his thanks with a kind smile, threw back his head, and hardly noticed anything afterwards.

The pulse became more feeble, the attacks of faintness more frequent: but his Royal Highness struggled on, and between eight and nine this state appeared so likely to last for some hours, that the Duke of Clarence was persuaded to go home, and I returned to my room to answer some inquiries. At twenty minutes past nine Colonel Stephenson called me out, and told me that he was in his last agonies. I hastened down, but my dear master had expired before I could reach his room; and I had the comfort of learning that he had expired without any struggle or apparent pain. His countenance, indeed, confirmed this: it was as calm as possible, and quite free from any distortion; indeed it almost looked as if he had died with a smile upon it.

The medical attendants, the Duke of Sussex, Batchelor, and another servant, were in the room, looking at him in silence, and with countenances strongly expressive of their feelings.

Such was the end of this amiable, kind, and excellent man, after a long and painful struggle, borne with exemplary resolution, and resignation, and I am confident, that the details into which I have entered of the last circumstances of that struggle, will not prove uninteresting to those who were sincerely attached to him.

THE LATE DUKE OF YORK'S PLATE.

The finest things in this splendid collection were made by Messrs. Rundell and Bridge, the King's jewellers, and Lewis, of St. James's-street, his late Royal Highness's silversmith (much the greatest part by the latter, the taste and execution of whose workmanship excited the highest admiration); many of the articles fetched more than the price originally charged for them.

First Day.—Lot 61. A Magnificent Cistern, 18½ inches in diameter, the neck and lip enwreathed with vines in fruit, and with two figures of Tritons bending over the rim, and looking in. On the outside of the bowl are represented Combats of Roman Gallies, with numerous figures, very spiritedly designed. This grand bowl is supported upon four figures of Tritons blowing their conchs, and stirring up the combatants. The bowl is burnished, the figures and relief in gold mat, (finely executed by Mr. Lewis;) weight, 811 oz. 10 dwts. Mr. Chrsitie said he considered this the finest specimen of the British art he had ever seen, and he could not account for the low price it sold for.

Lot 72. A capital and very massive punch ladle, by Rundell and Bridge, the bowl of shell pattern, embraced by an Acanthus leaf, the stem ornamented with entwined serpents, the handle terminated by the mask of a warrior, and the Royal Ducal Coronet; in very rich taste. The weight 11 oz. 15 dwts. 20s. per ounce.

Second Day.—Lots 64, 65, and 66. Three pair of circular scalloped fruit dishes; in the center, the Royal Arms are engraved, surrounded by a wreath of fruits, boldly and very richly chased; weight 82 oz. 18s. per oz. made by Lewis.

Lot 100. A set of four very richly chased salt sellars, embellished with landscapes and historical subjects, alternate; also, four shell-shaped salt spoons, with mask handles; weight, 32 oz. 15 dwts. 18s. 6d. per ounce.

Third Day.—Lot 36. A magnificent large candlestick, for the center of a table, with six branches, and a central sconce for a seventh, surmounted by an eagle; the surface of the whole covered with sumptuous chasings of birds and shells, and foliage; about 39 inches high; weight 395 oz. 4 dwts. 8s. 2d. per oz. bought by the Duke of Sussex.

Lot 55. A set of eighteen desert knives, with silver gilt blades, and twisted mother-of-pearl handles; contained in a neat mahogany box, lined with green velvet. An elegant set of twelve small knives, and twelve three-pronged forks, with agate handles, variously and beautifully veined; contained in a mahogany box; weight 40 oz. 10 dwts. 3s. 7d. per oz. by Messrs. Garrard, made by Lewis.

Lots 86, 87, 88, and 89. Four Noble Ice Pails, by Rundell and Bridge, being a small and beautiful model of the very celebrated Antique Vase, in the Conservatory at Warwick Castle. The Bacchic masks on the front and the reverse, illustrative of youth and age, and the sensual nature and intellectual states contrasted, disposed on a tiger's skin, are in mat gold, 10s. 3d. per ounce.

Fourth Day.—Lot 27. A pair of very rich tazzas, of exquisitely beautiful designs and workmanship; within one is represented the state of mankind before the Flood, and an allusion to the catastrophe by water, in fine relief, and on the outside, Faith, Hope, and Charity, in three compartments with trophies. The stem, of vase shape, is supported by termini, in fine cinque cento taste. Figures playing upon musical instruments and trophies, are upon the foot. The other tazza represents the story of Lot and his daughters, and the destruction of Sodom by fire; the exterior stem and foot are embellished with similar ornaments; weight, 49 oz. 10 dwts. 30s. per oz. by Messrs. Rundell and Co. made by Lewis.

Some things fetched much higher prices than we have quoted—even as much as 2 guineas and 2 guineas and a-half per ounce was given for one lot, that had originally been charged by Lewis, we heard, but 25s. per oz. The foreign plate, of which there was a great quantity, seemed in no demand, either by the trade or private buyers; it sold for little above melting prices.

The Executors of the Duke of York have thought it right to place the affairs of his Royal Highness in Chancery, for the purpose of effecting a more rigid examination into the nature of the claims on the Royal Duke's estate. The validity of certain bonds and securities will thus be questioned, and indubitable proof required of their legality before they can be received under the Chancellor's order.—Evening Paper.

That elegant and superb white German cotton hat, which is so universally admired by the fashionable world for summer wear, we find is only imported by Vyse, of Ludgate-street, and is consequently the first house to procure them at.—We likewise inform those Ladies wishing to obtain Children's hats, that he imports infants' and children's Leghorns of superbly fine quality, and the real Brozzi fabric.

It appears, by official returns, that the quantity of foreign wheat now in bond in the warehouses of Great Britain and Ireland, amounts to 528,654 qrs. 3 bushels; and that of wheat-meal and flour, to 61,288 cwt.

The Marquis of Hertford is appointed by his Majesty to proceed on a Special Embassy to the Emperor of Russia, for the purpose of investing his Imperial Majesty with the Ensigns of the Most Noble Order of the Garter.

The remaining portion of MS. of "The Historiettes, or Tales of Continental Life," by the Author of "The English in Italy," having now arrived, and consequently no part lost, as was apprehended, by the robbery of the Neapolitan mail, the publication may be expected as speedily as the printing can be completed, which will in all probability be in the early part of the ensuing week.

On Tuesday evening a general meeting of the silk-weavers of Spitalfields and its vicinity took place at the chapel of the Rev. Mr. Adams, in Church-street, Mile End Town, when it was agreed to petition Parliament to protect the wages of labour.

The Zenana, or a Nuwab's Leisure Hours.—"These volumes contain the stories told to the Nuwab to while away the tedious time previous to his marriage with a certain fair Persian, whose adventures involve a curious and amusing sketch of Asiatic Court intrigue. Nothing since the days of the Arabian Nights have been so thoroughly eastern; and no book of travels can give a more exact and vivid picture of manners and feelings so opposed to our own. We equally advise those who read for amusement, and those who read for information, to peruse these volumes."—Literary Gazette.

Public Library, 52, Rathbone-place.—The Subscribers and the Public are respectfully informed, that the Addenda to the Catalogue of this Library, for the year 1827, is now ready for delivery (gratis). On comparing it with those of the most expensive libraries in London, it will be found to contain an equally large number of new publications, both in French as well as English; and when the low terms of subscription are considered, it is hoped that the claims of the Proprietors for the favours of a discerning Public, will be considered sufficiently well founded to warrant this appeal.—N. B Subscribers and the Public are also respectfully informed that they may be supplied with any new book at 10 per cent. under the selling price, and their orders will be thankfully received and punctually executed.

We give a specimen of another throw at the "Hells", from the publication from Sams' "Letters from Cockney Lands."—It is rather a "crab" for Mr. C—d; the author begins

I'd sooner beg
Than see our country by a leg
Run off with to the deuce.

Then with the coolness of a caster takes you into the presence:

th' entrée
Is only, be known to the gentry
As having Rentals, or some Stocks,
Or Bonds, or what will bear the shocks
Of two small cubes thrown from three-inch
Calibre-tubes

Then he does a bit of history, which is perhaps familiar to some patients:

Where princely * * gives champagne,
Until it mount up to the brain,
And for the sumptuous fare to-day
He only asks the youth to play.
This trick I've heard our sires recount,
One Dr. Brodum erst was wont
To practise—this quack-ridden town
He dosed and bled by turns.

And gives his cousin "Ned" a case in point for warning:

'Twas thrown,
(The ace or deuce,) unlucky devil?
With our grisettes no more he'll revel,
(For every wench is Fortune's slut,)
It ends, began—all in a cut
Or shuffle—Cards, dice (true or loaded)
Should be discharg'd, Ned, and exploded.
A soldier kill'd by London's fog,
A sailor founder'd in a bog,
Are extreme cases, but not worse
Than is an heir, by a cut-purse
Made pennyless, lack-land, lack-friend,
By his first step brought to his end;
The dice and box but to be chang'd
For balls and pistol.

This is enough perhaps—where the cap fits, no doubt it will be edifying.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

It affords us sincere pleasure to observe that Dr. Roy, whose success for the last four or five months in Bath, for the cure of Stammering, and all other Impediments of Speech, and who has excited the astonishment of the medical and scientific world, has just arrived in London, and taken up his residence at No. 66, South Audley-street, Grosvenor-square. We are authorised to state that Dr. Roy's system is totally distinct and different from any other ever practised in this country, and is founded upon a knowledge of the primary cause of Stammering and other Impediments of Speech. The cures made are radical, permanent, and rapid, requiring in many cases only one hour, rarely more than two weeks, and never longer than one month. Dr. Roy has references to many of the first physicians in Bath, who have not only witnessed his unprecedented success, but who, having been confidentially made acquainted with Dr. R.'s system, declare it founded upon unerring philosophical principles, and that it cannot fail of success. In confirmation of the above we subjoin some editorial remarks, extracted from the Bath Herald; the case in question was, at the request of the patient, together with the gentlemen present, whose names are annexed, submitted to the public:—

"Guided by sentiments of the most unbiassed and disinterested character, we feel ourselves called upon as editors, for the general benefit of society, to draw the attention of those who may be unfortunately afflicted with Stammering, or hesitation of speech, under every form, and howsoever inveterate or distressing from concomitant symptoms, to the new systems of Dr. Roy, a physician of high respectability, now residing at No. 7, Great Pulteney-street, in this city; and we do so with more decided and unmixed satisfaction, from a persuasion, that the system being founded on unerring philosophical principles, and a knowledge of the radical cause of Stammering, the cure is effected not only with certainty, but without the aid of any surgical operation whatever. In the new and triumphant case, to which we this week solicit the notice of the public, the patient, a young man 25 years of age, had been visited with this painful affection, during a period of 18 years; it having been brought on, as he stated, at the early age of seven years, by the effects of fright. The impediment in this severe case, attended as it was with long, laborious, and ineffectual attempts at articulation, painful equally to the patient and his hearers (several highly respectable individuals of this city, who had met at Dr. Roy's for the purpose of seeing the case both before and after it was submitted to his cure) was to their astonishment removed in the short space of three minutes, to such an extent, that during a conversation of upwards of 20 minutes, the patient exhibited not a vestige of having ever laboured under this affection, and expressed his thorough conviction that by a short perseverance in Dr. Roy's instructions, the complaint must be radically removed, and could not by any possibility return. The name and address of the party is, at his express desire, communicated to the public, being Joseph Morgan, pewterer, No. 1, Alder's-court, Broadmead, Bristol. We feel the highest gratification in adding, that several of the gentlemen present on this occasion, actuated by the same feeling of public benefit with ourselves, have readily consented to attest the correctness and authenticity of the above statement, viz.:—

"James Randolph, Esq. Solictor.
"S. Fisher, M. D.
"C. H. Wilkinson, M. D.
"N. Gifford, Esq."

De Vere.—We hear that this new Work, by the celebrated Author of Tremaine, embraces, in its subject matter, affairs of the most elevated and interesting nature, and which have not, hitherto, found their way into novels. Indeed, none but the Author in question, who is generally suspected to be an individual of political consequence, could detail the scenes and events which we understand, form prominent accompaniments to the fable of De Vere; such for example, as the high affairs of the Court—the mysteries of the Cabinet—the secret intrigues of Administration, &c. &c.—Morn. Chron.

Elopement Extraordinary.—On Monday last an elopement of a singular nature created much sensation in the village of Lenham, where the parties resided. The gallant, a young man aged 27, selected a lady of the age of 51, wife of a labouring man, and who he was perfectly sure would be blind to all his faults—for, alas! she had lost her eyesight these ten years past; but her feelings were quick as ever; for, before starting, she ransacked the drawers of all she could lay hold of. The parties were traced to Rochester, and stated there that they were proceeding to America. It is thought in the village she will see her folly.—Kentish Gazette.

THE STOCK MARKET.

SATURDAY, 4 O'CLOCK.

During the week, Consols have fluctuated between $82\frac{1}{4}$, which was the opening price on Monday, and 83, which was obtained for a short time on Wednesday. Notwithstanding the probability, from what passed at the meeting of Bank proprietors, that the amount of outstanding Exchequer Bills will be greatly increased, the value of them is not at all decreased, but on the contrary the first price on Monday was 34s., and to day it was 40s. premium. The paying of the dividends in a few days will, no doubt, by thinning the market of money stock, keep up the Funds at their present rate for some time longer. This morning the market commenced steady at $82\frac{3}{4}$, but fell $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, in consequence of a report of HIS MAJESTY'S ILLNESS, but recovered a little and ultimately closed at $82\frac{1}{2}$.

THE AGE.

LONDON, MARCH 25.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER stated, in the House of Commons on Friday last, that it was not his intention to bring forward the Budget until after Easter —the principal reason, which has led to this arrangement, being, the impossibility of immediately ascertaining the additional expence incurred by sending the Expedition to Portugal.

The passing events of each day more strongly impress on our minds the wisdom and policy of the vote recently passed in the House of Commons, on the subject of enquiry into the Catholic claims. The arguments used by the advocates of the measure will be found totally fallacious, and not warranted by the present state of things in both countries. The basis of these arguments consists in fearful apprehension for the safety of the constitution, arising from the supposed resentment which the Catholic population must feel for disappointed hopes; that all the elements of political confusion will be roused into action, and the struggle for ascendancy will be followed by a dissolution of the form of society, and that if ministers waited for such an issue, when by going into inquiry they might prevent it, they had undertaken a responsibility not warranted by their public duty, and, therefore, tantamount to a violation of their trust. This will be found to be the substance of the argument in favour of inquiry; other topics have been introduced to give a colouring to the piece, but the entire force of the reasoning on that side will be found to resolve itself into what we have stated. For our own part, we cannot anticipate such melancholy results, we have too strong a reliance on the inviolability of the bulwarks of the constitution, and of the attachment of the subject to its principles. We cannot suppose that an age of anarchy and revolution is to follow, because the Legislation will not consent to have the basis of the Constitution changed from Protestant to Catholic. We are not to believe that several millions of HIS MAJESTY'S subjects, who hitherto have signalised themselves in their zeal for the support of the laws and constituted authorities, who have experienced the mild and benevolent clemency of the Legislature in the mitigation of those grievances, which the delinquency of their ancestors had justly earned, will unite for the purpose of subverting that Constitution: No. This is not the language of the Catholic hierarchy, neither is it its intention; they know full well the path to political reformation must not be stained by the blood of civil war; that insurrection is a foul monster, and that if the Legislature is to be asked for an extension of its clemency, its refusal must not be succeeded by an assault on the Constitution. The sentiments of the Catholic hierarchy are not to be estimated by the conduct of the turbulent oligarchy who have usurped the direction of their affairs; these men are actuated by the most unworthy motives: their object is not to obtain for the Catholic the abolition of those laws whose provisions are (most unjustly) said to press with hardship upon him. No: it is to excite the popular feelings to acts of disgraceful outrage: to alienate the people from their gracious Sovereign, whom they otherwise would sincerely love: to teach them to believe that Parliament is illiberal and iniquitous because it will not consent to the invasion of the Constitution: and lastly, that to withhold emancipation is to denounce the Roman Catholics. We deeply deplore, as we also loudly deprecate, such conduct; but we trust that a greater power than the feeble hand of man has interposed to check the torrent of such Machiavelism: that the all-glorious light of the sacred Scriptures will dissipate the state of midnight ignorance in which the Roman Catholics have been enveloped: that He, "whose way is in the sea, and whose paths are in the great waters, and whose footsteps are not known," will direct this benighted people in the way to true Christianity, by which alone they can hope for eternal salvation, and be completely emancipated from the hands of these political enemies.

We have already affirmed, that it is not from political reformation the improvement of Ireland is to be expected. No system can be more erroneous than that which professes to give civil freedom to a people which it leaves at the same time to groan under the burden of religious domination. Let us not, therefore, flatter ourselves with the idea, that the misery and degradation of the Irish Roman Catholic population consists in the exclusion of a few of its numbers from seats in the British Senate, by reason of their religious professions. This is not the real evil; it is but a pretext to cover the ambitious designs of desperate political adventurers, who are guided solely by a love for their own interests, and a total indifference to the issue of the cause they have embarked in. The motives of these agitators are the same with those of the Roman Catholic Clergy—a thirst after base lucre; and it is melancholy to behold how long they have practised their patriotic frauds on the deluded classes of the Irish. But the time is fast approaching when Truth, empowered by that Will which imparts the giant's strength to the infant's arm, will burst the frightful mass of duplicity that has endeavoured to suppress it—when all the arts and machinations of these turbulent demagogues will be fully exposed to public examination, and their political delinquencies recorded with universal contempt. Then we shall see the Catholic population of Ireland actuated by a sincere love and attachment to the Gracious MONARCH of these realms, and to the principles of that Constitution which placed his Illustrious Ancestors on the British throne. We shall see them evincing a kind of filial love, founded upon a conviction of obligations received, of kindnesses conferred, which no circumstances can subdue, and which few can strengthen—a morality of political instinct, the very sacrament of loyalty and duty, blowing spontaneously from the heart, almost without an effort, and filling the avenues to the Throne with thousands of benedictions.

As one of the many reasons that might be offered in support of the principle we contend for, that political reformation is totally inadequate to remove the existing evils in Ireland, we merely refer to the state of that country previous to the establishment of the united system of education, which has worked so much good; and we would ask to what cause is to be ascribed the present progress of the Reformation in Ireland, but to this religious and moral system of education? Is there a single instance of an individual renouncing the errors of Popery and embracing the Protestant Faith, previous to this institution? To what then, we ask, is this great revolution in the religious creed of the Irish Roman Catholic to be attributed? Prior, and subsequent to the year 1816, it is almost needless to mention, how many political remedies were applied for the cure of existing evils—scarcely a measure which the wisdom of the Senate could devise that had not been tried for this purpose; and is there a single case of conversion from Popery to be found resulting from this defective system?—not one—such was the domination exercised by the priesthood over the minds of their flocks, such their unwearied efforts to keep the Catholic population under the yoke of religious slavery, and in ignorance of the Sacred Scriptures, that it became impossible to burst the bonds of oppression under which they laboured, unless through the irresistible power of the Divine Writings; when the youthful mind began to taste of this fountain of the living waters, and then the mist of irreligion began to dissipate, and the intellectual vision of the worshipers of Idolatry became enlightened with the spirit of religious truth—the dawn of true Christianity was instantly followed by a renunciation of Popish error, thereby proving, that when the mind of man is once relieved from the thraldom of religious slavery, his pursuit after scriptural research becomes unbounded—the elasticity of its nature, as it were, recoils back with all the force of conviction, and fixes his attention more firmly on the important truths of the sacred volume—to this illuminating influence of God's Holy Word, and to this alone, must be attributed the present state of religious and moral improvement in Ireland—that it has been objected by some of the enemies of this system, that education is merely the pretence, and proselytism the purpose—though this be a charge of a very undefined nature, vague in its terms, and without one instance having been given (not to say proved) of its existence: to refute this accusation we shall give an extract from the Report of the Commissioners of Education Enquiry, presented in last Session, pages 48 and 49.—"It has been (says the Report) frequently imputed to this society, that their real object is to make converts from the Roman Catholic to the Protestant religion—no fact has come to our knowledge that leads us to doubt their own repeated disclaimers of having any such intention." And further the Report states—"Mr. Donalson has assured us, that he would not act as an inspector of the society, if he were not convinced that they had the intention only of giving education without proselytising—that as far as he has known they have endeavoured to protect the Roman Catholics in every possible way consistent with the laws. That he has been in the habit of applying to the Roman Catholic clergymen for information on this subject, and has never met with any thing like a proof of such an assertion: that before his acceptance of the office (Inspector), he had a conversation with Doctors Tray and Curtis, who gave their most unqualified approbation of his undertaking it: and that he believes the appointment was proposed to him for the specific purpose of giving a pledge to the Roman Catholics of the sincerity of the motives of the Kildare Place Society."—What will the causists of the day say after this?

We hope that, in the future discussions of every question involving the state of Ireland, we shall have no more of this unfounded charge—a charge which only requires the exercise of common sense to refute it. If the object of the Education Society was to make proselytes, why employ Roman Catholic teachers in the different schools founded by that Institution, and, in order to insure success, call in the aid of the Roman Catholic Clergymen? Or why employ inspectors of the Roman Catholic persuasion to go through the country to ascertain that neither teachers or patrons were negligent of their duty? And yet all this has been done, as appears from the Report we have referred to. We profess we are amazed to perceive what ignorance is displayed by some individuals (who ought to know better) respecting the state of Ireland. It is quite distressing to hear the unfounded and wanton attacks that are daily made against the local administration of the Irish Government, by persons whose rank and influence in the country forbid us to suppose them ignorant of its internal situation; and yet these individuals do display a lamentable want of knowledge in some instances in which the political condition of Ireland is involved. Others affect to sneer at any effort made for her improvement, unless it happens to originate in themselves, and then indeed they become insufferably noisy in eulogizing its policy and their own sapient understandings.

We could wish to see a more cordial spirit of co-operation actuating those persons, whose duty ought to be to watch over the general interests of their native soil. We are deeply concerned to find that the strong bias for individual interests, and the still more powerful one in support of political animosities, accompanies several representatives for that country into the British Senate; that they forget when they enter the sacred temple of the Legislature, all feelings of this nature should yield to the paramount duty they owe their country, and that is to legislate for her national happiness. On this part of the subject we feel we should be guilty of a criminal dissimulation, if we allowed it to pass unnoticed; it is this line of selfish policy which makes property insecure and industry precarious—it impedes the stream of justice in its course—it elevates one class and humiliates another—it is the insurmountable barrier, the impassible line of separation which divides the nation, and which, by keeping animosity alive, prevents the entire and cordial intermixture of the people—it is a kind of curse which multiplies every evil, and destroys every advantage; but let this once be abolished, and a blessing will succeed, for which there is no price, because there can be no compensation. We would remind those individuals whose duty it is to watch over the interests of the sister country, to unite their strength for that purpose; to recollect that the wisdom and power of Parliament is incompetent to produce the great advantages so much to be hoped for without their co-operation; and that if they withhold this, they commit a violation of duty, serious in its consequences, and unjustifiable in principle.

The recent accounts from Ireland, announce it to be the intention of the Roman Catholics to hold aggregate Meetings, for the purpose of preparing petitions to the Throne. We hope, for the sake of the national tranquillity, they will not attempt it; if they do, we only request they will bear in mind the advice of one of their sincere friends, the Marquis CORNWALLIS:—

> "If the Catholics should now proceed to violence, or entertain any ideas of gaining their object by convulsive measures, or forming associations with men of jacobinical principles, they must of course lose the support and aid of those, who have sacrificed their own situations in their cause, but who would at the same time feel it to be their indispensable duty to oppose every thing tending to confusion."

A barrister asked Judge PARK, the other day, if he did not think TOM RAIKES's verdict very hard upon the merchant?—To which PARK replied, "Certainly not: I am of opinion Mr. RAIKES ought to think himself very lucky to get 40*s*. for his ugliness, when 20*s*. is the common price of beauty, in this town."

The last accounts from Madrid state the general report, that the Spanish Army of Observation was to be increased to 60,000 men, and that the Minister of Finance was straining every nerve to obtain funds for the purpose. Recent letters from Badajos and Alcantra confirm the statements of the numerous desertions among the troops. The rebel CHAVES is said to have arrived, a fugitive, at Alcanizes, attended only by two servants."

News from Madrid, dated the 11th instant, states that the Portuguese troops, having advanced in three divisions, the Rebels, commanded by Magessi and Montealegre, penetrated into Spain by Abella, Noso, and St. Anne, but were not suffered to pass till they laid down their arms. On the morning of the 8th the rebels were marched to the depot, on the confines of Old Castile and Arragon. Their arms were ordered to be delivered to the Spanish Authorities. The number disarmed are estimated at 3,000 infantry and cavalry. There is an unauthenticated rumour that CHAVES has had himself declared King of PORTUGAL and ALGARVES, under the title of EMANUEL II. It is stated that GEN. RODIL, who commands part of the Spanish Army of Observation, and GENERAL SARSFIELD, have sent in their resignation. It is said there are discontents among the troops, which the Generals cannot appease, and which the Government affects to impute to secret societies.

The Count of OFALIA was quitting Madrid as Ambassador to this country, notwithstanding the efforts of the Apostolic Junta. Some letters state, that disunion prevails to such a degree amongst the Portuguese Royalists, that MONTEALEGRE represented his nephew, CHAVES, as insane, and as the cause of all their losses.

It is quite painful to contemplate the scenes of outrage, which still continue to pervade so many parts of the sister kingdom, the result entirely of those atrocious doctrines which the leaders of the CATHOLIC PARTY in Ireland are disseminating through the land.

Another instance has just been published, of Mr. CROKER's house, at Ballybay, near Clogheen, being broken into, and robbed of money, goods, and, far above every other consideration, a quantity of fire-arms, which appears to have been the more immediate object of their search and depredation. These continued aggressions have naturally excited, in the minds of the Magistracy, a desire for again requiring the protection of the Insurrection Act, the re-enactment of which is every hour rendered more essential. We have very great pleasure in submitting the following letter, addressed by the Earl of GLENGALL to the Magistrates of the county of Tipperary, in which His LORDSHIP's opinions are judiciously and forcibly given; and are such, as to warrant an expectation that the appeal to His MAJESTY's Government would be attended with the desired effect. We certainly think Lord GLENGALL's prompt and able communication is one that entitles His LORDSHIP, at the present moment, to the highest commendation:—

"TO THE MAGISTRATES OF THE COUNTY OF TIPPERARY.

"Gentlemen,—From the numerous and well-authenticated representations I have received from many of the most respectable gentlemen, of the dreadful system of outrage which is fearlessly carried on by bands of armed ruffians, in many of the districts of the county, as one of the Governors of it, I feel it my duty to recommend you to call another Meeting, for the purpose of again representing to his Majesty's Government the state of anarchy which prevails, and requiring, for the well-disposed inhabitants, the protection of the Insurrection Act."

"I am aware that an additional force of police is about to be sent into the disturbed districts, and, as the law at present stands, their efforts will be considerably restricted, by which the expense of the force will necessarily be continued for a longer period in the county.

"I understand, from the best authority, that your memorial for this strong enactment, was refused chiefly on the ground, that you applied for it merely as a precautionary measure; if such were your intention (which I doubt) in my humble opinion you were fully justified, as the horrible murder of Mr. Barry too clearly proves.

"I regret that a severe accident has of late prevented me from taking that active part which the urgency of the case requires from all Magistrates.

"I have the honour to be, gentlemen,
"Your obedient servant,
"GLENGALL."

Mr. COLBURN, the very spirited publisher of New Burlington-street, is about to publish some "Familiar Letters" to the fishmonger, telling "the secrets of the prison house," which will make, from what we hear, a pretty sensation in the "Circle." The Noble Lord, to whose Muse report ascribes them, is certainly equal to the task.

CROCKFORD HOUSE.

Mr. LUTTRELL's amusing work, under this title, has been received with universal favour, and has secured for its talented author an addition to the reputation which his Letters to Julia in Rhyme had previously procured him. But there are some circumstances connected with this publication, that have excited a degree of interest, with which its merits are not so much interwoven, as is the general cause of literature, and of this sample of it in particular.

Mr. MURRAY, the man of foolscap, in Albemarle-street, having published before for Mr. LUTTRELL, readily consented to do so in the present instance, and a very modest bargain was made, by which the author was to receive half the profits of his work, after the expences of publication were deducted from the sale. On these considerations, Mr. LUTTRELL consigned his work to the bibliopolist to be forthwith ushered into the world. But after having passed "the fiery ordeal" of approbation from this great man, which one would naturally believe was the only, or, at least, the most alarming, one, it appears Mr. LUTTRELL, like many other eminent authors, had to pass through another ceremony, of far more consequence and decision, than the former. It was but natural to suppose that the great Mr. MURRAY's sanction! was Mr. LUTTRELL's Rubicon! but this calculation is one very seldom entertained behind Absolute John's till. To suppose Mr. JOHN MURRAY incapable of judging a work, is as indecorous and absurd as it would be to suppose his numerous authors incapable of writing one—nevertheless, to use the words of Major Von Glossen, when resting on his cane, "as two heads are better than one," Mr. MURRAY, after accepting a gentleman's production, sends it to Mr. LOCKHART, the Editor of the Quarterly Review, to know if he has done right. To this dreadful tribunal, accordingly, JOHN despatched Crockford House, for the opinion of his Rhadamanthus, who, after a hasty perusal, sent him word, that he saw little talent in it, and considered it quite infra dig. for JOHN to publish.

The book was, however, printed, and very shortly after this, Mr. LUTTRELL saw it advertised, (without receiving the slightest intimation to that effect) to be published by ANDREWS, of Bond-street. On remonstrating with the Monarch of Albemarle-street, he was apprised of all that had passed, and naturally looked upon the transaction as one of unprecedented insolence and impropriety; and after much cabal, it was only on the representation of Mr. MOORE, Mr. ROGERS, and other literary friends of Mr. LUTTRELL, that this redoubtable bookseller consented to let Crockford House emanate from his counter. We are totally at a loss to understand the principle upon which Mr. MURRAY acts. If he wants to shirk any bargain he has made, he might find several better expedients than the one he in this instance adopted—if he mistrusts his own judgment, he is unfit for his business—but if he expects to retain in his service any author of the slightest repute, he must adopt a very different mode to that which he, in this instance, has done. In Heaven's name, who would suffer a line of their writing to be judged by Mr. LOCKHART, or even read by him, until he takes upon himself the task of cutting it up in the Quarterly Review? Who can possibly have a sufficiently favourable opinion of Mr. LOCKHART's abilities, to value his judgment at the price of the pen, which dictates it? What has Mr. LOCKHART ever written, that entitles him to the occupation of the curule chair?

It is bad enough to have to endure his verbiage, when it comes before the eyes of mankind, in congenial foolscap, from Mr. MURRAY's shop, by quarterly instalments, in company with some of the really able writers who subscribe to that Magazine; but certainly, in no other shape, is it tolerable. And yet, it seems, that before such a bar has a portion of the talent of this country to appear, for trial, and, generally speaking, condemnation. Is there any literary man who will not exclaim against this—who will not feel that he "had as lief the towncrier spoke his lines," as Mr. LOCKHART read them? It is impossible to think of any thing more absurd, and if Mr. MURRAY be desirous of securing to himself the talent of those distinguished men, who now visit his till, he must for ever banish from his mind so monstrous an idea. Mr. LUTTRELL has been most shamefully used in this transaction—for any publisher would have cheerfully given him at least 150*l.* or 200*l.* for this trifle, whereas he now stands a chance, (unless he immediately dispose of the SECOND EDITION elsewhere) of not getting as many shillings. In addition to this, he is sure to "catch it right and left," as Mr. LOCKHART elegantly expresses himself, in the next Quarterly Review; for which, if he has fortitude equal to his genius, he will care not a button. As the reader may probably be anxious to know the cause of Mr. LOCKHART's opinion of the merits of Mr. LUTTRELL's muse, we beg to direct their attention to the following extract from Crockford House, on the subject of modern criticism:—

Since these Heroes of the pen
War with women thus, and men,
Since their viewless arrows strike
Every head and heart alike,
Why should they have power to vex,
Grieve, or injure either sex?
Thus from post to pillar hunted,
Patience tired, and feelings blunted,
Say, what armour of defence
Have we but—indifference?
But to live unhurt in slander,
As, in fire, the Salamander?

Reader, be what you appear,
Keep your fame and conscience clear,
And, regardless of their frown,
Laugh, or rather live them down.
If encompassed with a skin
Somewhat sensitive and thin,
At their stripes you ever winced,
Steeled at length, at length convinced
That, with many faults or few,
(Since whate'er you say or do
They are certain to condemn)
You've no chance of pleasing them,
Scorn to taste the poisoned chalice
Lifted to your lips by Maliee;
Let no slanderer stir your bile,
Read his libels with a smile,
Or unheeded on the shelf
Let them lie, and—please yourself.

There is a Jew, somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Surrey Theatre, who is in the habit of asking every actor he meets for an order to see him perform; and, whenever he is refused, his reply is, "Very vell, my boy, I shall pay de money; but if you hears a hiss, you knows vhere it comes from." We very forcibly impress this maxim on Mr. LUTTRELL's attention—and sincerely hope he will himself practise the advice he has so ably given to others; especially bearing in mind, that if, as in the case of our friend the Jew, when the next "Quarterly" appears, he should "hear a hiss," he will be sure to "know where it comes from."

The interesting narrative, of the last moments of the lamented Duke of YORK, drawn up by Lieutenant-General Sir HERBERT TAYLOR, and published, from authority, by SAMS, in St. James's-street, will be found in our second page.

THEATRICALS.

There are really so many places of amusement now open, that a man need have nothing else to do than visit them, and nothing else to write, than criticise them—and yet to neglect any, that are really entitled to attention, savours both of partiality and injustice.

We have been indebted, for three hours of infinite amusement to Mr. MATHEWS, whose entertainment of the Home Circuit is replete with abundance of whim and character. We do not think the performance—that is to say, as a literary production—has the genuine stamp, which has rendered some of its predecessors so current—the wit, to our notions, is much more commonplace, and the general tone of the dialogue more mediocre, than the quality which his exhibitions have usually contained. But saying that, we have only admitted a position, of consequence to very few visiters, and in noways affecting the general reception, or estimation of the piece: for, in the grand point of representation, Mr. MATHEWS's talent has lost not one particle of its humour, its brilliancy, or its identity of character. In his performance of the last year, Mr. MATHEWS was not as successful as he had previously been in the finale to his entertainment—for the City Barge was assuredly as dull an affair, per se, as ever came before public observation—he might as well have represented St. Paul's, or the Monument, or any other metropolitan monopoly—and his universal admirers will even admit that he would have done wiser to have omitted the "tag" altogether, than have had such a one as the City Barge was. A man of such extraordinary observation as MATHEWS, was not likely to let any fault of this kind escape him: and this last year's error has been well atoned for on the present occasion. His Theatrical Gallery is "a palpable hit"—he has never done any thing more ably—it is food for every mouth, and is at once the most agreeable and most finished mode of conveying a personal imitation. Mr. MATHEWS has herein a double gratification, for, in eliciting the unbounded applause which his performance does, he is only receiving, in a multiplied degree, the admiration of those numerous visitors to the real Simon Pure at Kentish Town—his own residence—in which his genius, industry, and property, have erected a monument to their owner's character, that will render it illustrious for ever and ever. We cannot imagine a more gratifying circumstance to any man, than the homage which is nightly paid to Mr. MATHEWS in this Monopolylogue; and it must be an earnest to him, that, highly as his abilities are rated by every one who ever saw him, it is an admiration inferior, if possible, to that which is bestowed on the consequence and respectability, which his taste has thrown around his profession.

Our friend ELLISTON is "alive" again, but we sincerely hope not "kicking." The lives of a cat are nothing to his; for instead of nine, he has literally nine hundred. It was always one of the old sayings, and almost the only true one, of the many fools who have flattered KING ROBERT into a belief of any thing, that if he were thrown naked over London-bridge, he would come up dressed in a full court suit at Blackwall—he must have been dipped, heel and all, in the Styx, for such an invulnerable fellow has never been heard of, since the siege of Troy. He is now up to his ears in a New Brunswick theatre; a title which he is understood to have selected, in compliment to his American successor at Drury Lane, whom he promised to patronise, on meeting him some time since at the dinner-table of the modern Prince of Denmark, Mr. JAMES WINSTON. All this is very considerate. In the mean time, there is more happiness in store for HIS MAJESTY's liege subjects, than they seem to be aware of. The renowned ROBERT WILLIAM (a correspondent apprises us) has taken the Surrey theatre, and if he should but revive a sixteenth part of his former exploits in that classic ground, he cannot possibly produce better entertainment. If moreover, in imitation of Sadler's Wells, he should offer the public entertainment of a more liquid character, of which he is himself so eminent a composer, there will be no end to the good fortune of "ELLISTON's entire."

We have been accused of injustice, in not paying that attention to YATES's solo performance, to which it is entitled. "We confess the Cape." Our limits, however, this week will not enable us to say about it all that either party could wish, and we will, therefore, postpone the task for a week—at present, it is enough to say, that the Adelphi is full every night of his performance, and that it well deserves to be so. "DANIEL and the profits," as we on one occasion before said, is the study, after all.

CONVENTION

Between his Majesty and her Royal Highness the Infanta Regent of Portugal, for providing for the maintenance of a corps of British troops, sent to Portugal Dec. 1826; signed at Brighthelmston, Jan. 19, 1827.

In the name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity.

Her Royal Highness the Infanta Regent of Portugal having, in consequence of aggressions committed against the Portuguese territory, claimed the fulfilment, by his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of the ancient treaties of alliance and friendship which subsists between the two Crowns: and his Britannic Majesty having thereupon resolved to send, and having actually sent, a body of troops to Portugal, the two high contracting parties think it necessary to agree upon certain arrangements for the maintenance of the said troops during their stay in Portugal, and have named as their Plenipotentiaries for that purpose, viz.:

His Majesty, the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Hon. George Canning, a member of his said Majesty's Most Hon. Privy Council, a member of Parliament, and his said Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs: and her royal Highness the Infanta Regent of Portugal, the Most Illustrious and Most Excellent Lord, Don Pedro de Souza e Holstein, Marquis of Palmella, a Peer of the Kingdom of Portugal, Grand Cross of the Order of Christ, Knight of the Order of the Golden Fleece, Grand Cross of several other Orders, and Her Royal Highness's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to his Britannic Majesty; who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon, and concluded the following articles:—

Art. 1. Her Royal Highness the Infanta Regent of Portugal, anxious that the body of troops which has been so promptly sent to her Royal Highness's aid by his Britannic Majesty, should be treated with the hospitality becoming the relations of the two allied nations, engages to provide the necessary barracks and quarters, and buildings for hospitals, and for stores and magazines, and the necessary rations of provisions and forage, for the officers non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and for the horses and cattle of the British auxiliary army, according to the regulations of the British service.

2. The provisions and forage above specified are to be delivered to the British Commissariat, at a distance not greater than six Portuguese leagues from the head-quarters of each British detachment to which they are supplied, unless in cases where a different arrangement shall be made, with the consent of the British Commissariat.

3. In order to obviate the difficulties which an immediate disbursement of funds for the purchase of the aforesaid provisions and forage might occasion, under the present circumstances, to the Government of Portugal, it is agreed that the British Commissary-General shall, for the present, provide those supplies for the British army, charging the cost thereof to the account of the Portuguese Government.

As, however, cases may arise, in which it may be more convenient to receive such supplies from Portuguese magazines, for the purpose of avoiding competition in the markets, the British Commissary General shall, in the execution of this agreement, concert his proceedings from time to time with a person appointed for that end by the Government of Portugal.

4. The accounts of the British Commissariat being approved and signed by the Commander of the Auxiliary Army, shall be delivered every three months to the Portuguese Government, which, having verified the same, shall either pay the amount thereof forthwith to the British Commissary General, or carry it over to the credit of the British Government, as shall be judged most convenient by the two Governments.

5. The cost of provisions and forage for the British troops shall be placed to the account of the Portuguese Government, from the day of the landing of the said troops in Portugal, and shall cease to be placed to that account from the day of their departure, or of their passing the frontiers of Portugal.

6. Her Royal Highness the Infanta Regent of Portugal, having consented that on this, as on former occasions, the forts of St. Julien and of Bugio shall be occupied by the British troops, it is agreed that the said occupation shall continue so long as the auxiliary army shall remain in Portugal. Those forts shall be, from time to time, duly provisioned by the Portuguese Government, or by the British Commissariat on account of the Portuguese Government, in the same manner as is provided in the foregoing articles with respect to the Auxiliary Army.—Arrangements shall be made between the Government of Portugal and the Commander of the British Army, for the carrying on of the service of the Pratique, of the Police of the Harbour, and of the Customs, by the proper officers of the Portuguese Government, usually employed for those purposes. A list of these officers shall be given to the British Commanding Officer, and they shall be strictly under his command in all that may relate to military service, and to the defence of the forts.

7. His Britannic Majesty requiring, on the part of his ally, only that which is indispensably necessary for ensuring the proper maintenance of his troops, and for the good of the common service, declares that he will not bring forward any pecuniary claims whatever against the Portuguese Government, on account of the assistance furnished by his Majesty on this occasion to Portugal, beyond what is specified in the preceding articles.

8. The stipulations of this convention shall remain in full force until the two high contracting parties shall mutually agree to make any change therein.

9. The present convention shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in London in the space of six weeks from the date hereof, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the same, and have affixed thereto the seals of their arms.

Done at Brighthelmston, January 19,

British Spirits.—From Returns which have been just laid before Parliament, an immense increase of the total quantity of spirits detailed in Great Britain and Ireland appears to have taken place within the last three years. The whole quantity distilled in the year 1824 was, in round numbers, fifteen million gallons, imperial measure, and in the year 1826, the whole quantity was twenty millions of gallons, being an increase of five million gallons within this short period. Of this increase, about half a million belongs to England, about two millions to Ireland, and about two and a half to Scotland; so that the increase in the quantity of spirits distilled in Scotland amounts to the whole increase of England and Ireland. The quantity of spirits imported into England from Scotland was, in the year 1824, about a million gallons, and in 1826 nearly three millions and a quarter; so that the increased importation into England nearly covers the whole increase of distillation in Scotland. The whole quantity imported from Ireland was, in 1824, about half a million gallons, and in the year 1826, this quantity had not increased by more than a quarter of a million. It is obvious therefore, that Scotch whisky is a much greater favourite in this country than Irish. If the quantity of spirits distilled in England, together with the quantity imported from Scotland and Ireland into England, may be taken as a fair measure of the quantity of gin and whisky drank in England during a year, as the quantity was for the year 1824, about four million gallons, and for the year 1826, about seven million, it would appear that within the period of two years the number or capacity of gin-drinkers in England has nearly doubled.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Monday, March 19.

Eight petitions were presented against, and six in favour of, Catholic Emancipation. Several petitions were also presented against any alteration in the Corn Laws.

TUESDAY, March 20.

The Duke of DEVONSHIRE, on presenting a petition for emancipation from the Catholics of a parish near Dungarvon, expressed his regret at the decision lately taken by the other House on the Catholic Claims. It was his conviction that their prayer ought to be granted; and if any thing added to that conviction, it was the events of the last year, which shewed that the Catholics felt as one man on that question.

The Marquis of LANSDOWN said, he had withdrawn his motion to prevent that irritation which might be excited if both Houses decided not to take the state of Ireland into consideration. Specific remedies to the evils occasioned by Catholic disabilities had been repeatedly proposed to the House, and as repeatedly rejected, under the influence of the Noble and Learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor). Nay, they had not only been rejected, but, although most constitutional in their shape and wise in their provisions, they had been treated with contempt under that influence. He hoped that the Noble Lord would not one day have to regret his triumph.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Noble Marquis had been pleased to say that the rejection of the Catholic claims had been caused from his influence. He could only say, God forbid that this should be the fact! His opinion, his hope, and indeed his confidence were, that their Lordships' decisions were those of a Protestant Parliament and a Protestant King, and little influenced by the opinions of an individual. He knew his own imperfections too well to suppose that their Lordships would adopt his opinions on a matter of such consequence. Near the close of his career, he was determined, as the subject of a Protestant King, with a Protestant Legislature, to go down to his grave without having lessened the security of the civil and religious liberties of the country. He had made up his mind on these points, that their Lordships were either to do what was asked of them without securities, or that they must have much better ones than those which had been offered, and which were most ineffective, though proposed by so many able men. There was not a man in the kingdom who was a greater friend to toleration than he was; and were those the last words which he should have to utter, he would say, "For God's sake, for the sake of the Protestant, for the sake of the Catholic subjects of his Majesty, preserve that Constitution which was earned by the exertions of your ancestors. Let the Catholics have every thing which the Constitution can give them, save power in a Protestant State."

The petition was laid on the table.

THE GAME LAWS.

Lord SUFFIELD presented for the fourth year the petition of the Magistrates of Norfolk against the Game Laws, signed by the Lord Lieutenant, the High Sheriff, the two Members, and fifty-eight Magistrates of the county.—Laid on the table.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE, in moving the second reading of the Game Laws Amendment Bill, reminded their Lordships that it was founded on the principle of giving to every man power over the game in his own land; of preventing trespasses on other persons' land, and making it legal to dispose of game.

The Marquis of SALISBURY would not oppose the sale of game under certain regulations, but could not approve of the other parts of the Bill, which was generally inapplicable to the present state of things. It would be impossible, for instance, under its provision, to convict a poacher unless caught in the fact, or even to inflict punishment for trespass.

Lord REDESDALE objected to the proposed alterations as interfering with the right of property in such a way as would produce actions on actions without end. There would be no end of the disputes which it would introduce on the subject of property.

The LORD CHANCELLOR thought that no end could be put to poaching, unless an end was also put to preserves of game. One of his greatest delights, in vacation time, was to see that his dogs knew their points, and when to stop, and, indeed, they gave proofs of more ability than the lawyers with whom he had to deal during the other ten months of the year. The principle of the Bill deserved to be upholden, but the difficulty was to carry that principle effectually into execution. Some of the clauses could not stand, especially that which rendered game property.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE briefly replied.

The House then divided

Contents, 38 | Non-contents, 17 | Majority for the Bill, 21.

WEDNESDAY, March 21.

Petitions against any alteration in the Corn Laws were presented from Branscombe in Devon, from Crayford in Kent, and from a parish in Norfolk.

The Duke of BUCKINGHAM presented petitions from the agriculturists of Burnham, and from three hundreds in the county of Bucks, praying that the agricultural interests might be protected.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 22.

The Earl of Shaftesbury presented a petition from the thread-lace manufacturers of Buckingham, praying for the abolition of the duties on the manufacture of that article.

CORN AND WOOL.

The Duke of Richmond presented petitions from Hastings, and several parishes in Sussex, complaining of the principles of free trade, and imputing to them the distress they were suffering. The petitioners also prayed that no alteration might be made in the Corn Laws, and that some restriction might be laid on the importation of foreign wool.

The Earl of MALMESBURY, in rising to move for several returns relating to foreign wool, said he could not do so without calling the attention of the House to the distress at present existing among the wool growers, many of whom had, at this time, as much as three years' stock in hand. The price of wool had varied at different times, and had lately decreased from sixteen-pence a pound to eight-pence. As long as the protection duty remained at sixpence, there was a good sale, but the moment there was a reduction of the duty, the greatest distress followed. Probably their Lordships were not aware of the extraordinary increase of the importation of foreign wool. It appeared that in 1824 the quantity was nineteen millions of pounds; in 1825 it was twenty-two millions; in 1826 it was as much as forty-three millions; and, according to Mr. Jacob's Report, it would be found that great exertions were making in Germany with respect to the growth of wool. At the time when the duty was lowered from sixpence to a halfpenny, a great boon was expected to have been granted; but it was nothing more than allowing the wool growers to export their long wool, which they had only been able to do in very small quantities. He had almost forgotten to mention, that it was a singular fact, that, with the great increase of importation of foreign wool, there was a decrease of exportation from this country. The Noble Earl then moved for a return of foreign wool imported from the year 1800 to 1822, distinguishing the different countries from which it had come. Also, an account of the value of wool imported from 1810 to 1826, and of the quantity of British long wool exported from 1821 to 1826.

Lord BEXLEY said, it had been considered a policy to reduce the duty on foreign wool for the purpose of benefiting the manufacturers, and there was no doubt that class had derived great benefit from its effects.

The Duke of RICHMOND thought it was high time the flock-masters of England should be shielded from speculative theories.

Earl DARNLEY knew that wool growers laboured under great grievances, and had at least two years' growth of wool upon their hands.

The motion was then agreed to, and their Lordships adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 23.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE stated, that he had intended to bring on the Committee upon the Game Laws next Monday, but he found he should not be ready on that day, therefore should be under the necessity of postponing it further.

Earl BATHURST laid on the table the copy of a Treaty entered into with the Infanta of Portugal and this country, relative to the support of British troops.

The Duke of NEWCASTLE asked the Noble Earl (Bathurst) for what reason thanks had been moved to Lord Combermere and the Officers serving in India during the late war?

Earl BATHURST said, they were not services of such magnitude as to require the thanks of that House; at the same time he acknowledged that the army had acted with the greatest gallantry.

The Duke of NEWCASTLE would not have mentioned the circumstance had it not been alluded to elsewhere, and for that reason he thought there might have been some cause for the omission.

The House then adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March, 19.

THE CORN TRADE.

The House having resolved into Committee, the following Resolution was put from the Chair:—

"Rye, Peas, and Beans.—Whenever the average price of Rye, or of Peas, or of Beans, made up and published in manner required by law, shall be 35s., and under 36s. the quarter, the duty shall be for every quarter 15s."

Sir J. BRYDGES, as a friend to agriculture, lamented his Majesty's Government had thought it expedient to propose a fundamental alteration in the Corn Laws; he preferred the old system to that which it was intended to substitute for it; and he could not but consider that the introduction of the measure would be a serious and fatal injury to the agricultural interests of the kingdom, and, through these, detrimental to all the other interests of commerce, trade, and manufacture; for one, as had been truly said, could never flourish when the others were in decay.

Mr. GIPPS said, he did not think a due proportion had been taken in this reduction, in reference to the price of wheat. He should, therefore, propose as an Amendment, that 40s. be substituted for 35s.

Mr. WESTERN said, his objection to the Amendment was, that the same proportion was not persevered in the duty as was taken in relation to the price of wheat and rye. He should propose to reduce the duty to 12s. 6d. or 13s., in place of 15s.

Mr. C. GRANT said, the same principle acted upon here was that which had been adopted with respect to oats and barley. The price was fixed by taking the average of the last six years.

Sir T. LETHBRIDGE said, that there was undoubtedly a change proposed in favour of the agriculturist, for that was the object of the Amendment. The landed interest were placed on their defence by this measure, and they were bound to watch every item with a view to their own protection. He gave his entire support to the Amendment.

Sir T. GOOCH supported the Amendment.

The Committee then divided, when there appeared—
For Mr. Gipps's Amendment, 102 | Against it, 150 | Majority, 48.

The original motion was then put, and agreed to.

The following Resolution, "For every barrel of wheat, meal, and flour, being 196lbs., a duty equal in amount to the duty payable on five bushels of wheat,"—having been put,

Sir J. NEWPORT proposed the following Amendment, "and also a duty not fluctuating, but payable at all times when flour is admissible of 4s. on each barrel, being 196lbs."

Mr. C. GRANT opposed the amendment, and maintained that the protection which the trade in flour received by the Resolutions, as they stood, was amply sufficient. Formerly, the protecting duty on flour was not so great as on wheat; but by the present Resolutions it was greater. The existing protection was twenty, or five and twenty per cent.; and certainly more could not be expected. It was well known, that millers were not the slowest persons in the world to avail themselves of any advantage which circumstances threw in their way; and it would not be advisable to increase their power in that respect by closing the door against the importation of foreign corn. With respect to Ireland, he must contend that the flour trade in Ireland was sufficiently protected by the Resolutions as they stood.

Mr. W. WHITMORE objected to the Amendment, on the ground that it did not apply to any particular price. He was sure, if any additional duty of 4s. were imposed, that would be cut off which was of much importance in the policy of this country. He agreed with some Honourable Members, that there was a monopoly to a considerable extent possessed by the millers in this country, and that it existed particularly in a time of dearth, when they were able to make very advantageous terms for themselves. Surely, then, if there were no competition to be entered into with those millers, the effect would be to increase that monopoly. Under these circumstances he trusted the Government would remain firm to its original proposition.

A division then took place, when the numbers were—for the original motion 152; for the Amendment 116—majority 36.

It was then proposed that for every quantity of oatmeal containing 190 pounds, a duty should be paid equal to the amount of duty on a quarter of oats.

Mr. FERGUSSON having objected to 190 pounds, moved an amendment, substituting 170 pounds.

Mr. Secretary PEEL opposed the amendment. The original proposition was 252 pounds, then came a reduction making it 190 pounds, and finally the Hon. Gentleman had brought it down to 170 pounds.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed, that when the protection given to oatmeal was not so high as that proposed to be given, no oatmeal was imported.

Mr. LYTTLETON opposed the Amendment.—The Committee divided—for the Resolution, 155; for the Amendment, 52—majority, 103.

Barley.—The Resolution was then agreed to imposing a duty of 2s. upon every quarter of Barley until the price is 33s. when the duty is to be 6d.

It was also agreed that the duty on every quarter of Oats shall be 2s. until the price be 24s.; then the duty on every quarter above 24s. is to be 6d.

TUESDAY, March 20.

As there was not a sufficient number of members present to form a committee by ballot upon the petition against the election for Galway, the House adjourned at a quarter past five o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, March 21.

Mr. LYTTLETON presented a petition from the Coroners of the county of Stafford, praying for an increase of their allowance.

Mr. Secretary PEEL said, that this was one of a series of petitions from Coroners praying for further remuneration for their services, and complaining of an inadequate emolument. It, however, happened, that such was the competition for this ill-paid office, that at a late election for a Coroner in the County of Stafford, 8000 freeholders were polled. Such contests as those could not be carried on without considerable expense; neither was it to be supposed that such expense would be incurred, unless the office were of value; and yet he had been repeatedly applied to in his official capacity to increase the salaries of coroners. That he refused, as he thought it a subject properly belonging to the country gentlemen, who were the payers of county rates, and he certainly

"The narratives of which this work consists, considered merely in the light of Tales, would be entitled to the highest praise, for the skill with which they are managed, the variety of incidents, the deep interest, and all the beauties of style which they display. But when to these are added a fac-simile of real manners, some of them new in the social world, a crowd of anecdotes, connected with almost every eminent or remarkable character who has crossed the Alps, the opening of Roman and Neapolitan domesticities, by one who seems intimate with all their mysteries, and the occasional appearance on the scene of individuals of historical notoriety, with the solution of many political riddles hitherto left unravelled, it will be seen, that these volumes possess a higher claim to public attention than that of affording amusement; and that they deserve to be read, as a source of valuable instruction, the more valuable as the observations scattered over their pages are sound, patriotic, and just, and the morality which they inculcate is pure."—Morning Post.

BURGESS' ESSENCE of ANCHOVIES, Warehouse, 107, STRAND, corner of Savoy Steps, London.—JOHN BURGESS and SON, being apprised of the numerous endeavours made by many persons to impose a spurious article for their make, feel it incumbent upon them to request the attention of the public, in purchasing what they conceive to be the ORIGINAL, to observe the Name and Address correspond with the above. The general appearance of the spurious descriptions will deceive the unguarded, and for their detection J. B. and Son submit the following caution:—Some are in appearance at first sight "Burgess' Essence of Anchovies;" others, "Burgis's," and many more without address.—JOHN BURGESS and SON having been many years honoured with such distinguished approbation, feel every sentiment of respect towards the public, and earnestly solicit them to inspect the labels previous to purchasing what they conceive to be of their make, which they hope will prevent many disappointments.

Burgess' New Sauce for general purposes having given such great satisfaction, continues to be prepared by them, and is recommended as a most useful and convenient sauce; will keep good in all climates.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Monday, March 26.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had to call the attention of the House to a circumstance which, he should submit, called for their interference. According to an order of their Lordships, the officers of that House had directions not to allow persons to approach the har with sticks, umbrellas, and other offensive weapons. A stranger being told by one of the door-keepers that he could not enter the House with his umbrella, left it in the lobby. When he came out he was unable to find it, and in consequence of the loss he brought his action in the Court of Requests, to recover the value of the umbrella from the officer who had refused to let him carry it into the House. The Noble and Learned Lord said, the man had a right to do so, but he went further, and served the officer with the process in that House. His Lordship had to submit, under those circumstances, whether the man who served the process ought not to be brought to their Lordships' har for breach of privilege.

Lord ROSSLYN considered it a breach of privilege to serve a process any where, upon an officer who had only acted in obedience to the orders of that House.

The LORD CHANCELLOR then moved that John Plass, the door-keeper, who had been served with the process, be brought to the bar.

The motion being carried in the affirmative, strangers were excluded. During their absence Mr. Plass was examined at the bar, and the result of the inquiry was an order from their Lordships for the person who had served the process to attend at the bar of the House on Tuesday.

Earl Bathurst laid on the table a copy of the Convention between his Britannic Majesty and the Emperor of the Brazils respecting Slavery. Also a copy of the Correspondence with the American Commissioners respecting Commercial Intercourse.—Also the Regulations of Foreign Countries on the subject of Grain.

The Earl of CARNARVON said he had to present a petition from Shadrach Walker, Jeremiah Andrews, and others, now in prison on a charge of coining, praying their Lordships to revise and amend the 59th Geo. III. ch. 49, sec. 10, commonly called Peel's Bullion Act. The petitioners stated that a clause in the said Act allowed persons to melt and export bullion, and that, under the provisions of the said Act, they had committed no crime whatever.—The petition was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, March 27.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

John Bell, the person who served the process of the Court of Requests on Mr. Plass, one of the officers of the House being in attendance, was brought to the bar of the House.

Strangers were excluded during his examination, but we were informed that the Lord Chancellor asked how he had been induced to commit the breach of privilege? The person (a very young man), said, he was not conscious at the time he served the process of the Court of Requests that he was infringing any of their Lordships' privileges.

The Lord Chancellor, after a suitahle reprimand, ordered him to withdraw, and he was discharged.

DUKE OF CLARENCE'S ANNUITY.

Earl BATHURST moved the second reading of the Duke and Duchess of Clarence's Annuity Bill.

Lord KING expressed some surprise at finding this Bill smuggled through the House without a word being said on it.

Earl BATHURST called the recollection of their Lordships to the statement made by his Noble Friend (Lord Liverpool), when the auswer was moved to his Majesty's gracious message, calling on the House to make provision for their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Clarence. On that statement the House concurred in the address, and he (Lord Bathurst) had a right to conclude the subject had been clearly understood.

Bill read a second time.

WEDNESDAY, March 28.

The Annual Indemnity Bill, the Bills of Exchange Bill, and several others of a private and local character, were brought up from the Commons.

Lord KING said he had to present a petition from certain Roman Catholics in Ireland, complaining of a gross slander on their religion, sanctioned by the law, which required every person holding a public situation to declare their religion to be idolatrous, His Lordship, in conclusion, censured the unchristian-like spirit of the objectors to Roman Catholic freedom, describing them as crusaders against the unhappy Irish.

The Bishop of CHESTER was convinced that nothing but exemplary wisdom and true Christian feeling could operate to any advantage in Ireland.

Lord HOLLAND said, the words used during a considerahle time in support of petitions against the Catholics had been barsh in the extreme. It reminded him of a Spanish story. The shepherds in Spain, in consequence of the great number of wolves, went armed with spears. A shepherd and his dog, on one occasion, were in a contest, during which the dog was killed: the shepherd was taken before the Alcalde, who asked him, why he had killled the dog? The shepherd said, because he could not help it—the dog ran against the point of his spear. Why did you not heat bim with the butt end? said the Alcalde. Because, replied the shepherd, he ran at me with his mouth instead of his tail. So it was with the Catholics of Ireland. The Government had been running open-mouthed at them so long, that it was no wonder they turned with sharp arguments.

Lord CARBERRY detailed several instances of harsh observations applied by Roman Catholic priests towards Protestants, and denied most strenuously that Protestants had used observations of an unchristian and uncharitable description.

The Lord CHANCELLOR said he could not help observing, that the petition had one small symptom of moderation. The petitioners had forborne to bring the alleged slander against the King who sat on the throne. The Kings of England, by the Act of William the Third, were obliged, at their coronation, and his Majesty, George the Fourth, was also obliged to make that declaration which it seemed the petitiouers now called slander.—The petition laid on the table.

The Duke and Duchess of Clarence's Annuity Bill went through a Committee, and was agreed to.

THURSDAY, March 29.

MR. PARKER'S PETITION.

Lord KENYON felt it his duty to say a few words, because there had been a misunderstanding respecting an article which appeared in one of the Morning Papers of this day. Lest it might seem that he had not discharged his duty in presenting a petition entrusted to him, he bad transmitted the article for publication. It was far from his intention to convey in the publication to which he alluded any statement which might be considered an improper allusion to any Noble Lord. The object he had was to shew that he had not kept back the petition with a knowledge that Colonel Bird, to whom it applied, was not in England. A Noble Lord had imputed blame to him in not presenting the petition when Colonel Bird was in this country in 1826, and he took the opportunity of assuring that Noble Lord that he was ignorant that Colonel Bird was not in England during the present year.

Lord CALEDON observed, that he asked why Mr. Parker withheld his petition in 1826, when Colonel Bird was in England, and presented it in 1827, when the Colonel was not in England.

The Lord CHANCELLOR rose to order, and reminded the Noble Lords, that the conversation respecting a publication in a newspaper, was quite irregular, unless the Noble Lord intended to make it the subject of a motion.

Lord HOLLAND thought at first that it was a complaint of breach of privilege. If it was a breach of privilege, it was one of a very extraordinary character. It was one committed by the Noble Lord himself. I wonder, said Lord Holland, the Noble Baron does not follow up the complaint, by moving that a proper reprimand be given to the party. (A laugh.)

Lord DARNLEY, adverting to the state of the suffering poor in Ireland, wished to know whether a Noble Lord (Carberry) had any intention to bring the subject before the House. He knew the poor of Ireland at that time were suffering, and many actually perishing with hunger. He did not wish to introduce the poor laws to Ireland, hut he thought it right to direct the attention of Parliament to the subject, for the purpose of affording some relief to the suffering population. He was not sure any relief would he found; hut if any other Noble Lord did not make a proposition on the subject, it was his intention, after the recess, to submit one; and his Majesty's Government, if there should be a Government, might decide whether any measure could be adopted in the way of remedy.

Lord HOLLAND said, before any thing was done as to the introduction of the poor laws in Ireland, it would be as well to inquire what the means for the relief of the poor in that part of the United Kingdom were.

Lord BELMORE stated, that the ancient laws of Ireland made the relief of the poor depend upon the church.

The Duke and Duchess of Clarence's Annuity Bill was read a third time and passed.

Lord REDESDALE laid on the table the Resolutions of which he gave notice some days since, respecting the Corn Trade. The object of the Noble Baron was, to afford the House an opportunity to consider the same during the Easter Recess.

FRIDAY, March 30.

Lord WHARNCLIFFE rose, on the order for going into Committee upon the Game Laws Amendment Bill, and stated that it was his intention to go into the Committee pro forma, and have the Bill printed with amendments. He had made considerable alteration in the Bill, hut should say nothing on that occasion respecting the amendments. It was then only necessary that he should account for delay. The fact was, that certain law doctrines had been laid down on the Northern Circuit, on a trial of poachers, in a way that induced him to wish the law could be more clearly defined before he proceeded further with his Bill. As it would be necessary to reprint the Bill, the earliest day he would fix for the recommittal would be this day se'nnight.

The Bill accordingly went through the Committee pro forma, and was ordered to be recommitted this day se'nnight.

Adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 26.

Sir W. W. Watkins presented the Report of the Reading Election Committee, setting forth that G. Spence, Esq. had heen unduly returned; that C. F. Palmer, Esq. ought to have been returned; and that the petition was not frivolous or vexatious.

Mr. Wilbraham, the deputy clerk of the Crown Office, was ordered to attend on Tuesday, to amend the return, by substituting the name of C. F. Palmer instead of that of G. Spence.

Mr. HUME presented a petition from the muslin manufacturers of Bolton-le-Moors, desiring to have a minimum fixed for their wages. He thought the application was just; they were entitled to protection as much as the landowners. (Hear.)

Mr. MABERLY supported the petition, on the ground that the petitioners were only asking to he allowed what had been conceded to the landowners—protecting prices.

Petition ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUME presented a petition from the parish of Cray, in Kent, complaining that high rates were demanded for poor laws, and praying for protection for agriculture. He also gave notice that on Tuesday, May 15, he should submit a proposition to the House respecting the Church Establishment of Ireland.

Mr. Secretary Canning appeared at the bar with various State Papers—1st, a Treaty with the Emperor of Brazil for the Abolition of the Slave Trade; 2d, Proceedings with the United States—a Convention regarding slaves captured during the war; and 3d, Correspondence respecting intercourse with the West India Colonies, part of which had already been printed by the American Government, and so made public.

Mr. HUME asked whether the correspondence was conclusive?

Mr. Secretary CANNING—I had the last word. (A laugh.)

SUPPLY.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved that the House go into a Committee of Supply.

Mr. MABERLY said the Ways and Means ought to be placed before the House previously to supplies being granted.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER could not agree with the Hon. Gentleman. It would he next to madness to think of votes on account of our army in Portugal, for instance, before it could be known what was likely to be the duration or extent of the service there. He should keep his lips sealed till he brought forward his financial statement, fully and satisfactorily to himseif.

The House then went into the Committee of Supply.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved 200,000l. on account of the Civil Contingencies, the amount for the Estimates heing 290.000l.

Mr. HUME said, this was the branch of service, of all others, for which no money ought to be granted on account. There was no investigation afterwards; there was 25,000l. amongst other extravagancies, expended for snuff-boxes, &c. Well might some folks get rich; but did not our Ministers get something in return? (A laugh.) Every year we got more extravagant, as we became poorer. For these reasons he should oppose the proposition.

Mr. Secretary CANNING defended the grants complained of.

Mr. HUME would have the Government take warning in time; such extravagance was ruinous.

CORN LAWS.

The Report of the Committee on the Corn Trade Acts was recommitted.

Mr. C. GRANT said, that in consequence of an intimation that the Imperial instead of the Winchester measure should be adopted, the Resolutions were now so altered to make allowances for the difference in the measures; the sums now would be 62s. instead of 60s. for wheat, and duty 20s. 8d. instead of 20s.; barley 33s. instead of 32s. and the duty 12s. 4d. instead of 12s.; oats 25s. instead of 24s. and duty 9s. 3d. instead of 9s. The larger sums for the Imperial measure.

Amended Resolutions agreed to.

TUESDAY, March 27.

Mr. Secretary PEEL wished the motion respecting the Fleet Prisons, &c. to he postponed, that he might have further communications with the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, now out of town; and he wished to state that no communications had been made to such Judge that had not been attended to.

Mr. HUME said, when he presented the petition, three days had elapsed without any communication in answer to the prisoners' complaint; but, on the fourth day, a person was sent by the Judge to the Fleet Prison. (Hear.) He had no objection to postpone the motion a day or two.

Mr. COURTENAY moved, that a Select Committee be appointed on the Laws regarding Friendly Societies.—Agreed to.

Mr. SHADWELL moved the second reading of the Writ of Right Bill.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY hoped that this motion would not be pressed, as a Committee of Inquiry was promised hereafter.

Mr. BERNAL hoped that the Hon. and Learned Gentleman would not be deterred from proceeding; reforms on these points were much wanted.

Mr. Secretary PEEL had not abandoned the idea of a Committee on the subject of the transfer of real property.

Dr. LUSHINGTON congratulated the country on the prospect of some remedy being provided for the multifarious evils and difficulties that presented themselves in the way of the transfer of property.

Mr. SHADWELL said, the only question was, whether the Bill should be read a second time—it proposed a simple remedy—hut the result of the inquiry might be long before it came under the consideration of the House.

Read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

CORN TRADE.

Sir A. GRANT presented the amended Resolutions of the Committee on the Corn Trade Acts. On the first Resolution having been put,

Mr. HUME said, he should avail himself of this opportunity to say that he differed wholly from the Resolutions. The present Resolution proposed to continue the favourable laws already enjoyed hy the landowners, which imposed unequal and therefore unjust prices. He would move, that from the 5th of July, 1827, to the 5th of July, 1828, a duty of 15s. should be paid on the importation of every quarter of foreign wheat, and that the said duty should be lowered each succeeding year till it came to 10s. a quarter.

Mr. MARSHALL seconded the motion, though he had little hopes of success.

Mr. IRVING opposed the motion. Our machinery was now so improved, that the price of food entered very little into the cost of our manufactures. They were told that they ought to proceed on a new system, because it was laid down in books, particularly by Mr. Ricardo; but, he believed, there was nothing in Mr. Ricardo's new system that was not known to the grandmother of every man in the House. (A laugh.)

Sir H. PARNELL said, not less than twenty-five millions a year was paid by the consumers of corn more than they would pay if there was a free trade in corn. He thought, however, that his Hon. Friend (Mr. Hume) proposed that his plan should come into operation too soon, and therefore he could not support it, though in every other respect he deemed it much preferable to that proposed by Government.

Mr. WARBURTON supported the motion.

The House divided on Mr. Hume's motion,

Ayes, 16 | Noes, 140 | Majority, 124.

The original Resolutions were then put and carried.

WEDNESDAY, March 28.

Sir H. CLIVE moved for a new writ for West Loe, in the room of George Buller, Esq. who had accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

The names of the defaulters of Tuesday last being called over, the Honourable Members were ordered to attend the ballot tomorrow. Amongst the defaulters were Sir F. Burdett, Mr. J. C. Hobhouse, Lord Howick, Mr. Hume, Lord Palmerston, Mr. R. Peel, &c.

Mr. HUME presented a petition from a prisoner, John Evatt, in Whitecross-street Prison, for an alteration of the Laws regarding Debtor and Creditor, and for the simplification of the means to recover debts. It well merited the consideration of the House; the laws enforcing imprisonment for debts required amendment. He also presented a very long petition from three very poor men, complaining of the Rugby Charity. They said, they had not the means to go to the Court of Chancery; they prayed for the interference of the House.

This petition was ordered to he printed, without having been read by the Clerk.

Mr. LITTLETON presented a petition, praying that the petitioners might not he subjected to the expence of keeping the poachers in prison; they were not allowed to purchase game. He had, with great pleasure, last year, voted for an alteration of the Game Laws; something ought to be done; though he thought the owners of the game had as much right to the protection of their property as shopkeepers had to their goods; but he could not agree with the petitioners that the poachers were victims of the laws.

Sir J. SEBRIGHT agreed that there ought to be some alteration of these laws; their demoralizing character was of the most afflicting nature.

Sir C. BURRELL urged the necessity of protecting the game.

Mr. ESTCOURT agreed in the necessity of alteration. In Wiltshire, amongst 232 prisoners, 100 were poachers. (Hear.)

Sir J. WROTTESLEY said, that the evil was of such enormous magnitude that something ought to be done forthwith.

Mr. Secretary PEEL said, that a very serious evil had been alluded to. He had heen favourable to the proposed change of allowing the sale of game; such was the altered state of the laws that there must be some change. Still the laws of property would prevail, and the preservers of game must have protection. If there were alteration, he did not suppose that poaching would be destroyed, but it would be diminished hy allowing the proprietors to compete with poachers.

The Marquis of BLANDFORD moved for returns of persons killed within the last five years by spring guns, the Coroners' Inquests thereon, &c.—Ordered.

Mr. WARBURTON presented a petition against the measures of Government on the subject of the Corn Laws, and praying for the removal of restrictions on the corn trade. He heard that the country gentlemen intended to oppose the warehousing of foreign corn. (Hear.) If that were done, it would prevent the importation of corn. (Hear.)

Petition ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXWELL presented a petition from the Sawyers of Rochester against the use of machinery—a subject he should like to see inquired into.

Mr. J. SMITH felt persuaded that without machinery the wealth would not have been created, so as to enable this country to maintain its struggles; at the same time, he should be glad that a Committee might be appointed to investigate and set at rest the question.

Mr. J. SMITH presented a petition from workmen, praying for the regulation of and the adoption of a minimum of wages.

Mr. Secretary PEEL observed, that it was impossible not to view with regret the distresses of the working classes; but if the object now sought were granted, if a minimum of wages were fixed, it would soon be found to be of a most injurious tendency.

He was not however unfriendly to the prayer of the petitioners to be heard, though he was convinced their opinions if adopted, would not effect the relief contemplated.

Mr. HUME urged the necessity of inquiry, as calculated to pacify the petitioners, and to convince them that their difficulties were attributable to other causes.

Petition brought up—it was from the Cotton-workers of Great and Little Bolton.

Mr. J. SMITH re-urged the prayer of the petition on the attention of the House; but after what had passed, further advice ought to be taken before a Committee was moved for.—Ordered to be printed.

THURSDAY, March 29.

There being Ballots for two Election Committees, namely, for Hedon and the County of Westmeath, the gallery was not opened till after five o'clock.

The defaulters on former Ballots were then called over; many were excused, on various grounds; the following, however, were ordered to be taken into custody, no reasons or excuses for absence being offered:—Lord Bruce, Sir Robert Farquhar, Mr. Greville Howard, Lord George Lennox, Mr. W. Maxwell, Mr. F. Pigott, Mr. Protheroe, Sir N. C. Tyndall, Mr. Tomlin, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Wilks.

The various motions for ordering Members to be taken into custody excited a good deal of merriment, there being loud shouts of laughter when the motions had been agreed to, with the exception of Mr. Wilks, on the motion for whom being put to be taken into custody, there was a loud cry of "Aye!"

Mr. DAVENPORT said he had given notice for a Committee to inquire into the causes of the national distress. He had delayed it, thinking that a regular administration might be formed. He was disappointed in his hopes on such subject, and he should now therefore postpone such motion till after the holidays; but he lamented to say that there was no open day till May 17—he should submit his motion on that day.—Notice postponed accordingly.

Mr. C. GRANT brought in the Bill regulating the Corn trade founded on the Resolutions; he should have, in a few days, to bring in a second Bill on this subject, regulating the machinery respecting averages. This Bill provided beyond the resolutions, that the monthly averages should be inserted in the Gazette. The Bill would go into effect as soon as passed; however the averages on May 15 were to be struck as if such Bill had not passed.

Sir T. LETHBRIDGE said he should reserve himself till Monday next, the proposed second reading; he should then move an amendment.

Bill read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

Mr. BROWNLOWE rose to move for Correspondence between the Government of Ireland and the Magistrates of Lisburne. He lamented the condition of the Catholic Question—the exclusions and heart-burnings continued by it; and if our Government told the truth; they would admit that Ireland was our weak, sore, and vulnerable point. Whatever were the opinions of parties, all admitted that the Roman Catholic Association was in full vigour. It exercised power—and however its speeches might be ridiculed within these walls, in Ireland they found a ready echo. (Hear.) Almost all classes looked up to the Association with implicit obedience, and such fact ought to be known to that House. (Hear.) He then proceeded to notice the Orange processions at Lisburne, the efforts to put them down—and as they were so unavailing, the evidence ought to be before the House. They ought not to shut their ears and blind their eyes; let them be acquainted with the facts, especially as the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was at issue with the Law Officers of the Crown. Could such a state of things be called Government? In a plain spoken assembly were they to endure such things and have no adequate answer or remedy? He could not forget that he had been an Orangeman—but he must say, if one class were allowed to walk, if the 12th July were to be honoured, they must ellow November 5 to be honoured. Ireland was now one vast madhouse of demoniac spirits—and was such a state of things to be permitted to continue? He lamented the cabinet divisions and distractions; they were to be deplored; if they were not the source, they were the conduit, through which party spirit flowed over the land. (Cheers.) He concluded with moving for copies of correspondence between Mr. Goulburn, the Magistrates of Antrim, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, &c. respecting Orange processions at Lisburne, July 12, 1825.

Mr. GOULBURN said, if the Hon. Member's object was to put down party animosities, he had adopted a very imperfect mode, to rip up transactions that occurred nearly two years ago, and respecting processions that occurred in 1825, but did not happen in 1826. (Hear.) The facts, however, had been only imperfectly represented. Although the Government of Ireland differed on one question, there was complete concurrence as to the administration of the existing laws. On this point, whether the Irish Government had been in the right or wrong, there had been no difference of opinion. (Hear.) They had circulated the opinion of tde Attorney and Solicitor General as to the illegality of the processions. It was desired to see what persuasion would do, especially as the multitudes were evidently misled. He read the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, showing that the Lord Chancellor did not differ from the Law Officers, as was meant to be understood, the Lord Chancellor (of Ireland) expressly stating, that if the Orange Socities were illegal, as represented, any emanations or processions from them must be equally illegal. (Hear.) If the same transactions were to take place at the present time, the decision of Government would be precisely the same. The production of the papers, however, would only tend to excite animosity in the country, and revive the processions which were now discontinued.

Sir JOHN NEWPORT said, he never felt more regret than when he heard his Right Hon. Friend identify himself with Lord Chancellor Manners, even in the administration of his official functions in Ireland; because in many instances that Noble person, in his conduct towards the Magistracy of Ireland, had acted in a manner which it pained him to think his Right Hon. Friend should approve. The statements on each side of the present question were conflicting. What was the proper remedy?—the production of the documents. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. PEEL said, he would object to the production of the papers, for the purpose of not reviving animosities that have now subsided. When the complaint of Mr. Johnson's conduct was made to the Lord Chancellor, he wrote to Mr. Johnson for an explanation, and Mr. Johnson wrote, in reply, a statement of his conduct and his motives, in which he admitted that he entertained an opinion on the Act different from his brother Magistrates, that Orange processions were legal, but he positively denied that he had encouraged the procession, but, on the contrary, he had used all the means in his power to cause them to disperse peaceably, and that he wore an orange riband on that day, as he had done for forty years, because he thought it would give him more weight with the people. The Lord Chancellor, in reply to this letter, wrote to Mr. Johnson, expressing his satisfaction that he was able to vindicate himself from the charge preferred against him, but at the same time told him that he was entirely mistaken in his construction of the law which prohibited Orange processions as well as Orange Associations. Near two years have since elapsed, and Lisburn has been ever since tranquil, and the revival of the differences which then existed might be the unhappy consequence of agreeing to the present motion.

Doctor LUSHINGTON thought Mr. Johnson's conduct should not be judged by his statement, for where was a criminal to be found who would not justify his own conduct. When assertions were made on one side and denied on the other, the House had a right to the evidence necessary to the discovery of the truth.—(Hear, hear.) If the House wished to have justice done, they would inquire and ascertain the tacts.

The House divided—

For the motion, 69 | Against it, 124 | Majority against it, 55.

Mr. HENRY GRATTAN made several observations on the treatment of persons confined in the Dublin Penitentiary, where he said prisoners were tortured to compel them to become Protestants. The Hon. Gentleman produced an iron instrument which he said was forced on the head, and part of it into the mouth of the victim. (The production of this torturing instrument produced an effect on the House very different from what it must have caused to the wearers—there was very general laughter.) It had been said in another place, woe to the hand that would stop the reformation in Ireland. He could say, Woe to the hand that put such instruments on the heads of any of his Majesty's subjects, whether for the purpose of torture or punishment. The Hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that there there be laid on the table the Report of the Commissioners directed by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to inquire into the state of the Richmond Penitentiary in Dublin, aud the evidence taken by them.

Mr. GOULBURN said, he had informed the Hon. Gentleman that he was most ready to lay the whole Report and the evidence taken by the Commissioners on the table of the House; but if that had been done, or even if the Hon. Gentleman had condescended to read that Report and evidence, it would have been impossible for him to make the speech he had made.

The question was then put and agreed to.

Mr. HUME said he wished to make an addition to the motion for a return of the number of the instruments produced that were kept in the Penitentiary. (A laugh.)

Mr. HUME postponed his motion for inquiry into the prisons of the Metropolis on Tuesday.

FRIDAY, MARCH 30.

SUPPLY—STATE OF AFFAIRS.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved that the Estimate of Civil Contingencies on account, voted in supply, be agreed to.

Mr. TIERNEY proposed that the Report should be postponed till after the holidays. He did so on two grounds, 1st, On account of the nature of the grants: and, secondly, in consequence of the peculiar state of affairs. He first adverted to the proceedings had in former years respecting the Civil List, and to the grant of 296,000l. now asked on account and in confidence: he thought it would not be unreasonable to ask confidence in whom? (Cheers.) He did not wish to speak disrespectfully of the remnants of the present administration; but before he granted the sum he must know who was to be responsible to him. It would be a waste of time to go through the items now, but there was such vast disproportion in the sums required, in the appointments now and previously to the last war, that he thought there ought to be inquiry into such expenditure by Committee or otherwise. No doubt it would be said that explanations would be given on any particular items; but he did not quarrel with particular appointments, he questioned the propriety of the special missions at all. (Hear, hear.) A Committee would say whether it was necessary to have such special missions. (Hear.) He again returned to the quarter, as this was a vote of confidence, in whom was the confidence to be placed? Delicacy and forbearance had been long and properly shown—but now they must put an end to the mockery—the House ought to show some sign of life. (Cheers.) As to Lord Liverpool, if any one would say that there was any chance of recovery, he would sit down directly; but the Noble Lord must be considered as extinct, as only likely to be restored, if at all, to the affections of his family; and, he was assured, the Noble Lord, could his opinion be asked, would not desire further delay in the formation of an efficient Administration. But what was the distressed state of affairs, in trade, &c.—the falling off of the revenue, the pressure of the taxes, of the debt, &c.? Did they not require attention, and did they not call for a complete Administration? Look at foreign affairs; there was an army in Portugal and properly; but were they to continue their confidence in the present Foreign Secretary? (Loud cheers.) If that were to be, then confidence might be deserved. (Cheers.) Now, till the King's prerogative was fulfilled, he would hold his hand; not one guinea more would he consent to part with till he knew who were the Ministers. (Hear.) Not merely were there foreign affairs—there was Ireland. Was it to be governed, or was it to go without being governed? (Hear.) He desired to provoke no discussion, but he must perform his duty. He hoped, before long, to see a complete united and efficient Administration that should command confidence; for never was there a time when such Administration was more wanted by the peculiar circumstances and difficulties of the country. He concluded with moving as an amendment, that the Report be brought up on the 1st of May.

Mr. Secretary CANNING said, however he might differ as to the propriety of the amendment, he must admit that there had been the greatest delicacy shown by the other side. Nothing had been done to embarrass the Government. But if the Ministers had sinned, it had been on the right side—anxiety for Lord Liverpool—However, delay was at an end—his Majesty had that day communicated to Lord Liverpool's connexions that the chasm must forthwith be supplied. He had the satisfaction to add, that such communication had been efficiently made. Such being the state, without pretending to know any thing about arrangements to be made, but the Ministers feeling that they were responsible, he hoped that there would not be fixed on the Administration the last stigma, of stopping the supplies. No approbation of the grants was asked for, only such a sum as would prevent inconvenience to the public service. He should hereafter be able to show, that on such branches of service he had effected a reduction to the extent of ten per cent. As to the delay, he did not deny that inconveniencies might have occurred; but by such hesitation he thought greater delay would have been prevented. He did not think that advantage would be gained by throwing obstacles in the way of supplies that were physically necessary, and now that the assurance was given that a new Administration was forming.

Mr. TIERNEY did not mean his motion to be a censure; he had accomplished the object of his motion, and was happy to hear that a new Administration was forming. At the same time, he thought these supplies ought not to be granted now.

Mr. Secretary CANNING said, he was before prepared to give the answer, but the question had not been asked.

Mr. TIERNEY then understood that the Administration was to be announced before the holidays; if that pledge were given, he would withdraw opposition.

Mr. CANNING said he could not give any such undertaking.

Mr. TIERNEY added, then he was placed in a most painful situation. (Hear.) He must, however, expect, that unless some assurances were given, that House ought not to grant any of the public money till a new administration was formed. (Cheers.)

Mr. W. WHITMORE concurred in these sentiments.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER admitted that the time had arrived for efficient appointments. Sufficient delay had arisen; and there would be reason for the motion if any grant of the public money was called for further than votes on account.

Strangers were then ordered to withdraw for a division. The House, as well as the gallery, was unusually full.

The numbers were—

For the Amendment, 81 | Against it, 153 | Majority, 72

The House then went into a Committee on the Writ of Right Bill. The House resumed. The Report was brought up, and ordered to be taken into consideration this day se'nnight.—The Bill was ordered to be printed.

The Spring Gun Bill was read a third time, and passed.

Adjourned to Monday.

De Vere, by the celebrated author of Tremaine.—We are requested to acquaint the public that copies of this popular new novel may now be had, on application, at the Public Library, 52, Rathbone-place, where may be had, also, every new work of interest, on the day of publication, and on more moderate terms than at any of the other principal libraries.

Some days ago, as Wombwell's collection of wild beasts (now in Stamford) were passing from Nottingham to Worksop, a small tiger made his escape from the caravan, near to Mr. Ichabod Wright's lodge, Mapperley, and entered the farm-yard of Mr. Thomas Ayre. Several persons contrived to get him into an outhouse, and endeavoured to re-take him by turning a dog in, but he nearly tore the dog to pieces. The animal was left there for the remainder of the night, but again got away, and has not yet been recovered. It is supposed he is still in some of the thickets of the forest, as several sheep have been worried in the neighbourhood.

We have seen one of those truly elegant children's straw hats, manufactured upon the new invented principle by Vyse, of Ludgate-street, and we were not a little surprised at the ingenious construction of tbe brim, by which the flapping so much complained of in the common straw hats is entirely prevented. We have not the least hesitation in saying that for tbeir extreme lightness, beauty of shape, and superior workmanship, they surpass any thing of the kind ever invented.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

PORTUGAL.

Despatches were received on Thursday at the Foreign Office, from Sir W. H. Clinton, dated from the head-quarters, Coimbra, the 17th instant. They were brought by the Vigilant, arrived at Falmouth, and which sailed from the Tagus on the 19th. By the same conveyance private letters have been received, but they make no mention of a report which occasioned considerable alarm in the City on Thursday, transmitted from Falmouth to Lloyd's, stating that an army of French and Spanish troops, amounting to 24,000 men, had entered the Portuguese province of Alentego.—One of the letters states, that General Clinton held a Council of all his principal Officers at Coimbra on the 14th instant, the particulars of which had not transpired. It was suspected that it alluded to the movement of the Spanish army. All sorts of rumours were prevalent at Lisbon when the Vigilant sailed. The latest accounts from Badajoz assert that the Spanish troops were in continual motion, and that their head-quarters were in that city, their light troops having penetrated to Villa de Rey. While it is evident from the Lisbon Papers, that the rebels had been defeated and dispersed in every direction, it is also manifest that the representations from Madrid, in some of the French Journals, have been greatly exaggerated with respect to the number of the rebel troops who have been disarmed by the Spanish authorities. Instead of 3,000, it is asserted that not more than 1,000 have entered that country. The letters from Oporto are to the 15th of this month, at which time all alarm respecting the movements in Tras-os-Montes had subsided.

New York Papers to the 4th inst. have reached us. They do not contain any news, but are chiefly filled with the debates in the House of Representatives, upon the Bill regulating commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonial possessions. Various amendments and alterations had been proposed in the Bill, some of which had been carried, and indications were decidedly in favour of its passing; but the House were obliged to adjourn from the want of a sufficient number of Members present, in the very last stage of the discussion.

EXPLOSION OF THE COMMERCE TRADER.

LANCASTER, MARCH 23.—About ten minutes before three o'clock this afternoon, the inhabitants of this town were dreadfully alarmed by a violent tremor of the earth, which extended from the south western direction to the northward. The first indication of this shock, the effects of which we have to detail, was a slight motion of the earth, which increased for about ten seconds. and terminated by a tremendous concussion, which was felt every where, but without the least perceptible sound. The termination of this, which was imagined to be a visitation of that awful phenomena, an earthquake, struck terror in every direction. By the arrival of the Ulverston over-land coach, on Saturday night, the cause of this alarming sensation was correctly and positively stated, and we are now enabled to lay before our readers the calamitous circumstance of it.

A vessel, trading coastwise from the port of Lancaster to Liverpool, called the Commerce, Haddock, Master, of Lancaster, in pursuing its voyage, laden with cloths, was wind-bound at Poulton for some days, and only got out on Wednesday night last, and took in about ten ton of gunpowder, in bags and barrels, at Brackborough Mills. The ship proceeded on her voyage very heavily laden, and was off Peel Castle on the Lancashire coast, where the accident happened, when shortly after two o'clock in the day, one of the crew observed a smoke ascending from the main hatchway. The circumstance was communicated throughout the vessel, and the tarpaulings were immediately raised, and through some crevices of the stowage a thick smoke was observed forcing its way. The Master ordered the tiers in the hold to be deluged; but in a few minutes the horrible fact of the cottons being on fire close to the gunpowder was discovered, and the crew found that the opposition of the two elements would be useless. The boat was lowered instantly, and the ship being scuttled, and the water admitted through her lower tier, the crew departed, being about six miles from the shore. A strong easterly breeze prevailing, the ship veered round, and, losing the direction of the helm, sailed before the wind for about two minutes, when a sudden thickness of smoke arising from her, announced that the awful blowing up was at hand. She blew up momentarily afterwards with a most terrific explosion. The shock they experienced they describe as dreadful; their boat was lifted out of the water, and but for the circumstance of the ship being to leeward, they must all have perished. They made for the shore, which was lined by hundreds, who had witnessed the accident from the land. The vessel was blown almost to atoms, scarcely a vestige of her timbers or cargo being recovered: and it appears from the circumstance of there being but one explosion, that the powder must have ignited in several places at once.

The noise at Peel is described as most appalling, and to have exceeded any thing ever imagined. In detailing this account, it is gratifying to have to state that no lives were lost, and it was indeed a providential circumstance that the fire was discovered so early in the day; had it been in the time of night, in all human probability every person on board would have perished.

The damage done to the houses at Peel Castle, Brackborough, and along the immediate vicinity of the coast, is very great; several have been blown down, and the mischief is generally experienced.

By the arrivals from the South, the shock, it is said, was felt very forcibly at Liverpool and other places adjacent. It was there attributed to the partial shock of an earthquake.

Report speaks highly of the new work (Historiettes) announced for publication by the author of The English in Italy, those who have seen portions of it, considering it even superior to the former admired production of its elegant author. It is expected, we understand, to be ready for publication on Monday next.

EXPLOSION OF A POWDER MILL.—About a quarter past six o'clock on Tuesday morning, the inhabitants of Ewell, in Surrey, were thrown into a state of considerablo alarm, by the explosion of a powder-mill, belonging to Mr. Henry Bridges, and sitnate about three-quarters of a mile from Ewell, on the Kingstou-road. The shock was so violent as to cause a perceptible vibration of the earth, and many persons declare that they felt themselves shook in their beds. Fortunately, there was no person in or near the mill at the time. The mill was one in which the powder was blended together by grinding, and being turned by water, it was customary for the person who had the care of it, to visit it only once in two hours, for the purpose of seeing that it was properly fed. On his last visit, which was about an hour previous to the explosion, every thing appeared to be safe. How, therefore, the accident occurred, can only be matter of conjecture, but it is supposed that some metalic particles were among the powder, and that by the friction of the mill a spark was elicited from them, which caused the explosion. The mill, as may be supposed, was completely shattered to pieces.

The great charm of the new novel of "Almack's" is undoubtedly its verisimilitnde. We see and hear the various exalted personages who are brougbt before us, in all their habitual elegance, wit, and peculiar refinement; indeed so admirably are the scenes given, and so true to the reality is the representation that we never tire in the perusal of this delightful work, but recur to its entertaining pages again and again, with the same satisfaction with which we should mingle with the fascinating circles described; enlivened, as this very successful author has contrived to make them, by all that splendour, brilliancy and accomplishment could contribute.

THE STOCK MARKET.

SATURDAY, 4 O'CLOCK.

The Funds have been perfectly tranquil during the week, and only interrupted by the occasional inventions of the parties interested in either depressing or raising them for their own advantage—as in the instance of the French troops being reported to have entered Portugal—the rumour only caused a momentary fall, which immediately recovered upon ascertaining the falsehood of the statement. This day the market was devoid of rumours, and consequently of fluctuation. Consols for the Acc. closed at 82$\frac{5}{8}$.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JONATHAN can answer the question himself, respecting "Almack's," which he has asked us to put to another.

Our Correspondent's enclosure, respecting Miss FOOTE's marriage, is noticed in another department of this day's paper.

We are obliged to an ADMIRER OF THE AGE, for his epigram on May Fair, and his remarks on the King's Theatre, of which latter we shall take an early opportunity of availing ourselves.

VERB. SAP. is requested to receive our thanks for a pleutiful supply of charades, some of which are extremely piquant, and shall have an early insertion.

NEMO is a monstrous blockhead. It surely does not follow, that, because we have had occasion to comment with severity on any Nobleman's private conduct, we should deny ourselves an opportunity of praising any public action of his, worthy of commendation. We again repeat that Lord GLENGALL is entitled to great credit, for his admirable letter, which we published last Sunday.

The nonsense enclosed us from a Contemporary, is inadmissible—besides the scoundrel's name would disgrace our paper.

INQUISITOR is thanked.

LEX, from Grosvenor-square, shall be enquired into—we beg him to accept our acknowledgments.

The first favour of AGESILAUS never came to hand.

THE AGE.

LONDON, APRIL 1

We have observed, with much gratification, his MAJESTY's appointment of the Marquis of HERTFORD to an embassy to the Court of Russia, for the purpose of investing the IMPERIAL AUTOCRAT with the insignia of our Order of the Garter. It is impossible that a more judicious selection could have been made, as being one which will be the medium of conveying, in the most splendid and imposing manner, a full conviction to Foreign States, of the dignity and wealth of our own. In the recent diplomatic instances, in which the continental resources have been brought into a comparison with those of this country, we fully admit such conviction has been realized—and in the present one, we have not a moment's doubt, that the high estate of England's nobility will be supported with all becoming "pride, pomp, and circumstance." There is no Nobleman whose wealth is more able to undergo a trial of this description—none whose taste can better direct—and none whose spirit will more fully enter into it, than the Most Noble the Marquis of HERTFORD.

Those who are at all acquainted with passing events, were well aware that Mr. CANNING had been, during Wednesday and Thursday last, at Windsor, in conference with his MAJESTY, on the subject of forming a new Administration—and it was therefore but natural to suppose, that, the moment so important a subject was brought to a proper and final arrangement, due notification, in the usual official manner, would be forwarded to both Houses of Parliament.

Unwilling, however, to wait the common course of things, Mr. TIERNEY had the singular absurdity to move, in the HOUSE OF COMMONS, on Friday night, the postponement of the vote of £200,000, part of the Supply, until the 1st of May, on the ground that, until another Ministry was formed, the country could not know to whom so serious a sum was to be entrusted. We cannot well imagine a more preposterous position. The indisposition of the illustrious Earl of LIVERPOOL (except as regards his Lordship constituting a leading Member of the Cabinet, by whose united wisdom the revenue is regulated) can have no more to do with a grant of this nature, than if the respected Nobleman were in the enjoyment of the most perfect health—and Mr. TIERNEY is well aware of this. His motion can therefore only be construed into one of those sarcastic insults which, since the period of his retirement from office, he has been continually heaping upon his MAJESTY's Ministers. It afforded us solid gratification to perceive the great majority (73) by which this ridiculous motion was lost, as well as to witness the able manner in which Mr. CANNING rebutted the old gentleman's observations. The defeat of Mr. TIERNEY is still more signal, when it was carried through Mr. CANNING's determination not even to give the House a pledge, as to any period when the Administration might be finally adjusted—which must be a most satisfactory proof to the Right Honourable Gentleman of the confidence which the Senate places in both him and his colleagues. The following part of Mr. CANNING's speech is entitled to particular notice:—

Mr. CANNING said, however he might differ from the motion which the Right Honourable Gentleman had just submitted to the House, he still agreed in one proposition which the Right Hon. Gentleman had laid down in the course of his speech—namely, that the Government had no reason to complain, either of the House in general, or of the Right Hon. Gentleman in particular, or of any of the Hon. Gentlemen who sat near him, on account of any want of courtesy or forbearance shown towards it during the crisis which had occurred since the commencement of the lamentable illness of his noble friend, the Earl of Liverpool. Neither did he differ from the Right Hon. Gedtleman opposite, when he stated, that from the force of circumstances, and from the lapse of time, it was necessary that those considerations which had induced them to act with so much courtesy and forbearance up to the present time, must now cease to have the slightest influence on their future conduct. He trusted that the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite would admit on this occasion, that it was difficult for those who had long acted in concert with the noble lord whose illness they all in common deplored, who had enjoyed the happiness of a nearer and more intimate view of those great talents and acknowledged virtues to which the Right Hon. Gent. had paid so handsome and yet so just a tribute, and who were further bound to that Noble Lord by the ties of ancient and long-continued friendship—he trusted, he said, that the Right Hon. Gentleman would admit that it was difficult for persons in their situation to bring themselves to believe that all hopes of the Noble Lord's recovery were entirely and utterly at an end. He trusted, moreover, that the Right Hon. Gentleman, whatever might have been the inconvenience which undoubtedly had been experienced, and whatever might be the impatience, which he admitted was still growing in the public mind, for the conclusion of the present unsettled state of things, would still admit that Ministers, if they had sinned, had sinned on the right side, and that nothing could have been more disgraceful to them, or more painful to Lord Liverpool, than for that Nobleman to have found upon waking from his present trance, that his place in the Cabinet had been sought to be filled up with intemperate haste and with precipitate ambition. It was difficult to define the precise limit and the precise period to which such considerations ought to be extended: but he could assure the House, that Ministers had not suffered time to pass away without attaching to them due importance. He said most distinctly, that for the delay which had already taken place, Ministers were ready to take as much responsibility as for any other act of their administration; and when he made use of His Majesty's name, and alluded to the forbearance which had been shown, in compliance with the Royal feelings, he did not do so with any view of throwing upon His Majesty the slightest portion of that responsibility which attached to himself individually, and to the whole Administration collectively. That delay, he could now inform the House, was at an end. (Hear, hear.) His Majesty had desired a communication to be made to Lord Liverpool's most immediate connexions, that the time was at length come, at which, with whatever pain it might be attended, he must, in compliance with the claims of public duty, proceed to fill up the chasm occasioned by the loss of his Lordship's services; and sure he (Mr. Canning) was, that it would be a satisfaction to the House to hear, as it had been to Ministers who had recommended his Majesty so to act, and to his Majesty who had acted upon their recommendation, that Lord Liverpool—(and he, Mr. Canning, did not mean to make any statement as to the precise condition of his Noble Friend's health)—had consciousness to understand that his feelings and situation had been equally respected by his Sovereign and by his colleagues in office, and that it had been a great consolation to him to know that he had been so respected. Under these circumstances, he hoped that the House would not feel itself called upon to affix to the Administration the last stigma which its last power could inflict—he meant a vote equal to the stoppage of the ordinary supplies—unless it either traced or suspected in the course which Ministers had pursued, other motives than those which appeared on the face of their conduct. (Hear, hear, hear.) When this dreadful calamity fell upon the country, one great measure had been prepared, and was ready to be brought under the consideration of Parliament, which had been looked for with extraordinary impatience and expectation. Would it have been wise, supposing it had been delicate, which he thought the Right Hon. Gentleman would agree with him that it would not have been,—would it have been wise, he asked, in Ministers to postpone the consideration of that measure till a new Government was formed, having, as they fortunately had, not only the advantage of the Noble Lord's concurrence and advice, but also all the advantage of his authority, and of the application of his great talents to the framing of it? Had no calamity befallen the Noble Lord, that measure would have been introduced simultaneously into both Houses of Parliament; as things had turned out, it had only been introduced into that House, in which the Noble Lord, had he been in full health and vigour, could have taken no share in the discussion. It had gone through that House without any inconvenience being felt from the want of his superintendence and support; and he (Mr. Canning) now left it to those who heard him, to decide whether having only the choice of putting off the question to the formation of a new Administration, giving in the interim to the Noble Lord that reasonable time for recovery which all parties wished that he should have, or the choice of proceeding precipitately to the formation of a new Administration. without giving any time at all, Ministers had not acted more wisely in proceeding at once to the consideration of that measure without any reference at all to the situation of the Noble Lord. From the beginning it had been the intention of Government, as soon as the measure had reached its last stage in the House of Commons, to propose a delay for the express purpose alluded to by the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite. He had expected that in the early part of the present week the Bill would have reached that stage, and he assured the House that was the limit of time to which Ministers had postponed the moving of the adjournment of the House, or rather the cessation of public business, for the purpose of fixing a new Administration. The duration of that interval. far beyond the period which had been originally anticipated, had led to a state of things which had compelled his Right Hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to ask for a sum on account, to carry on the public business till after the Easter recess. He would not blame the Right Hon. Gent. opposite, because in his opposition to the present grant, he had introduced a criticism on some other grants. He trusted, however, that when he came to those grants, which related more particularly to his own department, in which an expenditure annually occurred, partly discretionary and partly fixed, he should be able to show the Right Hon. Gentleman, that in the discretionary part of the foreign expenditure, over which alone he could exercise any control, he had made a diminution during the last year of 10 per cent. upon the whole. (Hear, hear.) The present, however, was not a fit opportunity for entering upon such a discussion; nay more, it would be unfeeling and ungracious to go into details, considering the difficulties in which Ministers were placed, and the feeling which the House had manifested towards his suffering friend, and colleague, Lord Liverpool. He placed his opposition to the motion of the Right Hon. Gentleman upon this basis, that though it was a painful discretion which Ministers had to exercise, yet between the two alternatives offered to their choice—the danger on the one hand of proceeding with precipitation, and the danger on the other which had absolutely occurred, of acceding to too long a delay—Ministers had chosen that course which was not only right in itself, but also most creditable to themselves, as well individually as collectively. He did not mean to assert that inconvenience had not arisen from the course which had been pursued; but he did mean to assert that the inconvenience was not such as deserved to be visited by a vote, which would inflict the severest censure which the House could give, which struck at the existence of the Ministry, and amounted to a withdrawal of all confidence from it. (Cries of "No, no.") On the other side, he thought it right to state to the House, that by acceding to the motion of his Right Hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it would only enable him to proceed with the public service, while the necessary arrangements were making for the formation of a new Administration, and would not preclude itself from instituting a rigorous investigation into the propriety of these grants, whenever in the ordinary routine of business it came to the consideration of the votes on which these sums were now asked on account. When that period arrived, he should be prepared to meet the Right Hon. Gentleman in discussion, and to defend all the votes which belonged to his department of the public service.

We have received the following communication from a Correspondent, which we readily admit. If the "non habet legem" be a true bill, with reference to the party mentioned, we can only regret that another Dogberry is added to the already over-loaded list:—

SIR,—Perhaps the readers of your valuable Paper may not be aware, that the Barrister, who has so extensively advertised himself appointed to the vacant situation of Police Magistrate, is generally distingnished by the name of Necessity HONE, because necessity knows no law; and it is therefore probable, that the first act of his office will be to commit himself.

I am, yours obligingly,

HIC NOMEN ERIT.

The trial at Lancaster has excited as much general sensation, as anything of a similarly public nature, we can now call to mind, and the sentence to be passed on the principals, from the late verdict given against them, is really looked for with an avidity, not to be surpassed by an announced disturbance of the peace of Europe. Indeed, with some minds, it is even doubtful whether some second Trojan war may not arise out of the situation of our modern HELEN.

It may appear premature to make any reference to this transaction, while it remains unsentenced by the law—but it is enough for us to know that it is condemned by the law, and consequently no remarks that can be made thereon, will have the tendency of influencing judgment. We have carefully waded through the reports of the trial, that we might be enabled to see every bearing of the case, and after a full examination of it, our minds are fully made up on the point.

In the year 1794, a similar case was tried at Bristol, before Sir VICKERY GIBBS, the Recorder, in which a Mr. PERRY was prosecuted for forcibly carrying off, from a boarding school in that city, Miss CLARKE, in which the testimony of the prosecution was interrupted by the late Lord ERSKINE (counsel for the defence), who contended that Mrs. PERRY (which the young lady had become) was a legal evidence, and that by precluding her, the Court would be deprived of the only proper witness—a position which was referred to the Recorder, who (as in the present opinion of Baron HULLOCK) admitted Mrs. PERRY's evidence. The nature of that, however, (which was strenuously objected to by the opposite counsel) was such as to obtain for Mr. PERRY an instantaneous acquittal, without the Jury going out of Court.

Another instance of abduction occurred in the year 1801, when Sir HENRY BROWNE HAYES was tried at Cork, for forcibly carrying off, with an intent to marry her, Miss PIKE, a rich Quaker heiress of that city. Sir HENRY, after a trial of thirteen hours, was found guilty, on the testimony of the lady, who gave a full and clear account of the business, and he was condemned to death—but that sentence was, six months afterwards, mitigated to transportation for life to Botany Bay.

In neither of these cases, however—certainly not in the first—was the defendant's conduct marked with that peculiar depravity which characterised EDWARD WAKEFIELD's management of this transaction; and we have no hesitation in saying that his crime should be visited with the most exemplary punishment which the law has power to inflict. It will have been seen, by this last week's papers, that another instance of abduction has taken place at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in the person of a Miss Row, who was forcibly carried therefrom, a few days since, by a Mr. ROBINS, but has since been recovered. Unless some legal interposition is placed between society at large, and the ungovernable desires or ambition of such unworthy members of it, our private threshholds are no longer secure, and the worst days of Whiteboyism will be imported from the sister country, and permitted to operate with the same impunity, which they have experienced at home. It will give us true and substantial delight to find the law inflicting on this WAKEFIELD a punishment equal to that, which the worst felonious act, ever tried at the Old Bailey, would be sure to draw down on the delinquent—for, in addition to a most replenished knave, we consider him to be about the greatest fool, we ever have had the misfortune to encounter; and from a combination of these qualifications, the peace of society can never be secure. There are no parents who can hereafter entertain a feeling of security, in entrusting their child to the surveillance of any schoolmistress, if a daring attempt, like this, remain unpunished, or rather not most severely punished—and with a view, therefore, both to the protection of our homes, and the security of those useful establishments, with which our best interests are associated, we do most sincerely hope to see such an example made of the present criminal, as may operate to the prevention of any similar crime.

When TOM RAIKES was consulting Mr. SCARLETT, some time since, respecting his late action in the Court of King's Bench, his solicitor asked the barrister, "if he did not think it was rather an ugly case." To which SCARLETT replied, looking his client full in the countenance, "the PRIMA facia of the case is, certainly, a very UGLY ONE."

Our attention has this last week been particularly directed to a most malignant attack, which has appeared in The Times Journal, upon the KING, in referring to the present demolition of Carlton House. A more absurd jumble of language was never, probably, placed upon paper; but the composition will assume, in every person's opinion, a very different complexion, when its writer, and his motive, become more generally known.

The improvements, that have been carried on with so much vigour, during the present reign, have commanded the astonishment of other nations, and the general admiration of this—and it would be a difficult matter to extract from the page of history any corresponding period, that can bear a comparison with it, in this respect. It is not, therefore, without feelings of great surprise, that even the most prejudiced reader must peruse the following specimen of unmeaning nonsense:—

The public see without regret the daily progress made towards a final demolition of Carlton-house. There are, indeed, no sacred or endearing recollections associated with that fast crumbling edifice. It has been a stage for gaiety—outward gaiety—and bustle—a field of jollity—perhaps of licence—but the foundation of at least one broken heart was laid there. Immense sums of money were there expended, which came from the earnings of the people. There, enormous debts were contracted, which the nation repeatedly discharged. But if Carlton-house be represented in history of the favoured and revered abode of the purely virtuous or pre-eminently wise—if distant generations shall be taught that within its gilded and bedizened wall science was fostered and the Muses flourished—that Englishmen, the most illustrious for genius and morality, were the exclusive, or most familiar, ornaments of that "brilliant" circle, which blazed for its hour upon the eastern wing of Pall-mall—the future antiquarian who shall succeed in extracting from genuine memoirs or authentic records of this age, the required evidence in support of such representations, may well aspire on his own behalf to the praise of more than mortal industry. But if the public be ready to forgive the removal of this unhonoured pile, it is not so with some of its innocent and cheerful appendages. We hear that many new buildings are about to be erected on the site of Carlton Palace, and in the neighbourhood—that St. James's Park, the scene of humble and unoffending, but occasional, and therefore doubly precious recreation, to the pent-up citizens of London and Westminster, is to be further encroached upon than at present, for the sake of multiplying the outposts of the Court, in a shape of well-plastered cribs and sites, to accomodate the customers of the new Buckingham Palace; and that between coachways and terraces, lofty walls and aristocratic avenues, to secure the communications between royalty and loyalty, this one great comfort to the people of the metropolis—the park of St. James's—bids fair to be shrewdly cut up. It seems surprising, that a chosen resort of CHARLES II. and his respectable companions should meet with so little favour: but one barbarous hutchery we cannot refrain from noticing—viz., the destruction of that rich screen of various and noble timber-trees which covered the gardens of Carlton-house, and shut out from the brick-burnt eyes of pedestrians who wandered through the Park, the dismal view of the rear of Pall-mall, from Carlton-house to the residence of him, who, in one respect at least, has proved himself no unworthy occupant of the first Duke of MARLBOROUGH's mansion. What is called the Regent's-park has been built and "beautified" by some official artists into a round of cockney willas, with a true cockney green and duck-pond in the midst of them. Is, then, a similar fate reserved for the ancient pleasure-grounds of St. James's, by these vulgarians of the West? Why is not the manly taste of Mr. WYATTVILLE called into operation, if any generous wish be entertained of reconciling the indulgences of the great with the convenience or necessities of the humble? Oh for a few men of well-strung nerves and earnest temperaments among the national representatives, to wring the withers of these heartless sycophants about the Court, and force upon them the expediency of a little forbearance towards the people.

We do not pretend to analyse the entire contents of this paragraph, but will content ourselves with a general comment. The idea of the Times journal talking about "cockney willas, greens, and duck-ponds," is about one of the most comical things that has ever emanated from that comical paper; for if its pages carry in their face, one feature more strongly than another, it is that of the most identified cockneyism, upon all points, that is to be met with, from Temple Bar to Whitechapel Church. But the idea is still more ridiculous, when it is made to bear reference to the Regent's Park, and its present beautiful formation, which is considered, by every person competent of judging, to be the most splendid arrangement of land and tenement, in any part of the globe.

From that part of the argument, we come to a passage on which the general tissue is founded, and which enables the conductors of this Journal to indulge, as they annually do, in some unfortunate reference to the most disgraceful records in English annals. The "one broken heart," whose "foundation," it appears, was "laid" in Carlton House, is intended to excite our sympathies in behalf of the memory of that jolly old "bottle-holder," who united her own efforts with those of her party, to upset not only the foundation of the house in which we are told her own was laid, but to undermine that of the nation, one over which she had the presumption to aspire to rule. It is almost superfluous to tell these silly writers, that it is too late in the day to excite one particle of that sensitiveness they are anxious to arouse; for they are not ignorant, whatever may be the affectation they profess to exhibit, that any recurrence to that subject is treated now, by every one, as it was at the time by most, with sensations of extreme disgust. We rejoice that the nation is freed from that polluted stigma, which the world would then have branded us with—that our homes are unstained by the influence of that domination, with which it was sought to infest them—and that the circles of society are become purified from those recitals, arising out of daily disclosures, which rendered our family halls, at least as respected the accounts which hourly came before their inmates, very little better than common bagnios.

We had given the Times credit, for, at least a temporary, cessation from those reflections upon the Court, and, above all, upon the CROWNED HEAD, which had so long disgraced its columns: but we believe the thing is very easily accounted for. The author of the above outrage, (whose identity with the Journal in question, his recent poetic effusions in its pages have proved) has not his fellow, except in the writer of the Fudge Family and Twopenny Post Bag: and there is no logic that paper can produce, which can ever persuade a man of sense, that the present calumniator of HIS SOVEREIGN is not the same ungrateful little rebel, who has so grossly and so repeatedly libelled him, in the works we have here mentioned. It is an old saying that "the devil can seldom hide his hoof:"—and it was never better proved, than in the present instance—"Oh for a few men of well-strung nerves and earnest temperaments among the national representatives!" could only emanate from that dangerous and exciting pen, which so continually calls to its assistance this alarming interjection, for the purpose of erecting the standard of treason, and arousing the blood of traitors, throughout his native country.

THE LATE DEAN OF DURHAM.

We have a melancholy, but sincere, gratification, in recording the following tribute to the memory of the late Dr. HALL, copied from the Oxford Herald; and and at the same time to express our full concurrence in the proper eulogium therein passed, on the excellence of his character, and the eminence of his attainments:—

It is our melancholy duty, this week, to record the death of Dr. Charles Henry Hall, the Dean of Durham, which took place on Friday se'nnight, (owing to a violent accession of fever, of no long duration), at Edinburgh, whither he had gone with a view of consulting physicians, accompanied by his family. The health of the Dean, we have heard it generally remarked, had, for some time past, been on the decline; and we were almost prepared for the sad intelligence which we here communicate to our readers. With unfeigned respect, we offer our personal testimony to his eminent qualifications as a Theologian—displayed in his offices of Regius Professor of Divinity and Bampton Lecturer—or when he frequently occupied the pulpit of our Cathedral, where his discourses were always listened to with the profoundest attention, and justly eulogized by a discriminating auditory, as the production of a cultivated taste, of an elegant scholar, and of one who had a profound knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. In the mild sway with which he ruled, for several years, the distinguished body committed to his protection, all those who were educated under him will concur in our assertion, that rarely had sound discipline been more happily blended with kindly tempered persuasion, paternal vigilance, and gentlemanly moderation in the employment of coercion. In short, in the influence resulting from his highly gifted mind and polished manners; in the liberal government of his College; in the invariable condescension of his deportment; in his known attachment to literature, profound classical erudition, and extensive acquaintance with the works of the sacred writers; and, more than all, in his ardent, and, under every circumstance, unhesitating devotion to his family—we had an example, of which, alas! we are now bereaved, of the high attainments and the estimable qualities which alone dignify the parent, the scholar, the man in authority, and the Christian divine. Dr. Hall was elected a Westminster student of Christ Church in 1779. In 1781 he was a successful candidate for the Chancellor's Latin Verse Prize, "Strages Indica Occidentalis," and in 1784 he gained another Chancellor's Prize, the English Essay on "The Use of Medals." In 1793 he served the office of Proctor, with Mr. Cartwright, of All Souls' College; in 1798 he preached the Bampton Lectures. In 1799 Dr. Hall succeeded Dr. Shafto as Canon of Christ Church; in 1807, on the promotion of Dr. Randolph to the Bishoprick of London, he was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity; and on the resignation of Dr. Jackson in 1809, he succeeded to the Deanery of Christ Church, which he resigned in 1824, when appointed Dean of Durham. He took the Degree of M.A. in January, 1796; B.D. 1794; and D.D. in 1800. He was in the 65th year of his age. By the death of Dr. Hall, the Vicarage of Luton, in Bedfordshire, becomes vacant. Patron, the Marquis of Bute.

Dr. Hall married Anna-Maria, the daughter of the late Lord Torrington, and sister of the present Viscount, in 1794, by whom he had several children, six of whom are living.

THEATRICALS.

Our table is inundated with letters, both pro and con, respecting the singular circumstance of Miss PATON appearing, vice Miss STEPHENS, at Drury Lane Theatre on Thursday last, in the opera of Artaxerxes.

Without the slightest knowledge of any of the "subject-matter," alluded to in the correspondence with which we have been favoured, we attended the theatre, merely because Artaxerxes is a great favourite with us, and there appeared a chance of its being done full justice to. Miss I. PATON's performance of the young king is extremely creditable to her—it called into question the extent both of her vocal and acting qualifications, and the quantity of each, elicited on the occasion, augurs much for her future good fortune. But we are aware of the formidable rival with whose talent and popularity this young lady had to contend—enough "to weigh a royal merchant down"—and therefore PROMISE can only be entertained of Miss I. PATON's effort, because PERFECTION in the character is to be found, alone, in its delineation by Madame VESTRIS. It is "a twice-told tale," or rather one told two hundred times, to eulogise Mr. BRAHAM in any part he plays; but above all others in that of Arbaces; in which his science and voice have long rendered it hopeless for the stage ever to think of finding even a tolerable successor, when, to adopt Mr. BALL HUGHES's phraseology:—

"Time has thinned his flowing 'air."

We certainly think Mr. HORN the best Artabanes we have got, and Miss PATON the ONLY Mandane—and certainly we never heard her to greater advantage, than we did on this occasion. The opera, in every point of view, was admirably executed, and left in our minds no wonder that the audience, to witness its performance, were so very numerous—the wonder would have arisen, if it had been otherwise.

From a notice of the opera, we pass to some comment on the circumstances attendant on its peformance. We have been led to understand, but will on no account vouch for the accuracy thereof, that Miss STEPHENS, having apprised the Manager of her inability, through indisposition, to play Mandane, (and indeed the play-bills said as much) he applied to Miss PATON to assist him in the difficulty, which, "either for love or money," she consented to do. To this, the proprietors of Covent Garden, not having been consulted, violently objected—but notwithstanding that, the lady played the part. If such be the true state of the case, we cannot sufficiently condemn the advisers of Miss PATON, who, in violation of an article, and contrary to the established etiquette of theatres, could listen to so monstrous a proceeding. No performers can commit themselves in a manner like this, unless they do it in a presumption of their value; for if they were of no particular consequence, "it needs no ghost to say," they would be discharged the next moment. If, then, it arise out of a supposed value, it is attempting to pit the public against the managers—a defiance which the good sense of the public would very soon abandon. If this be the state of affairs, and literally true, we condemn the whole thing in the severest terms imaginable, as one likely to subvert the good order of all theatres, and eventually ruin the persons implicated in it.

The announcement of Miss STEPHENS being ill, ought to be noticed by every paper, until it is explained—she was well enough to be at Dr. CROTCH's Concert the very day, and the subterfuge therefore was disrespectful both to the public and her employer. The plain fact is, Miss STEPHENS is now unequal to the performance of Mandane, and would have done herself much more credit by avowing it, than trifling in this manner. None can think more highly of Miss STEPHENS than we do; but, as in the case of her gifted rival, she may coquet with the public until she will lose their favour for ever. In this spirit, therefore, we would earnestly recommend both ladies to be a little more circumspect than this transaction has shown them to be.

We can, with much satisfaction, recommend Mr. FAWCETT's benefit (on Saturday next) to public patronage—he is an able artist, and an industrious man of business. With the claims he has on the people's purse, we are sorry to find him resort to the measures he, on this occasion, has done—for the services of an indefatigable servant, like him, are at all times well remembered. The idea of bringing up Miss FOOTE, to play a first-rate comedy part, when Madame VESTRIS, Miss CHESTER, and even Miss JARMAN, are in the theatre, is enough to make one sneeze. The humbug circulated about this young lady is not altogether dead—for we are this week told, in a most impudent paragraph, that she is about to bestow her hand upon a young officer, in one of the regiments of Lancers, now quartered in Scotland. One objection to a belief of this is, that at present there are no Lancers in Scotland, without it is intended that we are to know she is going to marry some Scotch apothecary. The bubble is however exploding—for the lady played some time since at Leicester to empty benches, at Bath the other day to "a beggarly account"—at Boston this last week to just as bad—and to Nottingham and other little theatrical holes, thereunto adjacent, with much the same effect—besides dunning every manager in the kingdom to engage her, half of whom would not try the experiment. We suppose the time will come when this "innocent and injured" young lady will be as much ashamed of herself, as the people are of her.

We are sorry to record the death of DIGNUM, which took place on Thursday, at his house in Gloucester-street.

Madame Toso is becoming a very considerable favourite with the town, and certainly she deserves to be so—in one point of view, she may, at least, be considered a singer of the highest order. BALL HUGHES says that TOES-oh is a better name for a dancer, than a singer—and BALL is seldom wrong in these matters.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Paris Papers of Weduesday, with the Etoile dated Thursday, contain letters from Constantinople, dated Feb. 28, which confirm the previous accounts of representations made by M. de Ribeaupierre for the pacification of Greece. It is stated, on the authority of a letter from Florence, dated the 18th inst., that Lord Cochrane has captured the Egyptian corvet built at Marseilles. The editors of the Gazette de Tribunaux and of the Echo, who had been convicted before an inferior Court, the former for stating, if we rightly recollect, that the gendarmes and peace-officers were not authorized to seize persons on the pretext that they were suspected, and the latter for copying this exposition of the law, were on Tuesday acquitted on their appeal to the Cour Royale. The judgment of the Court declared, that though the opinion expressed was erroneous, there was no intention to provoke to rebellion or disobedience to the laws. The letters from Madrid, which are dated the 15th, contain merely a repetition of the intelligence we have already received.

A letter from Elvas confirms the account of several Spanish soldiers having been shot at Badajoz, on accouut of their demonstrations in favour of a Constitution.

MANNER OF GIVING EVIDENCE IN AMERICA.—At a late Court held in a neighbouring county, New Jersey, a prosecution was trying against a Methodist preacher, Mr. D., for an assault and battery upon a young man, who was puished by the preacher for having disturbed his congregation at their religious meeting. In the course of the trial, it appeared that at the time the alleged disturbance took place the preacher laid hold of the young man, and shook him pretty roughly, which was the assault complained of. The gentlemen of the law, concerned in the cause, seemed very anxious to know the extent, and severity, and so forth, of this same shaking. and interrogated tbe witnesses as to this matter a long time. One of the witnesses, a stout athletic man, was asked, "How did he shake him? Did he shake him hard? How hard did be shake him?" &c.; and not having satisfied Mr. H., one of the Counsel, as to the extent, &c. Mr. H. again pressing the matter by saying, "Well, now, can't you tell how he shook him, and in what way he did it?" The witness thereupon laid hold of the Counsel by the collar, "suiting the action to the word, and the word to the action," and having given him some half dozen most terrible shakes, observed very coolly, "He shook him that way, Sir," to the no small amusement of the Judges, spectators, &c. woo were convulsed with laughter.—Easton (Pennsylvania) Argus.

CHARGE OF CHILD MURDER.—A short time ago the parish officers of Shrawle having reason to suspect that an unmarried woman, named Sarah Baylis, was pregnant, mentioned to her their suspicion; but she positively denied that such was the case. A few days after, that appearance in her person, which at first indicated to them her situation, being no longer visible, a medical man was called in to examine her, and who pronounced that she had been recently delivered of a child. An inquiry was then set on foot, as to how the infant had been disposed of, when its body was discovered, buried in a garden at the back of the house of a man, a widower, with whom Baylis resided, and who was her brother-in-law. After this, it was, we understand, interred in the church-yard by the parish-officers, but without any funeral rites, upon the supposition, we presume, that it was still-born. However, tbe circumstances reaching the ears of a neighbouring Magistrate, be deemed it was a case which demanded inquiry, and the body was disinterred, and Mr. Smith, the coroner, summoned to hold an inquest upon it. The inquest commenced on the 16th ult. and was resumed, by adjournment, on Thursday, when, after the examination of several witnesses, the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Sarah Baylis, the mother, and she was removed to the county gaol, under the coroner's warrant, to take her trial. The prisoner is 40 years of age. She has confessed the birth of the child on the morning of the 26th of February, at which time it is supposed she was eight months gone, or rather more; and its death is attributed to ber having taken a noxious drug to produce abortion.—Worcester Journal.

HORSE-STEALING.—Robberies of this nature have become so frequent of late, that not a day passes without information being given at the Police-offices on the subject. The stables of Messrs. Cox and Gardiner, livery stable-keepers, were broken open a few nights since, and a bright chesnut mare taken away; and on Tuesday night last, a brown gelding was stolen out of the stables of Mrs. Pain Sadford, at Bishopstown, Salisbury.

On Tuesday, about one o'clock, A. M., about forty or fifty yards of tbe old city wall, Norwich (about 20 feet high, and in some places seven feet in thickness), situate between the gate opening into Richmond-hill Gardens and the new road leading to Carrow-hill, fell down with a tremendous crash, burying underneath its ruins the workshops and houses which have been erected under it within the last few years. A circumstance so extraordinary as scarcely to be credible, yet perfectly true, occurred. At the termination of the spot where the ruin was divided from the solid part of the wall, and completely beneath it, was a situated a cottage, in which an old woman resided. When the wall fell, it completely buried in its ruins half this cottage. The neighbours being roused by the noise of its fall, naturally feared that the poor old tenant was crushed to atoms; but, fortunately, upon examination, she was found in the other half of the house that was left standing, in bed, fast asleep, without any cognizance of the destruction that had occurred around ber little dwelling. By this accident tbe Richmond-hill gardens are entirely laid open, besides the destruction of buildings overwhelmed in the fall of the walls, which were of immense thickness.—Suffolk Herald.

The new novel entitled VIVIAN GREY, has been styled a "prose Don Juan," but it may well be questioned in what the similarity between the two works consists, except that both display great talents, and that both Juan and Vivian Grey are wanderers over the surface of bigh and brilliant society, scorning its follies, ridiculing its peculiarities, and exposing its shallow pretensions, when put into competition with the real aristocracy of genius and intellect.

EXECUTION OF RACHAEL BRADLEY.—LANCASTER, MARCH 26.—This unfortunate creature was on Friday last convicted, before Mr. Justice Bayley, of tbe wilful murder of her illegitimate child, at Ashton-under-Line, and was accordingly sentenced to undergo the awful penalty of the law. At an early hour tbis morning the scaffold was fixed without the walls of the Castle, and facing St. Mary's Church. Soon after twelve o'clock the wretched woman made her appearance, supported by two women. She was apparently about 27 years of age, and looked excessively faint and pallid. Each of the women shook hands with and kissed her, and when resigned her to tbe executioner. She never spoke, and, notwithstanding her apparent weakness, she stood steadily whilst the executioner adjusted the rope, and even then she moved not until the bolt was withdrawn, and she was launched into eternity. There seemed to be some mismanagement upon this occasion. After the rope was adjusted she had to remain in the same posture, and, doubtless, in great agony of mind, until the executioner could get below to withdraw the bolt. This interval might have been spared by the intervention of an assistant. The rope, also, was fastened at the back of the neck, instead of under the left ear, and in consequence of this her sufferings seemed very great. She struggled hard for nearly a quarter of an hour, and frequently breathed during the time. After hanging the usual time the body was cut down, and given to the surgeons for dissection, pursuant to the sentence passed upon her.

Colonel Wyndham, of Drove House, Chichester, occupies the intermediate days of hunting, with rabbit shooting; and so numerous are these animals, that on one day last week, 200 were killed with six guns.

TATTERSALL'S.

The business on Thursday was equally heavy as on Monday, but much more general; Tatler had many friends present, and was backed freely at 7 and 7½ to 1, the latter being the closing odds. Glenartney, in consequence, went back half a point, and at 5 to 1 had no backers. The Oaks and Riddlesworth did not present any thing worthy of particular mention.—Reviewer has again become first favourite for the St. Leger, but nearly all the others are as before; we should except Emma, who is two or three points better. The closing odds were as follows.—

A Nobleman in the county of Herts recently had a bill presented to him of 1,500l. for corn, &c. used for feeding his pheasants!

The "Ways and Means" of Government will be increased this year by the sum of 180,000l.,—the stamp and legacy duties payable under the wills of two individuals, the late Mr. Rundell and the late Mr. Stevens.

At the Cambridgeshire Assizes, on Saturday se'nnight, William and Mary Ann Mean were tried for the wilful murder of their daughter, a little girl about ten years of age, by starvation and violence. It appeared from the evidence, that the mother was in the habit of unmercifully heating the child with a stick and leather strap, and frequently making her go to a filthy ditch naked, and wash herself, "as she was a nasty child;" and also that she kept her without food for a considerable time, in order to cure her of her dirtiness. A surgeon proved that he had the child stripped, and of all the objects he ever saw, it was the most complete skeleton; she was also literally flayed from head to foot: he had no doubt that the wounds and bruises caused the child's death. Mr. Justice Gazelee summed up, and the Jury, after a long consultation, returned into Court, with a verdict of Not Guilty as to William Mean, and pronouncing his wife Guilty of manslaughter, under peculiarly aggravated circumstances. The learned Judge, after an impressive address, sentenced her to transportation for life.

SUBTERRANEOUS FIRE AT ORMINGTON, DORSET.—On the north-eastern coast of Weymouth Bay, opposite to the Island of Portland, rises a chalky cliff, considerably higher than the rest of the coast, called the White Nore. On Friday, the 16th of this month, a flame was observed playing on the surface of the cliff, on a particular spot. The flame has now assumed the character of a subterraneous fire burning continually, and may be seen from the Esplanade at Weymouth by night. The chasms from which the fire issues cover a space of earth 20 feet square. Upon looking into the cracks in the earth the fire appears as clear as that of a furnace. The atmosphere around is sultry, and a steam arises from a larger portion of the surface of the cliff. The coast in this neighbourhood produces a slaty coal of a very sulphureous nature, and which exhales a gas so offensive that none but those who are driven by poverty to burn it can endure the odour. On removing some of this coal, the heat became so great as not to be touched by the hand; a piece of it was put on a white cotton pocket handkerchief, which was completely singed, as if burnt by a heater; matches were made of brimstone melted by the heat of the coal, which were tried, and found to ignite on applying them to the fissures whence the steam issued. On removing more of the external rubbish, it gave fresh vent, and the fire was distinctly seen underneath, so that pipes were lighted from tbe coal itself, without the assistance of a match; another hole was dug about four feet distant from the principal cavity, creating a fresh current of air, and a piece of furze took fire on being applied thereon.

The commissioners under the new Street Act have determined to commence their improvements at the east corner of St. Martin's-lane, and proceed regularly from thence to Exeter 'Change, previously to their taking down the Golden Cross, and the adjoining buildings. As the ground on which these stand is to form an open unoccupied space, they are to remain for the present.

A few days since a farmer consigned to the custody of Mrs. Ireland, hostess of the Peacock Tavern of Nottingham, fifty one-pound bank-notes. The good lady, in her anxiety to secure the property of her customer, deposited them, for safe keeping, in a tea-pot, which had long stood unused on a shelf in a chamber. On Monday last, the owner called to claim his property; Mrs. Ireland went to the shelf, when lo, the tea-pot had vanished, notes and all. Inquiry, it may be imagined, was instantly set on foot, as to what had become of the fragile depot of so much valuable property; the servant-girl was asked if she knew any thing about it, when to the astonishment of her mistress, she answered, "Bless you, ma'am, I used it this morning; I made tea in it, for thirty witnesses at the assizes!" The pot was immediately produced, and upon examination, it was found that the notes were safe at the bottom, under a heap of marcerated tea-leaves, and, although parboiled, and stained with Bohea, still, fortunately for the owner, in a negotiable state.—Doncaster Gazette.

On Thursday se'nnight, a duel took place in the county of Wexford, between Mr. Smith, of Brickley Cottage, county of Waterford, and Mr. Power, of Ayrmont. On the first fire, his adversary's ball struck Mr. Power on the right side. The shot would have been fatal if it had not struck against his waistcoat pocket, in which there was some silver and a bunch of keys. Tbe surgeon, on stripping Mr. Power, discovered the keys embedded in the flesh, and the ball situated between the shirt and the skin! Mr. Power was of course severely hurt, but no serious consequence was likely to ensue when the last accounts left.

AWFUL VISITATION.—On Wednesday evening, the Rev. E. T. Jones, Minister of the Islington and Silver-street Chapels, when just upon the step of his own door, and in the act of raising his hand to tbe knocker, suddenly fell back, and expired without a groan.

It appears, by an account just printed by order of the House of Commons, tbat the amount of poor rates in England and Wales, for one year, ending the 20th of March, 1826, was 6,966,151l. 8s. It is added, that from 90 places, but in which the assessments are inconsiderable in amount, no returns have been received; so tbat the total sum, therefore, may fairly be taken, in gross figures, at about 7,000,000l. Of this fractional amount, as above stated, the sum derived from land is stated to be 4,795,481l. 16s.; from dwelling-houses, 1,814,228l. 3s.; from mills, factories, &c. 259,564l. 13s.; and from manorial profits, 96,881l. 16s.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

LANCASTER, MARCH 23.

TRIAL OF THE WAKEFIELDS.

The three defendants, Edward Gibbon, William, and Mrs. Edward Wakefield, with Edward Thevenot, a Frenchman, were indicted for a conspiracy in unlawfully carrying off Ellen Turner, and with causing the said Ellen to contract matrimony with Edward Gibbon Wakefield, against the consent of her father, &c.

The case was stated for the prosecution, and witnesses examined to prove, that the defendants, by stating Miss Turner's mother to be extremely ill, had induced the Misses Daulby, of Liverpool, where she was at school, to suffer her to accompany Thevenot (representing himself as the servant of a Dr. Armstrong), for the purpose of going home; that the two Wakefields met them at Manchester, and there Edward represented to Miss Turner that her father was ruined by the failure of banks in which a great deal of his property had been lodged, at the same time offering to advance 60,000l. to relieve him from his embarrassments if she would marry him; that before she would decide, she desired to see her father, which was agreed to, and they proceeded to Carlisle, where a letter was shewn her as from Mr. Grimsditch, the family solicitor, desiring her "to shew the same fortitude that her father had evinced on the occasion of his losses;" that she was thus induced, under the influence of terror at the impending destruction of her family, to accompany Edward to Scotland, and in the hope of preserving them from ruin the marriage at Gretna took place.

Mr. R. Turner and Mr. Critchley, two uncles of Miss Turner, and Mr. Grimsditch proved following the parties to Calais, and bringing her home.

Mrs. Wakefield was implicated in the conspiracy, by advancing money to her son-in-law to carry their objects into effect, and by being the means of gaining information as to the absence of Mr. Turner from home. When Miss Turner was called on to give her evidence, Mr. Scarlett objected, as she was "legally the wife of the defendant;" but Mr. Baron Hullock decided that he should admit her evidence, even if it was a valid marriage. There were cases where the evidence of wives against their husbands was admissible, as in questions of personal rights, and to reject evidence here (said the Learned Judge) would involve an incongruity, of which the law cannot certainly admit; and it would establish, in favour of persons who might be disposed to do so, in many cases, a power of violating the law with impunity. The young lady was then examined, and proved the facts as stated. She admitted that she repeated her consent to the marriage before several persons, and that she believed herself the lawful wife of Edward Gibbon Wakefield, till informed to the contrary by her uncles and Mr. Grimsditch at Calais.—For the defence, the principal reliance was, that by the law of Scotland the marriage was legal; and several witnesses were called to prove that Miss Turner appeared throughout the journey as a free agent, that she had acted from inclination, and had had no restraint put upon ber. The trial lasted till eight in the evening, when Mr. Baron Hullock proceeded to charge the Jury. In adverting to the separate cases of the defendants, he though the Jury could entertain little doubt of the guilt of the two Wakefields; but the case as regarded Mrs. Wakefield stood on a different ground, as she might not have known precisely the arrangements and full intentions of all tbe other parties, when she advanced the money, and made the inquiries as to Mr. Turner's absence. His Lordship was proceeding to sum up the evidence in detail, when he was informed by the Jury that they had made up their minds upon the facts.

After a conference among Counsel, it was agreed to take a verdict of Not Guilty upon the third count of the indictment, which insinuated the use of force, there being no evidence to sustain that part of the charge. The Jury retired for twenty minutes, and returned with a verdict of Guilty against the three Wakefields. (Thevenot has absconded.) Mr. Baron Hullock then inquired what course the prosecutors meant to take respecting the second indictment (for forcible abduction).—Mr. Serjeant Cross requested time for consideration till nine o'clock on Saturday morning.—At the meeting of the Court on Saturday, Mr. Serjeant Cross said he was instructed to state tbat Mrs. Wakefield would not be called up for judgment upon the verdict of yesterday. The Learned Counsel had no hesitation in acknowledging that on the second indictment he despaired of obtaining a verdict upon the law of the case, but that one count for a misdemeanor would reach the defendants. The Counsel for tbe defendants agreed to a verdict of Guilty on that count, which was accordingly entered against them. The two male prisoners were then committed to Lancaster gaol, to be hereafter brought up for judgment in the Court of King's Bench.

MARCH 24.

HORRID MURDER OF A CHILD BY ITS MOTHER.

Rachael Bradley, aged 27, stood indicted for the wilful murder of her own child, at Ashton-under-Line.

Hanuah Meigall stated, that she lived at Ashton-under-Line. At Midsummer last, the prisoner went to lodge at her house, at which time she was in a state of pregnancy. She remained there about a week, and then left, saying she was going to her parish, which was Thurston. About Christmas she came back again, and brought with her a very fine female child, to wbich she had given birth; she called it her darling, and said its name was Mary. She remained this time about a month, and on the 16th of January she again went away, taking the child with ber, saying she would again apply to her parish. On the 18th she returned again, but without the child. Witness asked her where the infant was? She replied, she had left it with a woman to nurse. Witness asked her who the nurse was? She said she bad left it in Yorkshire with a nurse, and a good nurse; and that when she came away it was well and hearty. Witness afterwards saw the child dead at tbe Workbouse, three days after. She always seemed fond of tbe child, and suckled it with motherly care; she said sbe had left it with the overseer and his wife; she went to ber parish for relief; sbe was out of work and badly off.

Thomas Higham—Is a constable of Ashton-under-Line. He went to the Canal to search for the child; he was at work two days. He saw it picked up on the Sunday, and carried it to the workhouse. Witness fetched the prisoner to look at it. He held it in his arms, and asked her if it was her child, but she never answered. He asked her again, and received no answer. Some person standing near, said, "Can't you speak, woman?" She then said it was her child. Witness then said, "You bore this child, did you?" She said "Yes." He then said, "How could you find it in your heart to drown a poor infant like tbis?" She said, "Because the last time she saw its father, he told her if she did not make an end of it, he would make an end of ber the very first time be met her."

Mr. James Campbell, a surgeon, proved that the child came by its death by drowning.

The prisoner said nothing in her defence, and the Jury, without hesitation, pronounced her Guilty.

Mr. Justice Bayley pronounced the awful sentence of the law, and ordered her to be executed on Monday, and her body to be delivered over to the surgeons to be anatomized. The wretched woman was carried from the dock in the chair in which she bad sat during the trial.

EXETER, MARCH 27.

MURDER.

Thomas Friend was indicted, first, for the murder of Elizabeth Glass, on the 19th inst., at Asbbury; secondly, for the murder of Edward Glass, at the same time and place. He was charged also with both murders on the coroner's inquisition. On the first indictment only he was tried.

Mr. Stephens stated the case for the prosecution:

Abraham Pincombe knew Friend; had told Miss Glass that he observed something particular in the prisoner.

The Judge asked if the prisoner heard it?

Witness said no. I saw Friend on the 19th of March; when he came in from work he washed his hadns; it was between five and six o'clock; I did not see him that night again; I saw Mrs. Glass on her return about 10 o'clock; I knew where she had been, and that the daughter and Edward had gone to meet her; Miss Glass took a lantern and cloak with her; I took a lantern after Mrs. Glass came home, and went towards the Down to meet them; I called three times very loud, and finding no answer made, I concluded they were gone to the brother's, and returned; it was about a mile from where the bodies lay. Friend used to kill the sheep and pigs for the house; he used a butcher's knife; (looking at it), I believe that is the knife which is used. I was on the Down next morning; I never saw Friend afterwards until Friday morning, when he was found; I was at the cow-house two minutes after he was found; Wm. Weeks called me; prisoner was in a very dogged state, and could not look up; I said, "Tom, what have you done!" He said he knowed his doom, but said nothing more, and went away. (At this moment the prisoner sank down and fainted; a chair was brought for him, and salts applied to his nostrils.)

Sarah Brock was servant to Mrs. Glass till about a year ago; the prisoner had "a kind of kindness" for Miss Glass, but I never saw him touch her nor speak to her. I know the handkerchief, it is Tom Friend's; Dame hemmed it with her left hand. That knife I believe to be the same he used to kill the pigs with.

John Gardiner, turnkey of the gaol, produced a jacket which had been taken from the prisoner's back on the 23d of March; there was blood on it; some other marks appeared as if blood had been washed out.

Mr. John Fisher, surgeon at Atherley, went on the 20th of March to Wadland-down to see Mary Glass's body. It was lying on the ground on the back; there was a large cut from the centre of the neck to the ear, on the right side, it was down to the spine; there was a wound in the middle of the left hand; the cut must have caused instant death; all the vessels on the right side were divided; that unquestionably caused her death. The wound was three inches long by two deep.

Charles Scymour, clerk to Mr. Woolcombe, magistrate, examined, stated that he was present when the prisoner was examined on Friday, the 23d of March; the examination was taken in writing; the prisoner was neither threatened nor promised; it was read over to him afterwards; the prisoner put his mark to it in Mr. Woolcombe's presence, and it was signed by him. That is Mr. Woolcombe's writing. The prisoner's confession, on his examination, was as follows:—

"That on Monday night last, the 19th inst., I left my mistress's house, called Weeks in the Moor, in Beaworthy parish, and went away across the corner of Venn Down, in the way in which people of the house generally pass. I then came up to Wadland Down, up to the gate against the inner moor, close to the corner of the wheat-field, in the parish of Ashbury. I knew they (Miss Glass and the boy) were coming that way, if they went; they were going against their mother. The mother went away to North Yeo, to her son's, before us went to dinner. When I was up at the gate by the wheat-field, when I saw a candle, and stopped till they came forward; when they came forward where I was, I took Miss Glass by the clothes. Then she began to throw to me and the boy. She screeched out. She said I should not kill her. I made no answer. Then I got the knife and cut Miss Glass's throat; then I went to the boy Edward and cut his throat with the same knife. I had no other. I drew the body of Miss Glass some way further down from the place where she fell. I then took up the bonnet and cloak, and carried it a little further down by the hedge. I then came homewards. I went a little above-side the house, into a furze-brake. I stayed there in the brake two days and two nights. Then I came out, and came away into the hay-trellet belonging to the farm of Weeks on the Moor. I stayed there one night and one day. I went from the trellet in the evening, and went away up in a linhay adjoining a field, and there I stayed last night—there I stayed till morning, when they came to meet the cattle. Wm. Weeks came up to me at the cattle; I asked him if Mr. Glass and (they) his brother Thomas was in, for I wanted to speak with them. Then Abraham Pincombe came. Then William Weeks went in to tell Mr. Glass of it. Then he came up when I was there; we came off for Ashbury. I have had nothing to eat since Monday night until this morning. I seem I could not be easy, but that I must come in for the purpose of being taken, as I thought 'twas as well to come first as last. I have had no promise of favour, so as to induce me to make this confession, as I was sure to be taken, and did not expect any other thing.

"The mark ⋈ of THOMAS FRIEND."

This was the case for the prosecution.

The Judge then asked the prisoner if he had any witnesses to call, or defence to make? He said, in a low tone, "No."

The Judge recapitulated the evidence to the Jury. In about a minute, they returned a verdict of Guilty.

The Learned Judge then passed sentence in the usual form. The prisoner seemed almost motionless as he was removed from the dock.

HORSHAM ASSIZES, Wednesday, March 28.

THE KING v. MRS. FORREST, alias FORBES.

The indictments against this lady for the affair at the New Steyne, Brighton, which excited so much conversation last Autumn, were expected to have been tried this day, Wednesday, in the Nisi Prius Court, and in consequence the Court was crowded to excess. Owing, however, to the length of time which a cause higher up in the list occupied, they were deferred till to-morrow. The interest excited by the affair here is very great—it forms the constant theme of conversation. There are seven indictments in all, charging as many different specific offences. The number of witnesses to be examined is very great, and it is understood that Mr. Barrow, the prosecutor, will spare no exertions or expense to secure a conviction. It is said the majority of the inhabitants of Brighton highly approve of the course adopted by Mr. Barrow. The trial of the first indictment alone is expected to last the whole day.

Thursday, March 29.

Mr. Justice Littledale suggested, that, perhaps, it would be possible for Counsel so to arrange as to allow of the indictments against Mrs. Forrest being forthwith proceeded with in the Crown Court.

Mr. Sergeant Taddy said, it unfortunately happened that he was engaged to conduct those indictments, which he could not do if they were tried in the other Court, as he was also retained in several Special Jury causes appointed for trial that day before his Lordship. If, however, Mr. Andrews, who was retained with him against Mrs. Forrest, would undertake to conduct the prosecution, he thought the difficulty might be obviated.

Mr. Broderick said, there could be no doubt but Mr. Andrews was fully competent to conduct it, as his practice at sessions had given him a most extensive experience in proceedings against brothels.

Mr. Andrews was accordingly sent for, and on being informed what had occurred, said that he did not feel himself prepared to conduct them.

Mr. Justice Littledale—Why not take them? there can be no great difficulty about them.

Mr. Andrews—They are far from common cases.

Mr. Sergeant Taddy here interposed, and said, that for the general advancement of business, he would return all his briefs against Mrs. Forrest, and then, as Mr. Andrews would become principal counsel, he would have no objection to go on with the indictments.

Mr. Andrews still objected. He was not prepared to take the lead, and sooner than do so on the instant, he would return his briefs.

It was finally arranged that the cases should stand over till the following morning. (For which see Last Page.)

"LETTERS FROM COCKNEY LANDS."

We have been enabled to get the following specimen from a new edition of this work now in forwardness. It describes the "Hell" in Hogarth's "Rake's Progress."

Oft while I lie in bed, the wall
With Hogarth hung, my look will call.
But in the next—ha! he's in "Hell,"
I' the foreground there—his eye-balls swell,
His hand is clench'd, his look on high,
See! all his attitudes defy
The powers to work him worse perdition;
Another near in like condition,
But less outrageous, in his pocket
Half seen a pistol—will he cock it
Against himself or 'gainst the winner;
Two there aside, off some beginner,
Have feasted—how their features play
In sympathy, while handle they
The golden smilers. One there's biting
His fingers, and thinks all inviting,
To his friends mutton will be over,
Or p'rhaps he thinks of suits of trover
For money lost. See that smooth green,
And those twin ivory cubes, they've been
As fascinating in their rattle
As that fell snake: but now the battle
Is o'er; he gathering in the poule,
Just now so smooth, seducing, cool,
Is now all eye lest one should stay
(One stiver.) Lo! a rising fray,
A pigeon'd youth his sword has drawn
On yon dark-rook.

The Portuguese Deputy for the Algarves, who was tried before the Chamber of Peers on a charge of having taken part with the rebels in the part of the country for which he was elected, made his defence on the 17th ultimo, and was unanimously acquitted by the Chamber.

The new novel of De Vere, by the distinguished author of Tremaine.—We are directed to acquaint the subscribers to the New Public Library, 26, Holles-street, Cavendish-square, that, on application, they can be immediately supplied with the above popular work, which was published on Friday last, on which day the earliest copies for sale were also ready for delivery at this library. Early to-morrow morning, Historiettes, or Tales of Continental Life, by the author of The English in Italy.

On Thursday, the 22d of February, Mr. James Wesley Burt, surgeon, of No. 2, Surrey-place, Newington, and formerly of Fleet-market, examined the body of a man who had died under his care, and entering into the minutiæ of it with characteristic eagerness, and the subject being one of those from whence no ill effects would have been expected, he did not notice a slight scratch across the tip of the fore-finger, but proceeded about the operation unaware of his liability to danger. In the course of the same evening he felt unwell, and the next morning exhibited all the horrors of matured mischief. Notwithstanding every endeavour was made to save him, he died within the week from the commencement of his illness.

Lloyd's Coffee House.—It is not, we believe, generally known, that in the year 1720, at a coffee-house in Lombard-street, kept by a Mr. Lloyd, the first dish of tea ever made in London was drank. The following account we have received from a correspondent:—At the above period tea was unknown as a beverage in this kingdom, when a mate of an Indiaman, having brought some home from China on speculation, gave it to a waterman's apprentice to dispose of for him, and, after hawking it about for some days, carried it to Mr. Lloyd, in Lombard-street, who, out of curiosity, purchased it, and thus first brought it into use. This Mr. Lloyd is the same individual who gave his name to the coffee-house, which still retains it, though long since removed to the Royal Exchange.

The discovery which the world owes, as is generally believed, to Van Eyck, of painting with oil colours, soon led to a most cruel murder. Domenico Beccafumi had been taught this great secret by Antonio of Messina, who had gained it, not very fairly, from Van Eyck. Beccafumi imparted it to Andrea del Castagno, who, eager to be the sole possessor of such a treasure, assassinated his friend and benefactor. Andrea, now fearless of a rival in his art, flourished without suspicion, and lived long loaded with riches and honours. On his death-bed, however, the horrors of guilt overtook him, he made a public confession of his crimes, and died detested and execrated by his fellow citizens.

We have heard, from more sources than one, that Lady Holland is the author of the forthcoming tale of the Bleu Monde, called "May Fair." This part of the fashionable quarter of town has been, time out of mind, the chosen region of the high Blues, and it is therefore natural enough that the work should be attributed to the pen of their queen; but we have reason to know that her ladyship (we had almost said her Majesty) is not the author of the jeu d'esprit, which, with greater probability, is ascribed to a certain witty member of Brookes's. We trust that he is not going to "flutter their dove-cotes" with any thing scandalous.

A shocking accident took place near Milnathort, about one o'clock on Wednesday morning. Mr. Whyte, flesher, in Kinross, was riding at full speed down a declivity of the road, and the morning being dark, he came in contact with a cart laden with fish, for Perth, which was coming in a contrary direction. The shock was consequently violent; and the shaft entering the abdomen, near the groin, he became literally impaled on it, till relieved by the driver of the cart. He almost instantly expired.—Glasgow Herald.

The Lost Umbrella.—Privilege versus Privilege.—The readers of the Parliamentary debates of Monday and Tuesday last will be aware, that the trifling loss of an umbrella gave rise to a grave question of privilege in the most dignified assembly of the realm. This was as it should be. Ancient and well-founded privileges should be upheld, no matter whether they become affected by the loss of an umbrella, or the loss of a province. But, if we are correctly informed, the lost umbrella has given rise to the assertion of a privilege of another kind, which, whatever might be said of its utility, is certainly not less ancient than that claimed by their Lordships—we allude to that which ladies have claimed from time immemorial, to use their tongues in defence of their lords (a claim which, by the way, is every where admitted, save in our British Courts of common law.) The fair claimant in this case is the wife of the gentleman who was summoned to their Lordships' bar on Tuesday. This lady, whose plain notions of right and wrong appear to have got no undue bias by any acquaintance with the practice of our superior law Courts, happened (we understand) to be present when their Lordships' summons to appear before them was served upon her husband. Indignant that he should be "called to account" for only looking for his umbrella in the house where he had lost it, the good lady was at no pains to conceal what she thought on the occasion. "Tell the Lords," said she (in a tone which spoke the strong feelings of the woman, heightened by the sympathies of the wife)—"tell the Lords from me, that I will have my husband's umbrella, or I will summon every one of them. It was a new umbrella, and he gave 17s. 6d. for it last Wednesday. He had a right to look for it where he lost it. He left it in their house, and they must know something about it, among them." How far the lady will carry her threat into execution time alone must determine.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—A few weeks ago a robbery was committed at the Travellers' Club House, Pall-mall East, by three individuals, who obtained admittance to the house at an early hour in the morning, under pretence of their being chimney-sweepers, when they managed to carry off unperceived a large quantity of valuable plate, which was soon after traced to the possession of a man named Solomons, a Jew, who is now in custody as the receiver.

A youth named Croker, who acknowledged himself to have been one of the three who committed the robbery, is also in custody, and has been some time; but although the officers of this office have been in possession of accurate information of who the principal and planner of the robbery was, they had failed in all their efforts to come in contact with him, until Wednesday last, when the suspected person was taken. This person's name is Samuel White, a man of powerful make.

The police had intimation that White might be met with in company with his woman, whose person was well known to the officers, although White's own person was not. On Wednesday, about six o'clock, three active officers of this establishment proceeded to a certain street in Spitalfields that evening, namely, Clements, Goddard, and Avis. Knowing the characters of the parties that they were likely to come in contact with, the officers were well armed with cutlasses and loaded pistols. They had no sooner entered the street they were destined for than they met with a crowd of several hundred persons—Spitalfields weavers—marching in procession upon some subject of difference with their masters in trade, but they were perfectly quiet; and in the midst of them the officers espied White's woman, and a man whom they did not doubt was White himself, leaning upon his arm. One of the officers immediately seized him in the midst of the crowd, the sensation in which now became very alarming to the officers, as the weavers thought that it was some interference of the police with their procession, and in the first impulse of the multitude White was disengaged from the grasp of the officer who had seized him, but he was instantly again laid hold of by the other officers, who now drew their cutlasses, and called out to the crowd that they were not interfering with their proceedings, but only securing a man charged with a felony. White made a most powerful resistance, and alternately the officers and himself were uppermost on the ground. Seeing the resistance of the fellow, the crowd still seemed inclined to give him a helping hand; but while Clements and Goddard were struggling with him on the ground, Avis, with his cutlass, kept the mob at bay for a time. While on the ground, White made several efforts to draw a clasp-knife from his pocket, and so great were his exertions to accomplish this desperate object, that the contest for master between himself and the two officers lasted full twenty minutes before they could succeed in getting his hands together so as to handcuff him, which, however, they at last effected; still White maintained the contest with his legs, by kicking at the officers, and lying upon his back, refusing to move out of that position.

The crowd again began to evince strong feelings against the officers, and were closing upon them in a manner that most likely would have led to bloodshed, as the officers were determined to surrender their prisoner only with their lives, when fortunately the head officer, and a party from Worship-street office, came very opportunely to their assistance, and with their aid White was lodged in the strong room at Worship-street until the crowd dispersed, when he was conveyed in a coach to this office, and on Thursday he was remanded for further examination.

DREADFUL FIRE.—MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.

About two o'clock on Thursday morning a fire burst out from the lower part of the extensive premises of Messrs. Thompson, distillers, of Coleman-street, at the back of Guildhall, which, for some time, not only threatened destruction to the whole neighbourhood, but to the Hall itself, and the adjacent edifices. The flames, in a few minutes, communicated to the premises of Messrs. Cousins and Kemp, wholesale tea-dealers, which were principally composed of wood, and thence to the dwelling of Mr. Barratt, surgeon, adjoining, the whole of which, in ten minutes, were enveloped in one continual blaze, the fire extending itself to the back of the Secondaries' Office, which has also sustained considerable damage. Mr. Chambers, of the firm of Messrs. Cousins and Kemp, had, accompanied by a friend, been to witness the Oratorio, and returned home about half-past twelve o'clock. At this time all was apparently safe. Having supped, they were engaged some time in conversation, when they were alarmed by the porter suddenly entering the room in a state of exhaustion, so much so, that the poor man fell on the floor unable to speak. In a moment, however, they were alive to the imminent danger they were in, and raising the porter up, they attempted to make their escape, but the smoke had attained so strong a vent, that they were near falling to the ground. Mr. Chambers's friend had, happily, the presence of mind to fall on his knees and hands, and his two companions having done the same, they were enabled to crawl with difficulty through a passage of considerable length, and thus regain the street. Their first object was to alarm the family of Mr. Barrat, who escaped in their night-dresses, just as the flames burst forth with incredible fury, accelerated by a strong wind from the north-east. It was in vain to return, and in this state the females, consisting of Mrs. Birrat and her child, with her mother, were exposed to the night air and a heavy shower of rain, until they could obtain shelter. The engines were soon on the spot, and a plentiful supply of water was at hand, but all the exertions of the firemen, who worked the engines in a drenching shower, were abortive, the devouring element, as it were, bidding defiance to their efforts. So rapidly did the flames proceed, that by four o'clock, the whole of the buildings enumerated were reduced to a heap of ruins.

Mrs. Hughes takes her Benefit at the Adelphi Theatre on Tuesday next, and in addition to the usual attractions of that popular theatre, the justly celebrated clown, Grimaldi sen., makes his only appearance on the occasion.

The Maidstone Gazette gives the following as the copy of a letter written and actually sent by a wife to her husband, who having been capitally convicted, was sent on board the Ganymede hulk, at Woolwich. The woman is at present resident at a town in the eastern part of this county. For obvious reasons we omit names, but give the remainder verbatim as it was written:—

TRIAL OF MRS. FORBES.

HORSHAM, FRIDAY, MARCH 30.

This morning the trial of Mrs. Forbes, charged with keeping a brothel on the Steyne at Brighton, and by so doing annoying Mr. Barrow. a solicitor, resident in the adjoining house to that of the defendant, took place.

From the probability of language and circumstances necessary to be elicited occurring, which might be offensive to the female ear, the Ladies of the Court were requested to withdraw. The request was instantly obeyed.

Mr. Sergeant Taddy stated the case. Mr. Barrow was a gentleman of great respectability in the law, and one whose ears and eyes had been grossly annoyed by the nightly revels and carousals of the defendant and her paramours. He would call Mr. Barrow, who would himself unfold to the Jury such a scene of profligacy, as would no doubt cause them to feel with him, that the prosecution was instituted solely for the purpose of shielding his family from the possibility of contagion, by the removal of so profligate a neighbour, rather than from any desire of inflicting punishment, however the defendant, and her associates, might deserve it.

Mr Barrow, after describing his profession, and the contiguity of his residence, and his being guardian to a young man, whom he sent from his house, fearful that he might be corrupted by his syren neighbours, commenced the most serious part of his charge. In consequence, he said, of the conduct of the defendant's becoming worse and worse every day, he set up to watch them of nights. He found, that generally after a gentleman entered, a bell rang, which, from observation, he found was a notice to the servant that she was to get the bed-chamber ready. He had seen, from his garden, men and women go up into the bed-rooms ; and, in some instances, in which the curtains were undrawn, and the candle placed in a particular situation, so as to enable him to see into the rooms, he had seen acts of gross indelicacy on the parts of both the men and the women. (He particularised them.) The men, shortly after thus retiring, used to leave the house. Has repeatedly seen the defendants go after men, and bring them into the house. On one occasion, two gentlemen came, and went down the area, and returned, one carrying in his arms one of the female servants. He went in the direction of the parade. The other gentleman followed, arm in arm with another servant. Remembers on the evening of the 7th of September, seeing the defendant, Forrest, sitting at an open window, in front of the Steyne. A gentleman passed by, she called to him, and asked him to come in, observing, she was all alone : he did go in. On the 7th of September he put up a placard in his window, with the words, "Beware of the Brothel, No. 24, New Steyne." On the 10th of September, the defendants, after being absent two days from their home, returned, and Langston, who was accompanied by a gentleman, whom witness believes to be an officer in the army, said to witness, "Where is your d——d old wife?" Forrest and another gentleman were within hearing. Forrest afterwards used the grossest epithets towards him, calling him a woman-hater and a ———.

In his cross-examination, he asserted that he had seen nobles, gentles, officers of the army, and even a clergyman, enter the house !

The flourish of the prosecutor before the Magistrate on his being refused a warrant, may be not unacceptable, as a specimen of this gentleman's oratorical tag—it was drawn from him by the cross-examination of Mr. Adolphus :—"As a public prosecutor, I call upon you to grant me a warrant ; I demand it as my right —as a British subject. My character has been vilely aspersed, and if the allegations made against me, were true, I should deserve to yield my life to the offended laws of my country. I will lay the whole case before the King, the Duke of York, and the Secretary of State, and will make it resound through the country."

Several persons were brought forward to prove the statements made by the prosecutor. A Mr. Nairne, who said that the conduct of the women was neither decent nor modest—but did not see any indecencies practised inside the house. A servant of the prosecutor's, who had only seen people go in and out of the house at all hours of the night and day. Another, who could prove as little ; and two others, who proved less.

Mr. Adolphus, in a speech replete with invective against the conduct of the prosecutor, amongst other severe observations, said, he could feel no other sentiments than those of derision and contempt for the pettifogger who had brought her there, merely for the purpose of making his name resound through the kingdom. His poor client was a mere girl, she was only twenty years old, and he could not, therefore, but feel compassion for her situation. He took care, in his evidence, not to forget the alias he had omitted in his indictment, and had accordingly introduced her as alias Fauntleroy. As she had thus been mentioned, he felt it necessary to state, that at the very early age of fourteen, and before reason had attaincd to maturity, she became the victim of that man, whose crimes had brought him to a justly deserved death, and who, in addition to his other crimes, had to answer for the ensnaring her from a boarding-school, and effecting her seduction. After this he continued to live with her up to the time of his apprehension, and by him she had two childrcn.—With respect to the present indictment, he would contend that even admitting as true all that had been sworn by Mr. B. still there was no proof of her having kept a brothel for lucre. There had been no proof of money having passed, and that was an allegation which was not to be left to interference. It was asked how else she could live ; he would answer that question ; he who had so deeply injured her, on finding himself irretrievably lost, as the only reparation he could make her, had assigned over to her an annuity, which the assigness continued to her, though they declared to her, that if this indictment was proved against her, they should withhold it for the future, as it was not intended to aid her in immortal pursuits.

The Learned Gentleman, in concluding his speech, alluded to the more than brazen countenance of the defendant ; and though interrupted by the Judge, said his opinion of his conduct merited the epithet.

Mr. Justice Littledale said, he had been looking over the indictment, and found that each count charged the defendants with procuring women to prostitute themselves for hire. Now, this could not apply to themselves, and it was clear from the evidence, that there were no females to whom it could apply.

Mr. Sergeant Taddy then said, that his client did not wish to catch a verdict, and would, therefore, consent to their being acquitted.

The Jury accordingly, under his Lordship's direction, declared them "Not Guilty."

His Lordship then observed, that Mr. B. had acted very properly in coming forward as a public prosecutor. He had obtained his end, the abatement of the nuisance, and had, therefore, no reason to complain of the issue of this indictment.

THE KING V. THOMAS RAMSDEN.

This was an indictment charging the defendant, who, it was said, was an officer in the army, with frequenting the brothel alleged to have been kept by the former defendants.

The former indictment having failed, as a matter of course, a verdict of acquittal was taken on this also.

Mr. Adolphus—Well, there is an end to the second effort for public justice.

Mr. Sergeant Taddy then offered, notwithstanding the brutal and abominable language which, he was instructed, had been used towards his client by Messrs. Deedes, Ramsden, and Eden, to withdraw the indictment charging them with a rlot, and the action for assault, on their making an apology, and consenting to pay the costs.

Mr. Adolphus refused these terms ; and they therefore remain to be tried.

THE BRITISH SPECIFIC, for re-producing and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR.—The principle of its operation is to cool and contract the pores which are opened by a redundancy of heat, occasioning a relaxation of the roots, and render them incapable of retaining the hair ; to counteract which nothing is better calculated than the British Specific, as, from its invigorating and oleaginous properties, it almost immediately arrests the falling off, and affords such effectual nourishment to the roots, that persons giving it a fair trial may assure themselves of its speedily restoring it, even where it has become completely bald, however long it may have been so, and, if grey, gradually to restore it to its natural colour. The superiority of this preparation (the invention of a medical man) derives additional recommendation from its being, unlike other compositions for the hair, so extremely clean and agreeable, that its application is a real pleasure, and is only requisite to be generally known to receive the preference of every article in use for similar purposes. To be had only of D. PEDEN, 223, Regent-street, and 15, Burlington Arcade, Piccadilly, in bottles, 6s. each, or cases of four bottles for 21., forward to order on receiving the amount, post paid.

NEW EDITION, THE TENTH, ENLARGED,
With Observations on the Danger of trusting to Nostrums, as an Internal Remedy for the Cure of Strictures. Illustrated by Cases. Price 3s.
PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS on STRICTURES of the URETHRA and RECTUM, recommending an improved system for their Treatment and Cure ; illustrating its efficacy by numerous remarkable and highly important cases, in some of which, Strictures of from ten to twenty years duration have been totally removed in a few weeks, and its superiority thereby fully established over every other method hitherto practised. By C. B. COURTENAY, M.D. To which are added, Observations and Practical Comments on Gleet, Seminal Weakness, and the miseries occasioned by Self Abuse, for the cure of which a mode of treatment, the result of long and successful practice, and at once safe, speedy, and effectual, is adopted by the Author.
Printed for the Author, Robert-street, Adelphi ; and published and sold by Jones and Sherwood, Paternoster-row ; Onwhyn, 4, Catherine-street, Strand ; Chapell, Royal Exchange ; Marsh, 145, Oxford-street ; Walker, 90, High Holborn ; Chappell, 94, Pall Mall ; Sutherland, 9, Carlton-street, Edinburgh ; and may be had of all Booksellers.
"We earnestly recommend the cases related by Dr. Courtenay to the perusal of such of our readers as are afflicted with the complaints which the Author has made the subject of these Observations. Several instances are adduced of the recovery of perfect health from states which were considered hopeless by Practitioners of eminent talents, and very extensive experience. We entertain the highest opinion of Dr. Courtenay's professional skill, and congratulate him on his successful and judicious application to these severe and often fatal diseases."—European Magazine.
